4305. You have now told us about one side of the account, the cloth and the material; are these workers free to buy the tea and sugar and anything of that sort where they like?—If they do not choose to deal with us they are free to go wherever they like.

4306. Suppose you have supplied to A. B., an old crofter, so many pounds of wool, is she free, while she is making that wool—if she is able to do so—to buy her tea and sugar from anybody she likes?—Of course she is. It is entirely a question of honesty and trust. She is not bound in any way to us.

4307. If your prices are not satisfactory she may go where she can to get the goods cheaper?—Yes, but that never really happens. We have as many workers as we can accept. They all like to come to us.

4308. On account of your easier terms?—Yes, because in every way we are more helpful to them.

4309. Take the case of tea—what do you sell it to them at?—Tea at 1s. 6d. we sell at 1s. 10d., and tea at 1s. 8d. per pound we sell at 2s.

4310. May I interpolate this into your evidence, that the difference is just that percentage out of which your general or cost charges are defrayed?—Yes.

4311. You make no trading profit apart from what would be enough to cover the management charges?—We made a loss last year on two of our depots.

4312. Can you tell us what are the ordinary prices elsewhere?—I do not feel competent to tell you what the merchants' charges are, but I think there must be a considerable difference, because the people are always anxious to work for us although we can only take on a certain number.

4314. Do they require cash advances during the six months or such period as they are occupied in making the tweed?—Yes, they sometimes get cash advances, as they have to pay out money in connection with weaving given out perhaps to other members of the family.

4315. Am I right in this conclusion that so far as these workers are concerned you give them for their work a little above the ordinary market rate to the best of your judgment?—I am sure we do.

4316. And so far as concerns the necessaries supplied to them by you, that is a totally separate account?—Absolutely.

4317. They are free to go where they like for these things, and are in no way bound to your Association?—In no way except by honour.

4318. If they bought their tea or sugar or other supplies elsewhere, they would in no way be penalised, and you would still take their work and pay them for it?—We cannot keep them going the whole time with supplies and they are obliged to go to other people also.

4319. When they come at the end of the six months with so many yards of Harris tweeds they get their money from you for the tweed, and are in no way bound to buy or pay for their tea and sugar, etc.?—They are not bound; they are not even bound to pay their debts, but when a Highlander signs a receipt he usually feels constrained to pay up his debt. We have no actual hold on them.

4320. I suppose that neither you nor your association have any sympathy with a system under which crofters would be bound to take their supplies from persons for whom they work?—I deplore the whole system from beginning to end. If it were not for their extreme poverty and their debts to the merchant I would like to work upon an entirely different system, as we do in Sutherland, where the people are rather better off, and where we simply buy their tweeds for cash only. We have never found it necessary to make advances in any other part of Scotland save in the poverty stricken Islands of the outer Hebrides.

4321. Why do you think it a bad system?—It is bad that they should be so constantly in debt. It is demoralising. Their great poverty depresses them; but I should say that some of the merchants are extremely kind; and although I do not approve of their system I ought to say I have heard that in cases of sickness they give advances, and that at such times some of the crofters could hardly live if it were not for such kindness.

4322. So far as your association is concerned, might it not rather strengthen than impede your efforts if it was made impossible to pursue the system which is known as truck?—I think special conditions should be considered for these poor workers.

4323. Assuming that the merchants are contravening the law and that the law was made strong enough to reach them, if they attempted to compel these people to take goods instead of money, would you not naturally sympathise with such a change?—Entirely, in one sense; but the merchants, it must be remembered, have no more hold on these poor people than we have, and as they must make some profit I assume their charges must sometimes be excessive.

4324. The result is to make the workers completely dependent upon the merchant?—Absolutely and entirely dependent. They have no alternative on the island.

4325. Although the merchants individually may be excellent and indeed benevolent men, the system lends itself, does it not, to that kind of complete dependence which works out into something almost like serfdom?—I am afraid it does.

4326. I see that in February, 1905, there was issued by your secretary, Mr. Cates, a circular of instructions to the managers of your depôts, as follows:—(1) "You will avoid giving credit to any particular crofter beyond the sum of £3. (2) Where the tweed is brought in and offered to you by the crofter to purchase you will, after agreeing the price with him, hand to him a statement showing the number of yards purchased, the price per yard, and the total sum due to the crofter. This amount you will hand to him either in cash or by cheque upon the local bank, and you will take his receipt on the invoice for the amount. Under no circumstances, except where the tweed purchased exceeds £5 in value, will you deduct from the amount payable to the crofter anything whatever in respect of a debt which may be due by the crofter to the association. (3) Where the purchase of the tweed is completed and the crofter has received payment and has handed you the receipted account, you will then present to him his account for goods supplied, and if the amount is not paid by the crofter you will refuse to give him any further supplies until his debt is discharged. (4) When presenting your account to the association for the tweed purchased you will send with it the crofter's receipts for the amounts paid to them." I gather that the second head was put in advisedly in order to give these poor people a sense of complete independence in their dealings with you?—That was the idea. Before we issued this we thought that some of our managers, in order to save trouble, were disposed, in paying for the tweeds, to deduct what was owing to us; but rather than have anything of that sort we pay the money in full, and the people can go out of the shop without paying their debts.

4328. Turning to questions 3450 to 3453 in the print, the witness referred to said he was aware of the services of the Duchess of Sutherland in connection with some of these industries, and that she sometimes bought shawls through merchants in Shetland?—Yes, we buy shawls and other things.

4329. Is that done through the merchants?—We buy from private individuals. We buy shawls direct from the workers. We have no depôt in Shetland; and we advance no goods to anyone there, but buy direct.

4330. You do not buy shawls through the merchants?—We never buy through the merchants, but we buy from certain women. I am not in a position to say, however, how far these people are in touch with the merchants. We have no hold on these workers. I should judge from the prices that the workers do not buy from the merchants to sell to us. We conclude that they make the goods themselves.

4331. Referring to questions Nos. 3521 onwards, the witness to whom I have referred said there are association depôts in Harris and Lewis, but that there is no depôt in Shetland, and that he thinks you buy there from a certain firm?—To my knowledge we have never dealt with that firm.

4332. I asked the witness, as you will observe from the print, if he knew whether any steps had been taken to inform the Duchess of Sutherland that the merchants with whom she was said to be dealing were breaking the law, but I gather that in point of fact you deal with no merchants with regard to these shawls?—No.

4333. Referring to question 3525, the witness said he believed the Duchess was communicated with in Harris, but he could not make a definite statement to that effect. But I understand the object of your association is to have no truck of any kind or description?—Our desire is not to have truck; at the same time I bow to the judgment of the Committee as to whether any of our transactions can properly be so described. Personally I deny that it is truck. When we make advances to the people we do so to keep them from starvation, and we pay them in cash for their goods.

4334. Mr. Newlands, the witness in question, said he thought it would be outside the scope of his business to draw your attention to the statements made, but he says that almost the entire quantity, or at least 50 per cent., of the tweed in Harris is bought by truck?—The facts are exactly as I stated them. I never read such evidence in relation to our Association. It shows absolute ignorance of the real condition of affairs.

4335. Instead of tweed being bought by truck, it seems to me pretty clear that truck is a thing you detest, and that you do your best to see that it does not come into your transactions?—We do our best in every possible way to prevent that.

4336. So far as you are concerned, if the general law could be made stronger in order to give these people more complete independence of the local merchants, your association would not deprecate that, but would rather welcome it?—I should like to see first what you propose to do. I should certainly not like the conditions to be made harder for the poor people living there. They are already in such a state of poverty that the peasants in Ireland are not in a worse condition. If somebody would give a million of money to clear them of all their debts and enable them to start afresh it might be very different.

4337. Perhaps you would glance at the evidence of Mr. Newlands and give me in your own words any further comments that suggest themselves to you?—I notice that in reply to Question 3531 the witness speaks about my having been written to unofficially. I think I know to what Mr. Newlands refers there. I think he alludes to a letter written to our committee concerning a frivolous case brought up by a police officer against our association. There was a woman who brought to our manager at Loch Maddy some tweed, but it was faulty and short in length and he refused to take it at full price. She told the police officer, and a letter was written under the impression that we had acted unfairly. We had offered to take the tweed at a reduced rate, and we got a letter suggesting that this was illegal, and that we ought to pay her the full money. We got Mr. Fleming, K.C., to look into the whole matter, and he told us it was a most frivolous case. But, in order to make matters easier for our association in future, and to free us from any such troubles, a circular of instructions was prepared for our managers, dated February, 1905, which has already been read. No private letter was written to me to the best of my belief.

4338. If you turn to Question 3537, you will find Mrs. Tennant asked the witness whether the exact and peculiarly disagreeable nature of the truck had been brought to the notice of the Scottish Home Industries Association —referring to a suggestion that the workers receive only 77 per cent. of the value of their work ?—I do not quite know what is meant there, beyond the fact that we must charge 12½ per cent. on goods supplied. An extraordinary statement is made in Mr. Newlands' evidence, viz. : "They also reduce on giving cash, or did at the time of my visit—I cannot say what is done now : they certainly did make a deduction or a charge for exchange or commission, whichever you like to call it."

4339. Is that true ?—It is an absolutely false statement. We never deduct anything beyond the gross charge of 12½ per cent. as I have already explained to the Committee. If it is any satisfaction to the Committee, our books are open to your inspection, although we are a private company, and we should welcome a visit from any independent witness. When we charge the crofters 12½ per cent. on the actual invoiced price they really get the goods at practically the same price as though they bought them from a wholesale place in Glasgow. We buy the best oatmeal in large quantities on advantageous terms. It can be shown that we save the crofter 4s. 6d. upon each sack as compared with the same meal which he could buy in Glasgow, and as we only charge an average profit on it of 12½ per cent. that leaves a difference of no more than 6d. to our credit as compared with the price of Glasgow wholesale houses.

4340. What is the local merchant's price ?—It might be anything. When the association first went there the prices charged were often exorbitant.

4341. If these poor people bought their meal otherwise than from you, would the price they would have to pay be larger than the price they have to pay to you for it ?—I am sure of it. We give the workers very good quality, and we pay the carriage. Perhaps I may be allowed to read you an extract from a letter received by our manager from Stornoway—one of many grateful testimonials to our work. The writer says—"I mean to write an article publicly acknowledging the great benefits your industry has brought to the homes and hearths of the distressed Celtic population of the Highlands and Islands. I know for a fact that many families would be on the verge of famine all the year round, year by year, were it not for the timely aid sent them in meal and other good things.' I also hand in to the chairman a similar letter from the Rev. Mr. Morrison, of the United Free Church, Beruera, who is unhappy because we have had to check the supplies of wool. Perhaps I may now be allowed to refer to Question No. 3595, in which Mr. Newlands states his belief that after the expense of working is deducted and after paying a dividend the surplus goes in some way to benefit the worker. The fact is that none of our shareholders have ever had a penny of dividend. The directors, too, are entirely voluntary and do not even receive their travelling expenses. Our association is a paying concern at this moment, but we have to exert every effort to advertise and maintain the work. There is not a word of truth in the statement about dividends, or about our buying tweeds made in mills ; we fight against that. The tweeds taken by our association are made with hand looms in the cottages. I am now referring to Questions 3592 to 3600.

By Mr. Maddison.

4342. You told us what was the nett price paid per yard for labour, but I did not gather that you told us what would be about the average wage that these workers would earn ?—We can scarcely reckon it in weekly wages as these people do not do this work continuously and they do other work. We pay about 2s. 9d. per yard for the tweed, whereas in Ireland 1s. 1d. to 1s. 4d. per yard is paid for similar work, so the Scotch crofter gets the difference in labour alone. Our wool is usualy of a better quality than what is used in Donegal.

4343. How many yards could a worker produce in a week ?—There are about forty yards to a web and that might take six months to make.

4344. I understand that the 12½ per cent. profit charged by you upon goods supplied includes establishment charges. Do these charges mean the entire running of your association as a propagandist body ?—That only covers the depot and management charges.

By the Chairman.

4345. You mean that that charge covers only the business side of your association ?—Purely the business part of it. Such a thing must be run on business lines. All our propagandist work is purely voluntary.

By Mr. Maddison.

4346. Can you at all compare the ordinary price and your average price per sack of good oatmeal ?—Our price would be 35s., its fluctuates according to the season.

4347. Although the working crofters are not compelled to take their tea, sugar and meal from your association, are they, as a matter of practice, expected to do so ?—Those who deal with us usually take all they can get from us.

4348. Suppose a crofter did not do that, would that fact in any way alter your relations with such crofter ? —If they do not want tea or sugar they need not take them ; but if we made a habit of buying tweed from others than our own customers, we might be buying goods made from wool supplied on credit by some merchant.

4349. What would your Grace expect these poor workers to do with regard to food, such as tea and meal ? —They are absolutely free. Our orders have been that the supplies should as far as possible be kept down. We must be cautious about the increase of our floating debt.

4350. When these people take your wool, do you expect them also to take their meal, tea, etc., from your association ?—No, we expect nothing, but as a matter of fact they nearly always do so. They look upon it as a matter of course ; but we often advance wool without advancing food.

4351. If a crofter who actually takes your wool, chooses to deal with some shopkeeper for tea, meal, etc., would you as a matter of practice regard that as an unfriendly act ?—They clamour more for our supplies, than we to supply them.

By Mr. Delevingne.

4352. Suppose a worker brings in a piece of cloth and sells it to you for cash and you hand him the cash over the counter, he would as a matter of fact lay it out at your depôt ?—Not necessarily. We do not expect him to do so. When the steamer comes in there is so great a rush to the meal store to get a supply, so eager are they not to be left out that they sometimes break the windows. They also get the wool advanced. After a month or two or perhaps much longer they bring in their tweed and receive cash for it, and they may pay us what they owe for our loans.

4353. As a matter of fact, is there usually little cash to be handed over ?—Nearly in every instance there is a cash balance.

4354. If the worker has a certain balance left, you do not expect him to lay it out at your depot ?—No.

4355. In making a choice as to the advances, you do not give a preference to those who spend their money at your depôt ?—No. We often have not the stuff at the depôt to sell. Directly the store comes in, the people rush to get it advanced to them, and we may have none left in stock. We have a floating debt of about £3,000 owing to our loans. We have a reserve fund of about £3,500. These debts will give you an idea of the poverty of the people, and the number of them requiring help.

4356. Is there anything in the Act which leads you to fix the limit of advances at £3 ?—No, this clause has nothing whatever to do with the Act, it is put in our instructions merely to limit our supplies to the individual worker.

4357. With regard to the tea at 1s. 6d. per lb. Was that the wholesale price to you ?—Yes ; these people will not drink bad tea.

The Duchess of Sutherland.

By Mr. Yarrow.

4358. I take it that your real object is to benefit the crofters by encouraging their industry on business lines, so that they may be in a position to help themselves?—Yes, that is so.

4359. I gather that the work of your association would probably result in a loss if it were not for your efforts with private customers and exhibitions and sales and the like to sell a portion of their goods at a higher price?—I am afraid that is true.

Mr. G. W. CROMWELL, was called; and Examined.

Mr. G. W. Cromwell.

20 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

4360. You are manager for the Scottish Home Industries Association?—Yes.

4361. You have heard the whole of the evidence given by the Duchess of Sutherland and can confirm it?—Yes, most of it comes within my own personal experience, and I can confirm all that Her Grace has said.

EIGHTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 26th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

F. CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. PETER WARD, Dunkineely, County Donegal, was called; and Examined.

Mr. P. Ward.

26 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

4362. What is your age?—I am forty-eight years old.

4363. Is Dunkineely a property that you own?—No, it is a small town of about 300 inhabitants.

4364. In what division of Donegal is it situated?—It is in the centre of south Donegal.

4365. What is your line of business?—I am in the drapery business and am also in the wine and spirit trade.

4366. Have you dealings with the people of south Donegal?—Yes.

4367. To what class do the population belong?—Generally small farmers and fishermen's families. We live along the sea-shore.

4368. Are you agent for any manufacturers?—Yes, I act as agent for six manufacturers.

4369. What are these firms?—They are all linen merchants.

4370. What is the arrangement between these firms as your principals and you as their agent?—The arrangement is that the agent is paid 10 per cent. commission upon cash paid out to the sewers.

4371. Who are the sewers?—The spriggers or workers. The agent has to pay carriage on the goods coming to him, which really means something like 2½ per cent.

4372. How is the amount fixed that is paid to the spriggers or sewers?—We generally make a return of the goods sewn every week. And at the end of the month we send a regular business invoice showing the quantities and the amounts.

4373. But I fear you have not quite understood my question. What I wanted to ask you is, who settles the amount that is paid to the spriggers?—The firms for whom I act, in sending goods to the agents, send an invoice along with each bag of goods, and they fix the price to be paid to the workers.

4374. So that you have nothing to do with fixing the price?—Nothing whatever.

4375 That is fixed in Belfast and the other big towns where the principals are?—Yes.

4377. Is the work done by hand?—Yes.

4379. So that what would be earned by the worker would be at the rate of 4d. a day?—Yes, and a good worker, 5d.

4380. Have you any doubt that that is what might be described as bad wages?—It is. We often return large quantities which we cannot get sewn in the district, the prices that are offered being so small.

4381. When the merchant takes them back, does he send them to other districts?—Yes, the merchants may try to do so, or leave them over till next season.

4382. How many hours would a sewer have to work before she could complete a job of this kind according to the pattern?—Perhaps four hours.

4383. For that she would get 2½d.?—Yes.

4384. Do you not think that payment at the rate of a shade over ½d. an hour is very bad?—Yes.

4386. Has this been done according to contract ?—Yes.

4387. For you ?—Yes.

4388. Was this supplied to you stamped by the Belfast firm ?—Yes.

4389. What was the rate they stipulated for ?—8s. per dozen.

4390. That means 8d. for all the work upon that sample ?—Yes. It is elaborate and beautiful work.

4391. All done by hand ?—Yes.

4392. How long would it take a worker to do that ?—An expert would make about one and a half in a day.

4393. And the ordinary worker ?—Would perhaps only make one.

4394. That means 8d. for all that work ?—Yes.

4395. How many hours would she have to work before she earned that 8d. ?—Probably six hours. They rarely work more than six hours at a time.

4396. The workers are of course in very humble circumstances ?—Yes, usually the daughters of small farmers or fishermen or labourers.

4397. Is this what you would call the average rate of pay ?—I would call 1s. per day comparatively good—it would mean 6s. to 8s. a week.

4398. The shilling per day is calulated on the assumption that one and a half pieces are worked by a very expert worker, but I understand that the ordinary worker of that class would probably be able to earn only 8d. for a day of six hours at this work ?—Yes.

4399. Do you think that good pay ?—No.

4400. Can you get a supply of workers at that rate ?—Yes. They have no other employment. What can they do ? We have no other industry, and a large quantity of this work is done. We have sometimes hurried work to supply special orders which must be completed within a certain limited time, in which case we may have to pay 10d. for one of these things made in a day of perhaps eight hours, but two may be made within a day under exceptional circumstances.

4401. That would be 1s. 8d. for the day ?—Yes.

4402. That is apparently a good deal above the average wage for that class of population ?—Yes About double the average wage. I would only give that hurried work to good hands whom we can depend upon to do it in time.

4403. All this work is done by out-workers by hand in their own homes ?—Yes.

4404. When these people get stuff out, do they sometimes take a week or it may be more before they return it ?—Yes, but we generally limit them—we tell them when we expect it to be returned.

4405. When they bring the goods back, what happens ?—Either my assistant or myself examines the goods to see that they are right according to pattern, and then we pay them cash for the work.

4406. If it is not done according to pattern and if there is any flaw in the work, what happens ?—For my own part during the last ten years I have not stuck a fine on anyone. I have followed a system of my own, and give no work to any worker whom I find does not work well, although sometimes I would give them a chance to improve and do better.

4407. Do you find that your work even among that class is well conducted without fines ?—Yes. That is my experience. I may have half-a-dozen bad workers—I know that some other agents do fine them and cannot very well help it.

4408. But you can help it ?—Yes, by cutting off the bad worker.

4409. When they get their money from you do they deal with it at your shop ?—Sometimes they buy some goods.

4410. What kind of goods ?—Generally drapery—I pay cash myself in all instances. I have held from the beginning that workers should be paid in cash, and I tried to impress upon all the workers that they are entitled to money.

4411. Do you sell food at your establishment ?—No, nothing but drapery—the spirits are sold at a separate place.

4412. Do any of the agents in your village or near it sell food ?—Yes. But so far as I know they all pay cash for work done.

4413. When did they start that ?—Within the last six or seven years—the workers themselves know their rights now better than they used to do. There was a prosecution some years ago and someone was fined for giving tickets to sewers in order that they might get goods. I think that case had a good effect on the agents.

4414. Do you entirely disapprove of payment in goods ?—Yes. I think the workers are entitled to cash payment.

4415. So that really you cannot testify at all from personal experience as to payment in goods ?—No. Of course there are many sprigging agents who give out work in the different towns and who have no shop.

4416. Have you yourself had any experience of payment in goods ?—No, I don't know of any one who pays in goods now.

4417. Do you think that system was stopped about six years ago ?—Yes. I believe it is practically dead in Donegal.

4418. Is your evidence confined to South Donegal ?—Yes, the embroidery trade is virtually confined to South Donegal.

4419. Your personal experience is confined to the linen industry and to sprigging ?—Yes. I don't know anything about the knitting.

4420. Are the workers female workers ?—Yes.

4421. Do you happen to know about West Donegal ?—That is where the knitting is principally done. I am afraid you would have to summon a witness connected with the trade there to tell you about it.

4422. We had some elaborate evidence here from one of the inspectors who described the cottage industries in county Donegal and especially the woollen industries, but I understand you are not able to contradict that evidence ?—No I explained to the secretary of the Committee that I could not speak personally as to the knitting, because I only knew of it by report.

4423. You wrote a letter on June 23rd to the "Tribune" and you made a challenge against Miss Squire, but I now understand that so far as Miss Squire's evidence dealt with the knitting industry in West Donegal you are not able to contradict it at all ?—No.

4424. And if your letter has been read as a contradiction of Miss Squire upon this particular, that is a mistake ?—Yes. The extract I saw from her evidence refers to the cottage industries generally in Donegal, and I contradicted it so far as the sprigging and embroidery industries were concerned, stating that they were really paid in cash.

4425. You said that Miss Squire made sweeping charges in connection with the working of the cottage home industries ?—Yes.

4426. Suppose these charges refer to the woollen industry and to the knitters in whose homes she has been, you would have nothing to say against it ?—I withdraw my contradiction upon that part of the case.

4427. That is a fair way to put it. I gather from your evidence that if these poor people are paid in goods, you would be wholly against that system ?—Decidedly. I am and have been all my life against it.

4428. Do you think it is very harmful to the workers ?—I believe it is.

4429. Does it encourage them to get into debt ?—It is liable to do so—it leaves them entirely in the hands of the agent, who can induce them to take work not so well paid, because they are in his books. I have known cases where agents have kept their well-paid work for sewers who deal with them. The system is apt to make them partial.

4430. What part of the country do you refer to ?—In nearly all the towns they did that some years ago, but it is not so much the case now. During the last few years work has been plentiful, and an agent has not the same power to confine his work

4431. You are again referring to your own experience in South Donegal ?—Yes.

4432. Suppose the practice exists to this day of knitters bringing their wool back worked, and being paid for their work in goods; I gather that you would condemn such a system?—Emphatically I would.

4433. What do you mean by this passage in your letter, "I challenge Miss Squire to name five out of all the hundreds of agents who do not pay cash to workers"?—I meant sprigging agents.

4434. And in South Donegal?—Yes. Perhaps I did not put it quite plain enough; Irishmen sometimes do things quick.

4435. You understand that when your letter appeared in the press, we thought it right to give you an opportunity of making an explanation?—I had no idea it would come before the Committee.

4436. We are glad to hear what you have got to say?—Perhaps I should apologise for making so strong a statement against Miss Squire's statement. I only meant the sprigging; I cannot speak for the knitting.

4437. You add in your letter that even if there exists such an unworthy agent, the worker has her remedy. What do you mean by that?—Take the case of a town with six agents; if one has a grocer's shop, and insists upon the workers buying goods from him, they can go to any of the other five agents, whose work is plentiful and equally good.

4438. That still applies to the sprigging of linen and to South Donegal?—Yes.

4439. Probably you are not able to tell me, as you do not sell food-stuffs yourself, whether the goods of that kind bought from agents by workers are purchased at current market rate?—Every inquiry I have made amongst sprigging agents in the last few years would seem to show that they pay current coin for their work. If the workers buy stores from them in return, I think they get them at the current price.

4440. Can you tell us anything about the knitting industry, more paticularly in West Donegal?—No, I cannot speak as to that. I was in that business for some years, but after the introduction of machines, I gave up that work.

4441. I suppose your general view is that it would tend to improve the condition of the people, and to better their sense of independence if they always had a right to their wages in money?—I think so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4442. You have just told us of the impression resulting in your mind from certain inquiries, and you added, "so far as you have been able to ascertain." Where and when did you begin to inquire into the practices referred to?—My attention was first drawn to the matter by the prosecution by the lady inspector some years ago. At that time I had no idea that there was such a system.

4443. Of which prosecution are you speaking?—The one at Ardara, where there was a fine in the local court for not paying wages in cash. The agent there insisted on giving a ticket which the workers had to take to another counter for the purpose of buying goods. After that I commenced to inquire, and ever since that I have been preaching to the workers that they are entitled to get cash for their work as a matter of justice.

4444. Then you found it necessary to preach to the workers that they were entitled to get cash for their work?—Yes. Work was then not so plentiful as it is now, and sometimes there was an interval of perhaps weeks when an agent had nothing to give out. I have told the sewers publicly and privately that they are entitled to get paid in cash.

4445. Over what period did your inquiries extend?—For the past six or seven years.

4446. Are you still inquiring?—Yes. The agents all say they pay cash.

4447. But during that time, or some of that time, you found it necessary to preach to the workers that they were entitled to cash payment?—Yes, because it was rumoured that some of the shops did not pay them in cash.

4448. If the system was to pay in cash, when you preached to them on that subject, did they tell you that the sermon was unnecessary, as they were already receiving their wages in cash?—They said that they were all receiving their wages in cash recently.

4449. What do you mean by "recently"?—Within the last five or six years. I did not hear of any single case where an agent refused to pay in cash.

4450. Would you date the improvement in that respect from Miss Squire's prosecution?—Yes, I think so, mainly I think that was the first thing which publicly drew the attention of the workers to their rights, and agents saw that they had to pay in cash.

4451. Then you would consider that the prosecution was necessary and useful?—I did not then know that the system had been at all general. I knew that some of the agents paid in cash, and I was not aware of any agents who would be so unscrupulous to the workers as to follow a different system.

4452. Then really your letter, and your inquiries may be taken as a justification of the prosecution?—I think it was quite justified.

4453. What is the area of your inquiry?—South Donegal.

4454. The whole of South Donegal?—A third of the whole county.

4455. Did you visit the towns yourself?—In some cases. I know the people personally, and I wrote to several of the reliable agents who could give me information, and their reply was that so far as they could ascertain cash had been paid in recent years to all workers.

4456. Did all the replies come to the same conclusion?—Yes, so far as these people could ascertain.

4457. Since the prosecution, the practice has been abandoned?—Yes.

4458. That was the purpose of the prosecution?—I believe it helped, but another cause, as I have explained, is that work is now more plentiful, and unless the agents pay cash, they will not get the work done.

4459. You say "now," but Miss Squire's reference was not to "now" and your inquiries have extended over five or six years?—Yes. The work is more plentiful, and has been so during the past two years.

4460. But surely there have been complaints within three or four years that the work was not so plentiful?—Not within the last three years.

4461. What district do you speak of?—South Donegal.

4462. Have you brought for the information of this Committee any of the replies you received from the agents of whom you inquired?—No, but the inquiries had all the same result.

4463. Did it not occur to you in writing your letter to the Press to refer to the fact that there had been a prosecution at Ardara?—No, that is many years ago.

4464. It was within your knowledge at the time you wrote the letter?—Yes. At that time, there were some comments in the papers, and I then contradicted the statement that the practice was general. I declared at the time that that was an isolated case.

4465. If it was an isolated case, why did you find it necessary to preach to the workers as to their right to be paid in cash?—I showed them what many of them did not know before.

4466. But if they were receiving their rights without that knowledge, was it not just as well as if they had the knowledge, without any need to preach to them?—A prosecution in a small country place is talked about over the district, and I declared that all workers were entitled to cash.

4467. If the prosecution in question referred to a practice in an isolated case, surely it was unnecessary to help the people to realise their rights if they were already in the enjoyment of those rights?—It does not look as if the practice was at all general, as there was only one prosecution. The lady inspectors could have taken other prosecutions if the practice was other than isolated.

4468. That was for the lady inspectors to decide, and perhaps they had excellent reasons for not proceeding against the other persons. You have informed the Committee that you preached to the workers as to their rights, that they were already in the enjoyment of those rights, and that the prosecution for denial of those rights was merely an isolated case ?—There might have been some small agents perhaps who did not pay cash, but, even before that case arose, I always told the workers that they were entitled to cash.

4469. Your published letter did not concern itself alone with your opinion, or perhaps not at all with your opinion, but with the facts, is not that so ?—My letter was written hurriedly, and did not go into particulars ; it referred to embroidery agents as a whole.

4470. May I read a passage from your letter, namely, " As an agent for the past twenty-five years, and having a thorough knowledge of the business, I assert that all embroidery agents in South Donegal pay their workers in cash." I think that assertion, together with the period of which you claim knowledge, would lead people reading your letter to assume that during the twenty-five years to which your letter referred, payment was made in cash ?—I should say that payment as a whole is made in cash in connection with the sprigging trade, but there might be isolated cases to the contrary. I believe that the vast majority of agents pay cash ; I declared that and I say so still.

4471. In your letter you do not say the vast majority, but you say " all " ?—I would probably qualify that if I had to write it again. Agents who do not pay cash might not get their work done, and the workers are now better educated in a knowledge of their rights, and would not be foolish enough to sew for agents who do not pay cash. The prosecution no doubt did good by calling attention to the matter.

By Mr. Cawley.

4472. Do you give the material out to the workers ready stamped with the pattern ?—Yes.

4473. Do you supply cotton for the sewing ?—Yes.

4474. But not needles ?—No, the workers have to find their needles and thimbles.

4475. Is Ardara in South Donegal ?—It is on the borders, half in West Donegal.

4476. We have had evidence from one of the lady inspectors who spent some months there, and she told us that every afternoon she visited these outworkers, about fifty in number, and found that payment in the form of goods was part of a general system there ; that the truckmasters, or shopkeepers, maintained the system ; that it existed in several places that were mentioned, including Ardara, Killibegs, Glencolomb Kill, etc. She referred to what she called the gombeen men. How do her statements fit in with your evidence that the case of Boyle who was prosecuted was an isolated one ?—That was, I think, some eight or nine years ago. I admit that there might have been some isolated cases at that time, but there has been very little of it.

4477. Do you contradict the evidence that at that time there was a general system of truck at Ardara ?—I would not say a general system.

4478. The evidence referred to fifty cases of these outworkers who informed the lady inspector that there was a general system of paying in goods ?—It is the first time that I have heard of any such number.

4479. Do you know the place well, and the local agents ?—Yes ; it is only nine miles from me.

4480. How many agents are there there ?—Six or seven.

4481. Would you say that the other agents have always paid in cash ?—I made inquiries at the time of the prosecution and contradicted the statement that the system was general. I denied that the agents were so unscrupulous as not to pay their workers in cash. Mrs. Boyle was the only one who adopted that system.

4482. What is meant by the term " gombeen " man ?—He is a man who sells goods at an exorbitant price upon credit, or charges an exorbitant rate of interest on cash lent.

4483. Are there gombeen men at Ardara ?—I do not think the word should be used in connection with out-industry. It was generally looked upon as applying to meal merchants and to money men.

4484. Did they advance money to the peasants ?—They did, but I am glad to say that system is now done.

4485. If he carries on a shop, he cannot well charge more for his goods than the local current price ?—The system prevailed rather at a time when shops were fewer, and when a man with cash got most of the trade into his hands, and by giving long credit when he sold his goods, charged perhaps 50 per cent. more than the regular retail price.

4486. Did the gombeen men give out work ?—They never belonged to our class.

4487. The gombeen man is a different man from the agent ?—Decidedly so.

4488. How long is it since agents first received from the manufacturing firms a commission on the work given out ?—Ever since I commenced to give out goods twenty-two or twenty-three years ago.

4489. Does that system apply to all the cases within your knowledge ?—Yes, to all embroidery cases.

4490. In saying that the commission system has alway prevailed, do you only speak of the embroidery trade ?—Yes, in former times agents were paid a salary.

4491. Has the commission always been as large as 10 per cent. ?—Yes.

4492. Is there any class of agents who do not receive commission, but give out work and make what they can by it ?—Not in the embroidery or white goods trade.

4493. Are there no sprigging agents except those you have mentioned ?—None, except those who act directly for Belfast firms and receive commissions.

4494. Do the tickets which the Belfast firm put on the goods remain upon them when you have passed the goods on to the workers ?—In some cases the prices are stamped and in some they are not—I mean the prices to be paid for the work. Some agent may try to give it out at a lesser price if he can get the work done.

4495. Do you think there are dishonest agents who cheat the workers ?—I would not like to say—I hope not. Is any change in the law were necessary, I think it would be better if the price of all work was stamped upon it, by the distributing firm, so that workers could not be cheated 4496. Do you make it a condition with your workers and sewers that they shall do the work themselves ?—Oh, yes, they do it themselves.

4497. But do you make it a condition ?—I give no work except to those who undertake to do it.

4498. Do you insist that it shall not be passed on to anybody else ?—Oh, no. Some members of the worker's family may assist.

4499. You do not object to that ?—No. So long as the work comes back right and can pass inspection ; but I would object to agents giving out work to sub-agents, which is sometimes done. I think the sub-agents are the worst class.

4500. Please explain why you think so ?—Because in some cases they have little shops in the country and prevail on agents in the town to give them a certain number of dozens of pieces to be worked. I believe they get them for the purpose of truck and of selling their own goods. But I have heard of no complaints on the subject.

4501. You know that that practice prevails in some places somewhere ?—Yes, but not to any large extent.

4502. Have you any view as to whether there should be a return of the out-workers furnished ?—Yes, I think that would be useful.

4503. Do you think the inspector of factories ought to have these out-workers on his or her list ?—Yes.

4504. And that he should have the same power of supervising an outworker as he has in the case of workers inside the factories ?—I would not object to that. I believe it would benefit the people.

4505. Do you yourself sell linen goods ?—Not this class of goods.

By the Chairman.

4506. With reference to the tea-cloth which you showed us—suppose any respectable house wife goes into a shop and wants to buy it, what would she pay for it ?—Perhaps about 1s. 3d.

4507. Do you think it would be helpful to this class of workers who are so very poorly paid if they had some combination among themselves ?—Decidedly, I think it would.

4508. What would be the advantage of that ?—One advantage would be that it would protect them if the agent was not treating them right, and they could insist upon getting better wages.

4509. You really think they are entitled to better wages ?—Yes. I don't understand why the trade is nor able to pay better wages. Embroidery gets a good sale ; there is a large demand for it.

4510. Coming back to that square which you first showed us—it is practically a square yard of linen ?—It is what we call " union."

By Mr. Cawley.

4511. It is cotton, is it not ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

4512. What is the value of that yard of material ? —About 5d. plain, but the hemstitch costs 1½d. One thing I would suggest is that there should be a register kept by the inspector of factories of agents who give out work to the outworkers. You could then ascertain exactly how they are paid.

By Mr. Cawley.

4513. Would you allow no agent to give out work unless he was registered, and require that any one who came into the district to give out work should have to register himself ?—Yes. So as to let the inspector know whether he was covering all the ground.

4514. Is not that of the nature of a protection to the other agents ?—No, I think not.

Mr. T. OWEN EDWARDS, H.M. Inspector of Factories in charge of the Southampton District, was called ; and Examined.

26 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

4515. I understand your present district comprises Hants, Dorset and South Wilts ?—Yes.

4516. You have been in charge about three and a half years and have one junior and one assistant on your staff ? —Yes.

4517. How many works are there in your district ?— Over 10,000.

4518. What do the industries include ?—The manufacture of nets, gloves, clothing and corsets.

4519. Your district is the principal seat of the corset industry ?—Yes.

4520. And the laundry industry is also large ?—Yes.

4521. Have you had any experience with regard to truck ?—I am sorry to say large experience.

4522. Is it prevalent in your district ?—It was, but it has been very largely reduced.

4523. How is that ?—By prosecutions and by moral suasion.

4524. Is the truck there confined almost entirely to infringements of the 1896 Act ?—Yes. But there are a number of cases where I have taken prosecutions under the 1831 Act. I am afraid some cases of colourable truck are still in existence.

4525. Have you a list of prosecutions ?—Yes. I hand in a list of prosecutions. (List handed in).

4526. Were these prosecutions instituted by you ?— Yes.

4527. Against manufacturers and workshop owners in your district ?—Yes.

4528. Did you obtain convictions ?—Yes. Convictions in a large majority of cases. There were one or two dismissals.

4529. I notice one case where a worker was fined for being more than five minutes in a lavatory ?—Yes. Here is a list of the Rules (Exhibit No. 1 of Appendix VII.) I prosecuted the firm for fining a woman a shilling for being more than five minutes in a lavatory ; Rule 4 applies to that. It sets forth that the lavatories must not be used as meeting places for talk and play.

4530. Did you obtain a conviction ?—Yes.

4531. What is the section under which you got it ?—It was under the 1896 Act, " otherwise than in accordance with the contract, etc.," and also in the same section a fine " not reasonable having regard to all the circumstances."

4532. I notice that these rules contain several items that I daresay you would consider doubtful ?—Yes.

4533. For instance, the second rule provides that for one half day late without the foreman's consent a full day shall be deducted ?—Yes. I have another case on that point.

4534. Are these piece workers ?—Largely so. The particular girl in question earned 8s. per week in wages, working full time, and she was fined 1s. for being in a lavatory for five minutes. She denied this and maintained her statement before the manager. In my presence she said she was not there more than four minutes. Previous to the prosecution I sent for the foreman and he admitted that he did not exactly know how long she had been there on that occasion and that he thought the fine was too much for the offence.

4535. Since that prosecution, has the system been altered, or does it still exist ?—The rule still exists, but I think more in terrorem.

4536. I see you have a case of deduction for the use of sewing machines ?—Yes, five per cent. charged for sewing machines

4537. Did you obtain a conviction there ?—Yes.

4538. Under what section—that it was not a fair and reasonable deduction ?—That is it. They were charged under Section 3 of the 1896 Truck Act. One workmen was charged 2s. for the use of a sewing machine.

4539. I assume you maintained under Subsection B that that was not a fair and reasonable rent or charge ?— Yes. One man's total wages for a week amounted to £1 3s. 8d. and the total he made with an apprentice was £1 7s. 0d.

4540. What sort of work was it ?—Tailoring. The firm kept back 1s. 4d. in that case for the use of a sewing machine.

4541. Did the sewing machine belong to the employer ? —Yes.

4542. Was it worked with power ?—No. It was an ordinary treadle sewing machine. There was upon the same day another case against the same firm for charging 2s. for the use of a sewing machine. Since then all such charges have been discontinued.

4543. Is not the present law able to reach cases of that kind ?—I think not.

4544. Why ?—There is the condition as to " fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case." The matter must be taken into Court and may come before some great unpaid, who may be friendly or otherwise, and it is for the justice to decide whether the deduction is fair and reasonable. I think we want a better definition of fair and reasonable.

4545. Have you any suggestion to make upon that point ?—I am afraid not at the moment. Take the case is 2s. deducted in one week from a pound in wages. That of five per cent., and the sewing machines when practically new cost about £7. The life of a sewing machine for good and bad use is probably about ten years. I have known them in the stocking trade last nearly twenty years when they originally cost £14. There were cases in the stocking trade in which a charge of five per cent. on the wage was considered too high. This is principally what led to the Hosiery Act, 1874.

4546. Did more than one workman have the use of the machine ?—There were two machines. One workman had 2s. deducted from £1, and another had 1s. 4d. deducted from £1 3s. 8d.

4547. Had they the exclusive use of the sewing machine. —Yes.

4548. Were the machines devoted solely to the service of these two men ?—Yes.

4549. Did the machine form a necessary part of their work ?—Yes.

4550. Do you approve of a deduction for the use of plant of that kind ?—No. Decidedly not.

4551. You think it should run into the general oncost charges of the work ?—Decidedly. As much as the rent of the factory itself.

4552. Your view is that so far as these permanent charges are concerned the workman should have his net wage ?—Decidedly.

4553. Without a system of deductions at all ?—Decidedly.

4554. These permanent charges might include one for standing room ?—That is entirely abolished in my district.

4555. With advantage ?—Yes.

4556. Is there a charge for light ?—No charge for light.

4557. For heat ?—None.

4558. I am going over the items mentioned in the Statute. Any charge for materials ?—Yes.

4559. Have you had any abuses in that respect under the present system ?—Yes. I have had.

4560. In that case also are you of opinion that such matters should be treated as part of the general oncost ?—Yes. There was a reason for them at one time which has ceased to exist.

4561. Will you please amplify that ?—The charge for standing room originated when the present factory system commenced. The owners endeavoured to recoup themselves for some of the outlay in building the factory and in bringing the workpeople to work together. But the advantage of having them to work together has become apparent and the necessity for the charge has ceased.

4562. The charge for light and heat similarly may have had an historical reason which has disappeared ?—Yes.

4563. With regard to sewing machines, the difficulty would be settled, would it not, if they were linked up with the general power of the mill, because they would then become part of the machinery ?—Yes.

4564. But your view is that the whole of the machinery, including the sewing machines, should be treated as part of the general management expenses ?—Yes. I am strongly in favour of net wages.

4565. Do you find that there is a difficulty owing to the onus resting on the prosecution to prove the unfairness and unreasonableness of the deduction ?—Yes. Decidedly.

4566. And is the practice very varied, as one magistrate might hold a deduction to be unfair which another magistrate might consider to be fair ?—I think the expression ought to be better defined.

4567. Can you assist us in regard to that ?—I am afraid I cannot, as I have only had two days to prepare my evidence so that I am not prepared to suggest.

4568. At all events, you would approve a priori of the fairness and reasonableness being conditioned by there being a certain maximum precentage of the wages allowed in deductions ?—Yes.

4569. Would you say 5 per cent. ?—I would not go so high as that.

4570. Probably half that ?—Yes.

4571. Sixpence in the pound ?—Yes.

4572. I think you have had one case of standing room charges ?—That firm made over £100 a year in standing room charges.

4573. What kind of factory was it ?—A corset factory.

4574. Where ?—At Portsmouth.

4575. When were they prosecuted ?—Within the last three years.

4576. What was the amount of the deduction ?—It was 2d. per head irrespective of wages. I may mention a case I had under the 1831 Act. The manager of a laundry acted as agent for a firm that sold cheap jewellery, clocks and girls' finery. He used to sell these things to the workers, and at the end of the week he kept sums varying from 1s. to 2s. out of their wages, and he received from his principal a commission of 10 per cent.

4577. Were you able to extirpate that system ?—Yes. I stopped it. In connection with the same laundry they supplied the girls with ginger beer at a penny a bottle, and I believe they still do it, but I ascertained from the makers that that was cost price and that there was absolutely no profit to the firm out of it. In fact it was sold to the girls rather cheaper than they could have bought it outside. There was a case of deduction for cleaning and standing room. I have rather strong views about that. I think the charge for cleaning is entirely wrong in principle and not fair, because the employers are required by legal obligation to keep their factories clean, and it is not fair that they should be allowed to make their workpeople pay for doing what the law requires the firm to do. It would be quite as reasonable to charge for fencing off machinery or for sanitary conveniences. If I saw that a factory was not clean I should call attention to the fact, and require attention to it under Section 1 of the Factory Act. There is another case which I should mention of a deduction for ironing cloths. The case was that of a firm of shirt and collar manufacturers, and they were charged with making a deduction from the wages paid to the workpeople without a contract, the surcharges not being fair and reasonable. The charges referred to were 10½d. out of 7s. 1d. in one week, 10½d. out of 9s. 7d. in another week, 7d. out of 10s. 1d., and 10½d. out of 12s. 3d. The firm had been prosecuted for truck during the previous six months. I may explain that the tables upon which the shirts and collars are ironed are covered with calico which gets burned during the course of the work and the girls were charged for replacing those ironing cloths. Then there is another case, (the firm of N 1), which is one of the worst cases I have had during my experience. They are a firm of blousemakers.

4578. Did you prosecute ?—Yes. I prosecuted them for the charging for use of sewing machines, but they might also have been charged with making a profit of about 75 per cent. on their sewing cotton. The girl in question worked four days full factory time. During these four days she made four dozen ladies' blouses, and her wages amounted to 4s. 4d., or at the rate of 1s. 1d. per dozen. Nevertheless the firm deducted 4d. per week for the use of a sewing machine out of that amount, and they sold the cotton to her at a profit of from 70 to 75 per cent. She had to provide the cotton out of the sum paid. I prosecuted them and the firm sent a solicitor to prove that the manager of the works they had opened in my district was merely a sub-contractor of theirs, but after a whole day's police court experience I managed to obtain a conviction. I maintained my point that they were the actual employers although their headquarters were in London.

4579. Of course the whole of that trouble would have been avoided if a deduction of that nature were not permissible by law ?—Yes.

4580. With your experience of both successful and unsuccessful prosecutions, your opinion is, I gather, that there should be a net wage ?—Yes. Most decidedly.

4581. That being so, would you trust to discipline being maintained quite sufficiently to enable the factory to go on without deductions for materials supplied or anything of that sort ?—Yes.

4582. You have another list of prosecutions to hand in, I believe, in respect of fines imposed ?—Yes. I hand it in.—(List handed in).

4583. I observe that you have there a list of fines for thirteen offences and that no fewer than ten of these are for being late ?—Yes. I have got particulars of these.

4584. Please give us one or two instances ?—We may take the second case.

4585. Did you get a conviction there ?—Yes. It is the case of a girl earning 2s. 9d. in a week who was forty minutes late during the whole week. Every minute was counted at meal time or any other time and the total amounted to forty minutes in the week. That girl had been a dressmaker for three years and her wages amounted to 2s. 9d. per week.

4586. What was the business of the firm ?—Dressmaking. For that forty minutes the firm kept back 2d.,

Mr. T. O. Edwards.

and another girl who had been a dressmaker for three years and who earned only 2s. per week was fined 2d. for being thirty-three minutes late in the week. 2d. for half an hour is 4d. an hour, which means 22s. a week. There were three other similar cases. I hand in a list of details of the cases to which I am referring. (Exhibit No. 2 of Appendix VII.)

4587. Have you any other instances to cite as to fines?—A company at Salisbury has a rule which says "As the factory has a loss on every one not keeping time, in addition to the value of the time lost through being absent or late, an equivalent charge will be made from the weekly wage. The above deduction will not be made provided reasonable excuse is given to the foreman before resuming work." I prosecuted that firm for making a deduction in respect of a fine which was "neither fair nor reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances." The girl in question was away one day ill and told the foreman so. Another morning she was at the hospital out-patients' department, and told the foreman so. In addition to that she was late during the week four times—fifteen minutes each time. I may explain that if a girl or workman is out for five minutes, he or she must remain out for fifteen minutes. The wages of this girl would be nearly 8s. in a week if she worked full time, or at the rate of ¾d. per hour through a week of fifty-two hours. She was away one and a half days, equalling fifteen hours, thus leaving forty hours, less one hour for the four late attendances. This leaves thirty-nine hours of work for which her earnings amounted to 5s. 8d., of which 1s. 8d. was deducted by the firm, who handed the girl 4s., their contention being that they were entitled to keep back three days' wages. The same firm kept back 5d. from a girl fifteen years of age for what they called "wasting fifteen minutes."

4588. What had she done? How did she waste it?—That was the only explanation given to me I did not prosecute in that case. I only cite the case as a sample of what sometimes goes on.

4589. I notice a case of a fine imposed by a firm at Portsmouth. Did you get a conviction in that case?—Yes.

4590. What is the business of that firm?—Corset makers. They fined a girl 6d. for laughing during the meal time.

4591. Was that in accordance with their rules?—Yes.

4592. I should like to see the rule?—I hand in a copy of the rules. (Exhibit No. 3 of Appendix VII.) I prosecuted the firm and availed myself of a technical slip on their part. They had not given a receipt.

4593. Some of the rules seem peculiar. I see that one prescribes a fine of 2s. for using a larger needle than the size prescribed?—That might possibly be hard or it might be fair. If a girl worked with too large a needle, she might damage the goods. Some of these rules are more intended for moral influence than for enforcement.

4594. Do you think there is any value in these rules, apart from discipline?—I don't.

4595. Do you think the enforcement is of value for discipline?—If fines are still to exist legally, I should entrench them with regulations and restrictions to such an extent as to make it almost impossible to inflict them.

4596. Of course the broader and straighter course would be to abolish them altogether. What would you say to that?—I don't think I would entirely and absolutely abolish them.

4597. What are the restrictive conditions that you have in your mind?—The alternative would be dismissal.

4598. You have produced a copy of the rules of some of these firms. Are these cases which you think would be of help to us as a Committee?—Yes.

4599. I now ask you to give us your general view as to these rules?—The best regulated works have absolutely abolished fines. If fines can be abolished it means that there is a better understanding between employers and employed.

4600. The abolition is not hurtful to the employers?—Not to the good employers.

4601. What takes their place, in the case of good employers, when fines are abolished?—Possibly, in the first place, the threat of dismissal. I hand in a set of rules (Exhibit No. 4 of Appendix VII) as an example, introduced in November, 1902, by the firm O 1. Prior to that time there were rules and fines, but the fines were abolished entirely. One rule prescribes that any workman taking)and depositing other than his own check will render himself liable to instant dismissal.

4602. Substantially a threat?—Yes; but there has never been any case of dismissal. Another rule says that throwing clay is strictly prohibited and that any offender will render himself liable to instant dismissal. There have been no cases of dismissal; but naturally there have been instances of cautions.

4603. Does that suggest to your mind that with good employers, like the firm O 1, emphatic rules, pointing to dismissal as a possible recourse, serve the purpose completely?—In that case decidedly. Messrs. Sharp, Jones & Co., potters, of Branksome, have entirely abolished fines.

4604. At what time?—Within the last few years.

4605. And with satisfactory results?—Yes. P 1—another pottery firm—have some fines (see Exhibit No. 5 of Appendix VII), some of which may not seem fair or reasonable; but I find that in practice they are not enforced. I have a letter from the head of the firm in which he says that if I think it desirable, he will entirely abolish the fines. I may say that this firm is one of the best. They are at the present time providing for some of the workmen's widows, and they are building almshouses and have a good sick fund. There is another firm—Q 1—who have three fines one of which is to the effect that any piece spoiled will be charged for according to value. I may say it is the exception to make any charge. They used to make a charge for cleaning, but that has been abolished.

4606. I gather from your evidence that employers are beginning to realise that they can have efficient conduct of their works even after fines are abolished?—Yes, there are two ways of managing men; one by kindness and the other by harshness. Some managers are qualified for the one and some for the other.

4607. When the coercive method is employed the convenient form of coercion is a pecuniary penalty?—Yes.

4608. On the whole do you think that that makes for a poorer class of discipline than the other method?—Yes, decidedly.

4609. Would there be any real hardship imposed upon workers or employers with whom you have been associated in your district if fines were rendered impossible by law?—I should never recommend making fining illegal.

4610. Why?—Because in some cases it would be an alternative to dismissal, and fining is preferable; but I would make the restrictions as hard as possible.

4611. What kind of restrictions are in your mind?—I mean legal restrictions. Take the Act of 1896. The restrictions as to fining are fairly strict. I would make them still stricter.

4612. In what direction?—Making it harder to fine the workpeople.

4613. At all events, I gather from you that the total abolition idea does not meet with your approval?—Not the total abolition of fines.

4614. Have you had experience of out-workers?—Yes, large experience.

4615. How do you have any jurisdiction over them?—Until the case of Squire v. the Midland Lace Company I went on as if they were workmen. The 1831 Act was undoubtedly intended to apply to all earners of wages, but through the unfortunate system of legislation by reference that was all changed. Take the case of the firm of R 1 employing about 300 out-workers in the glove trade. They make the knitted gloves that many ladies and gentlemen wear. These are sold, I understand, at from 2s. upwards per pair. These gloves are knitted in the homes of the people. It used to be customary to pay for the work half in kind and half in cash; but that system has been abolished.

4616. That was truck?—Yes. It came to my knowledge—at least I suspected—that the system nevertheless continued, and I went into the matter. I found that in one case a woman made six pairs of gloves at 6½d per pair, amounting to 3s. 3d., also two pairs at 5d. each, amounting to 10d., or a total of 4s. 1d, and that woman received goods to the value of 2s. 3½d. and cash to the value of 1s. 9½d.

4617. In what year was that?—This year. The matter is under consideration at the present moment. In another case a woman owed money to a firm by whom she was employed. They wrote, "We find you still owe 1s. 1½d.; in future we are paying cash for work done."

4618. Does it occur to you that, unless there is extremely strict supervision, there may be a recrudescence of truck?—Yes. I can give you instance after instance of that. There was the case of part paying in cash.

4619. What was the nature of the goods that were paid in kind?—The man is a big draper and he sends to all the villages around him in Dorset supplies of wool which the women bring back on the following Thursday in the form of knitted gloves. He pays the women in cash, less the value of the goods ordered. I have not yet been able to ascertain whether the goods are sold at a normal price.

4620. The glove knitters are out-workers?—Yes.

4621. Has that arisen since the case of Squire and the Midland Lace Company was decided?—Yes. I am trying to deal with the case in this way. If I can prove an actual contract between master and servant to do specific work, I can apply the Act and prove the term "workman."

4622. And so avoid the technical point upon which the case of Squire and the Midland Lace Company was decided?—Yes.

4623. But apart from that I fancy you would have no hesitation in saying, from the point of view of policy, that the decision in the Midland Lace Company's case was a disastrous decision?—Yes, decidedly 4624. And has resulted in causing a recrudesence of truck among out-workers?—I will not go so far as that, as the purport of the decision is not yet generally known.

4625. But since that decision you have observed, and deplore, some recrudescence of truck among out-workers?—I have.

4626. You see no difficulty, I imagine—if technical trouble could be avoided—in applying the principle against truck to all out-workers?—To all wage earners. In the case of the leather glove trade, there is, for instance, one contractor who keeps a shop between Sherborne and Yeovil. The system that has existed there has been for the goods to be given out to the workers, and for the sewings of one class of work to be sold to the out-workers. I found that the employers made a profit of 20 per cent. on the sewings. In that case the employers were given the option of refunding these profits for six months or being prosecuted. This was before the case of Squire and the Midland Lace Company in April, 1905. The firm willingly agreed to refund the money, and I have here receipts from the workers themselves, showing that sums from 1s. 6d., up to 9s. were refunded to these out-workers as the profit made on their sewings, amounting in all to many pounds. In addition to that, the shopkeeper I referred to supplies (hires) sewing machines to some of these out-workers and charges a rent. She hires them out for 1s. per week. In other cases the out-workers own the machines themselves. There is undoubtedly colourable truck here. The shopkeeper pays the workers cash for the work when it is brought home, and they pay for whatever groceries, etc., they have had. The same system of colourable truck is met with in the net braiding industry in almost every village about Bridport. The work is taken out by carriers who are generally small shopkeepers. The money may be paid over the counter for the goods to the workers, but there is no doubt in my mind that as a rule it is paid back immediately.

4627. Do the workers get the goods at market rate?—I am coming to that. I would suggest that if any legislation is proposed attempting to deal with such cases, it might be provided that if the charges made for groceries and other things bought by the out-workers is more than the market price, that should be treated as an infringement of the Truck Act.

4628. Even if the workers are paid in money and pay cash for the goods?—Yes. I would make it illegal for any employer who has a shop to give credit to any of his workpeople. I prosecuted an employer last year for not paying in current coin. He opened a shop about seven years ago and told his workpeople that he should like them to deal with him. One of his workmen evidently got into debt to the employer. He is an able-bodied man, and working full time during one week he only earned 14s. 6d., but the employer kept back 12s. 6d. for groceries owing, and gave the man 2s. During the same week a woman working for this man earned 5s. 6d., but she received no money, the whole being kept back for goods supplied. I visited that factory this year and found the case of a man who earned 9s. 6d. at hand hackling.

Mr. T. O. Edwards. 26 July 1906.

4629. What is that?—It is a system of hand combing for hemp and flax. The employer I refer to has a shop in the street, and the entrance to the factory is through a lane at the side of the shop. The workman I refer to lived two or three doors from the shop and during the week groceries to the value of 1s. 11d. were obtained from it by this man or his family. After he received his wages of 9s. 6d. he sent his daughter to pay the 1s. 11d. That and other cases give me cause to suggest that the giving of credit to any workman by the employer should be made illegal. It is a colourable transaction at the best.

4630. You think that, in cases of extreme poverty, if there have to be advances they should be in money?—Yes.

4631. What is the number of prosecutions you have had?—In 1903 twenty-one; in 1904 three; in 1905 nine.

4632. You agree that the Act of 1896 has been of great use?—Yes.

4633. But experience has shown its weak points?—Yes.

4634. Taking the main points of your evidence in order, and first as to fines. You have said that the best regulated works have abolished fines, but that in badly managed works the fines are still sometimes numerous?—Yes.

4635. And you have had instances in the latter class of about a third of the hands being fined every week?—Yes, on the average. There were over 250 fines during the half year, or at the rate of ten per week for thirty persons employed.

4636. There have been numerous finings for being late and for trivial offences?—Yes.

4637. And with regard to other defects of the Act you point to the charges for materials?—Yes.

4638. And for sewing?—These have sometimes been bad. One firm probably made a profit of one to two hundred pounds annually.

4639. You have known things supplied to the workpeople by their employers at a profit of from 14 to 75 per cent.?—Yes.

4640. With regard to the charge for cleaning, standing room, etc., you object to the whole of that system?—Yes.

4641. Then as to the charges for mess-rooms? These are in many cases provided by the employers?—Yes.

4642. Is that system satisfactory to the employers?—Yes.

4643. With regard to sick clubs and medical attendance, your suggestion is that they should be managed by a committee of the workpeople?—Yes.

4644. And that their accounts should be audited annually?—Yes.

4645. If that were done you think there would be no objection to a deduction on that account if the workers were free to join or not to join?—Yes. I should also make a proviso that the accounts should be open to examination by any of the inspectors.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4646. You said it was better for the workmen in those instances where fines have been abolished?—Decidedly.

4647. And for the employers?—Yes, it is a mutual benefit.

4648. In these cases you would not consider it a hardship if, instead of being brought about by a friendly understanding, the same end had been arrived at compulsorily?—Not in these cases.

Mr. T.O. Edwards.

4649. What difficulty do you see in the way of other firms securing the same success as these firms have secured?—The first would be difficulties on the part of the management. All managers are not alike and do not conduct their business in the same way. There must be differences of treatment between a Dorset factory girl and a Lancashire mill girl. Different methods of treatment may need to be available.

4650. So far, I think we may say that the inspectors have given us evidence of cases in their districts—and the lady inspectors have given us cases from their more peripatetic experience—of firms which have advantageously abolished the system of fining of their own free will?—Yes, there are many, and I believe that if the Home Office were to issue a suggestion to me that I should do all I could to abolish fines, I might be able to bring it about in a couple of years. If it is possible, I should be in favour of gradually abolishing fines; but I feel that the employers have to be studied, and I would not go so far as to say that I am in favour of their immediate total abolition.

4651. If you think the discipline is so much better without fines, why do you consider that compulsion ought not to be applied to secure that end? You would like to see it secured by voluntary means?—Yes, but in some cases it would be impossible.

4652. Why?—Take the case of a man or woman managing a factory who has not sufficient moral influence over the workpeople to make them conform to the regulations without coercion.

4653. Your view is that where there is good management one can do without fines, but not where there is bad management?—That is so.

4654. So that really to abstain from abolishing fines upon that account would be an equivalent to an admission that we must continue bad management?—You are bound in some places to have bad management. We can scarcely expect a state in which you would be free from that. Besides, I think fining is better for the workpeople as well as for the employers.

4655. Is it better that fines should be continued with a system of bad management, and is it an advantage to the workmen to have a deterrent which is not an effective deterrent? When you say it is an advantage to the workman not to be subject to dismissal or even to a caution, do not you think on reflection that it would be in his interest that his work should be improved by the more powerful deterrent?—No.

4656. Not in his own interest?—I think fining is a better deterrent than cautions for both workmen and employers.

4657. That is assuming that fining is effective?—It is effective.

4658. But if it has to be repeated over and over again, surely it cannot be effective?—Then it would lead to dismissal.

4659. I think the evidence we have had is that fining is not an effective deterrent as the fine and the offence are often repeated?—I am convinced of what I have said. It may differ from the evidence of others, but I am giving my own evidence.

4660. And I am giving you, as being useful for comparison, what others have said?—I am sorry if my evidence does not agree with them, but I cannot help it.

4661. In your experience have you found that if a workman is fined for an offence he does not commit that offence again?—Not necessarily, and it would give him another chance.

4662. Is a caution not giving him another chance?—You might fine him first and then caution him afterwards before dismissal. I have here a set of rules with no fines except for being late, but if that firm were to start dismissing people for every small breach they would be short of hands.

4663. How do those firms manage who have denied themselves the alternative of fines and confine themselves to cautions or dismissals? Do they find themselves left without hands?—No, I think not. But in some cases where ordinary fines have been abolished they have put in a proviso to the effect that a workman will be liable to a fine or deduction if he wilfully, negligently, or carelessly destroys or damages machinery, etc. That is put in more as a deterrent, and the employer has told me that he dared not dismiss the men because he wants more hands than he can get.

4664. In the earlier part of your evidence you gave us examples of firms who have abolished fines, and I think you said that the majority of the firms or the best firms did not fine?—I may have said that the majority of the good firms in one industry have either abolished fines or do not fine.

4665. Are they consequently short of hands?—No, because in that industry the management has moral influence over the workpeople, and there may also be a better understanding between employers and employed.

4666. That is where there are no fines?—Yes. And they provide mess-rooms and other facilities.

4667. I take it that, though you consider it better that there should not be fines, you would not like to see them completely abolished?—No. I think it would not be quite fair to some employers or to the workers to make it absolutely illegal to fine, but I would make the conditions very strict.

4668. Have you known any cases in which firms who had abandoned the system of fining have reverted to it?—No.

4669. In the cases where they abandoned fining did they only successfully carry on their work by changing the management?—I cannot say.

4670. You cannot say that they have not managed without fines under the same management which, in their opinion, previously made fines necessary; that is to say, the same manager has been able, so far as you know, to do without a system of fines who has previously relied upon them?—The same proprietors; I do not know whether there has been a change of management. Where I can get fines abolished I do so.

4671. You think that the system of fining is a greater deterrent on the commission of offences than dismissal?—A better deterrent; more humane and kind.

4672. More effective?—I should say more humane.

4673. Is a man less liable to repeat his offence if he is threatened with dismissal or is liable to be fined?—I think the fine might be a better preventive, as the threat of dismissal is often regarded as idle.

By Mr. Cawley.

4674. You would say, would you not, that threats not carried out do not tend to discipline?—Yes.

4675. Therefore, in your opinion, where a manager has not complete moral control, it is better for him to have some weapon he can use rather than to be repeating a threat which he does not carry out?—Yes.

4676. In other words, you consider that many managers have not much influence unless they have some weapon in their hand?—Yes.

4677. Whereas others have so much more influence that the workers are afraid of even their word?—Yes.

4678. And consequently they can do without fines, whereas other managers perhaps cannot do without some weapon in the shape of a fine?—Some men cannot do without a fine. I have an instance of a steam laundry in Bournemouth which has abolished fines, and some miles distant there is another laundry which has tried again and again to abolish them, but has found it impossible. I put that down to a difference in the strength of character of the two managements, and also to some difference perhaps in the character of the two sets of workpeople.

4679. Where do the fines go to?—In the case I have mentioned they are distributed among the workers at the end of the year as good conduct money.

4680. Do you know of any instances where the fines go into the employers' pocket?—Oh, yes, frequent cases.

4681. Would you be in favour of making it illegal for any fines to go direct into the employers' pocket?—Yes, except such fines as are really an equivalent of time lost. For instance, one firm, has a rule that a penny will be deducted from the wages of a worker for every lockout, but no deduction will be made if there is not more than one lockout in one week. A lockout means if they are five minutes late and come in within the half hour. The penny fine is really the equivalent of the value of their labour for that half hour. I do not think that that fine ought to go anywhere but back into the employers' pocket.

4682. Surely that cannot come to a great amount to the employer, even in a large factory ?—No, it is the principle I am thinking of.

4683. I rather gather that although you are in favour of fines in some cases as a deterrent, you are not altogether in favour of fines as a means of making up to the master for some loss he has suffered ?—I would except fines for being late. If it were provided that all fines should go into some compensation fund, the firm could then immediately change their rule, and say, "Instead of fining, we shall deduct the value of the time lost;" they would not call it a fine, and I question whether that would be truck, namely, deductions for actual time lost.

4684. Do not you think, in spite of the fact that in a few cases it would not be wrong for the fines to go into the masters' pocket, it would be well if the law were altered in order to provide that no fines whatever should, under any circumstances, go into the employers' pocket? —Yes, I will go as far as that; the master could easily re-arrange his rules.

4685. You mentioned a case of one-third of the hands of some factory being fined every week; what for, surely they were not all late ?—Yes, practically all of them were late. They were employed by a firm whom I prosecuted for truck. During the half year there were over £50 fines.

4686. Where did that money go ?—It went back into the employer's pocket.

4687. Does not that strike you as a rather suspicious circumstance, that a third of the workpeople were fined and that the fines all went to the employers ?—The fines were nominal—I satisfied myself on that point—and would not amount to the value of the time lost.

4688. You spoke of dressmakers earning only 2s. a week. Is that for a full week ?—Yes, and they have to keep and clothe themselves on that! In one instance I could name in the glove trade, a woman working full time, that is, ten hours per day, can only make one pair of gloves in a day, and for that she gets 5d.

4689. In the case where a third of the workers were fined for being late, was there anything exceptional in the circumstances of the works or of the workers?—No, it was an ordinary laundry. I spoke to the manager, who said, "We cannot get them in without fining."

4690. What class of girls were they ?—Ordinary working girls.

4691. With regard to the moral influence exercised by some managers and not by others, may we take it that the firms which are able to do without fines are on the whole the better class firms—the better established and in a larger way of business, who are able to get perhaps a better class of manager or workpeople ?—No, I won't say that; not necessarily.

4692. To what extent would that be so ?—To a certain extent. I prefer to take concrete cases, because my evidence can be backed by them in all instances.

4693. A man with strength of character makes a better manager, and can therefore probably command employment from better firms at a higher pay, whereas firms of less resources may have to put up with second-rate men with less strength of character or ability, and therefore less able to dispense with the pressure of fines ?—Yes, but you must take the whole surroundings; the class of work, the place, and the kind of workpeople, as well as a difference in the influence of different managers.

4694. Is a higher wage paid to the girls at the better managed of the two laundries which you mention by way of contrast ?—I think the rate of wage is about the same.

4695. Is the manager of one of them a better class man ? —They are both good men who know the trade.

4696. Do you think the distinction rather is that the same class of girl cannot be got for both places ?—Yes. There is a difference between the girls of a garrison town and, for instance, Bournemouth.

4697. You have not dealt with the question of deductions for damage to the work or material of the employers. Are we to understand that you have had no cases of abuse under that head ?—That is so. Sometimes in a laundry a girl may be fined a small amount for burning something which perhaps costs the management half a sovereign.

4698. You think that the powers already existing are sufficient to deal with that sort of thing ?—Yes, so far as my experience goes.

4699. You find no prevalence of abuse in that matter ? —Not in my district.

4700. Do you consider that there should be a power to deduct for damage to work ?—There ought to be something of that kind; the alternative is dismissal, and it is better for a workman to be penalised than to be thrown out of employment.

4701. Do you think that no charge ought to be made by the employers for mess room ?

By the Chairman.

4702. He said some of the best employers had abolished any charge for that ?—There are several cases where I have induced employers to provide good mess rooms. It is undoubtedly to their interest to supply mess rooms. I hope to see legislation on that point.

By Mr. Delevingne.

4703. As well as for the interest of the workers ?—Yes. One phase is the advantage of looking after the interests of the workpeople and another is the saving of time that might otherwise be lost. If a girl has to go some distance for her food, there is time lost; and moreover the mess rooms tend to better discipline. In some instances it is compulsory to supply a mess room, and I would not legalise any charge for the provision of anything which is a legal obligation.

4704. Do you mean cases under the special rules ? There cannot be a great many of these ?—There are a few in my district.

4705. You would not propose to make it illegal to levy a small charge for the use of a mess room ?—No.

4706. Provided the employer is not making a profit out of it, and provided he is not making workers pay for what they do not use, there could not be any serious grievance ?—I would make it more like an optional club.

NINETEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 31st October, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thos. Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
F. Cawley, Esq., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
F. Maddison, Esq., M.P.
Stephen Walsh, Esq., M.P.
A. F. Yarrow, Esq.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. RICHARD BELL, M.P., was called; and examined.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

31 Oct. 1906.

By the Chairman.

4707. I should like you, Mr. Bell, to state to the Committee in the first place your experience as a practical worker and a representative of the workers. You are, as we all know, a Member of Parliament ?—Yes.

4708. Your own business which you learnt from youth was what ?—Railway work in various grades.

4709. You were engaged in that for many years as a practical hand ?—Close upon seventeen.

4710. As a representative of that class of labour you have been a member of certain unions, have you ?—No, I have been simply with the same union since 1878 and an officer of it since 1893.

4711. Just tell us what the union is ?—The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, which embraces all classes of men employed on the railways excepting those employed in what we term the shops—the plant men.

4712. Does the railway servants' amalgamation cover the United Kingdom ?—Yes.

4713. What, roughly speaking, is the general membership of it ?—We have, speaking roughly, about 620 branches in the United Kingdom and about 65,000 members.

4714. In your capacity as representing it you have had to visit various parts of the kingdom I presume ?—I have been to all parts of it.

4715. In the evidence you are about to give I presume we may take it that, speaking generally, you represent the views of the class of labour in question ?—I feel sure I do.

4716. With reference to the question of fines and deductions by railway companies, you know the system that is in force ?—I do.

4717. In the railway companies in the United Kingdom there is a system of fining prevailing under the existing law ?—Yes, a very bad one, I think.

4718. Would you just describe it to us ?—The system they have of fining, I believe, applies to nearly every railway company perhaps, with not more than two exceptions, particularly the London and North Western for one. For a number of years now, perhaps five or six or seven years, the London and North Western have abolished the system of fining, and have adopted a system of suspension, which in practice is more severe really than the fines themselves, and I think the punishment, if we may regard it as such and if we accept the principle at all, is at most times far in excess of what would be justified by the frivolous offences committed.

4719. Of course the exception that you have named, that of the London and North Western Railway, although it is one instance, it is a very large instance ?—It is a very large instance, yes ; it is a big company.

4720. What is the other instance in your mind ?—The Midland is adopting that principle during the last year or two, more than they have been accustomed to do. Of course I ought to say at this stage that there has always been a system of suspension with all railway companies under certain conditions, such as a serious accident resulting perhaps in tremendous loss or damage to property, or in other instances perhaps injury to life or to limb, and pending inquiries into such accidents then they suspend the men concerned until they have held the inquiry. Against that we have not so much protested, and we are not protesting very much against that now. This may be perhaps pressed too far in some instances, but if it was only that class of instances that existed I do not know that we should complain very much about that.

4721. I may take it from you that even where fines have prevailed they have never prevailed in the sense of dispossessing the companies or the masters of their right to dismiss on sufficiently grave cause ?—Absolutely not.

4722. You might just describe now the system of fines. Take a man of any wage you like to name and start with that. What figure would you prefer to take ?—It is immaterial, so far as I know, what figure you take. Perhaps a shunter with his £1 a week will be fined just as much as or more proportionately than a man getting his 7s. a day. For a similar class of offence to impose a fine of say 2s. 6d. upon a man with 18s. or a £1 a week is far more severe than upon a man getting his £2 or £2 5s. a week.

4723. Quite so. Then the fine for the particular offence is a fine fixing a sum not in proportion to the wage but an actual sum fixed and laid down ?—That is so.

4724. Have you any schedule or scale which you could lay before the Committee ?—I am afraid I cannot supply the Committee with anything of that kind ; I have failed to obtain it myself. I have a few instances here which are very typical and which I got from one man, a driver, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

4725. When a man goes into the employment of the railway what is the nature of the contract ? He has a written bargain, has he not ?—The written bargain would be a book very nearly as big as this one in front of you here—the book of rules. A man is given an hour or two in a waiting room or somewhere else with this book of rules, and he is supposed to read that thoroughly through, throughly understand every sentence of it, and come back and declare that he has read the book, that he is familiar with it, and that he agrees to all the conditions contained therein.

4726. Does the book of rules contain stipulations with regard to the fines ?—The stipulation which they generally have is this—I ought to say there is one stipulation leading up to it that the man must reside at a place convenient to the company's requirements. Then another rule goes on to say that the company reserve the right to punish by fines, suspensions, or dismissals and to withhold any moneys due and so on. It is a long rule and it is difficult to get a copy of the rules, because every man has to sign for the book, and we only borrow them occasionally to have a look at the thing. As I say it is difficult to get a copy of the rules, but there is a rule to the effect that I have just stated.

4727. What the Committee is anxious to know is whether there is any schedule or list which is laid before the employé which he can refer to so as to check the amount that is to be deducted from him by way of fine ?—No, I may venture to say that there is no such general list or schedule supplied to the men.

4728. If there is no such list, is the fixing of the fine for the particular offence left to the caprice or to the will of the employer ?—That is so.

4729. So that the worker is earning his living under the condition that he is not able to forecast, even though he knew what he had done during the week, what would be the amount deducted from him for fines at the week's end ?—That is so.

4730. Do you happen to know whether in the archives of the company there is any such list ?—I do not know ; I am unable to state that. They would not tell me, and if I spoke my own feeling in the matter I should say I do not think there is such a general thing.

4731. Who would be the officer who would take stock, so to speak, of the delinquency and make the assessment ; would it be a clerk ?—That would vary with the different companies, according to the methods they have of management. One company may say that the superintendent of the line is the person to inflict the fine, upon reports which he may receive from subordinate officials. Another company give more authority to subordinate officials and we get what we may call a local foreman over, say, a locomotive shed and they give him authority to fine the men.

4732. So that in the absence of anything like a general standard rate you are forced of course to fall back upon the instances that you have been good enough to give us ? —That is so.

4733. I have been trying to lead up, as it were, to the general instances that you propose to put before us ?—Quite so.

4734. Now we will be glad to hear them ?—I have one instance here of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company. This is how a man there has been fined on numerous occasions. It may or may not perhaps go to suggest that the man was not as careful as he ought to be, and so on, but that is by the way. But in my opinion some of these fines are far in excess of the offences, as for instance in this little slip here handed to the man by the Lancashire and Yorkshire at Leeds, as follows :

4735. What is the date of it ?—This is the 15th of November, 1904, the first one in my hand, but there are others later than that. It states "So and So, a driver, stationed at Accrington. You have been fined the sum of 3s. 6d. for causing wagons to get buffer locked at Accrington from the 7th to the 10th November, 1904, under Clause 5 notice, dated October, 1899, which sum has been deducted from the wages herewith paid to you." That is signed in the name of the chief mechanical engineer, but initialled by somebody else. Very likely some subordinate officer has had the authority given to him.

4736. Is that a deduction from a week's wage ?—That would be a deduction from a week's wage.

4737. What was the amount of the wage ?—I do not know what hours he would work, but the normal wage for this individual would be about £2 2s. a week.

4738. Have you any other instances to put before us ?—I have several of the same kind with regard to the same man. I do not know whether you wish to have them mentioned ?

4739. Is there any speciality as to sums, or anything like that ?—Yes. The next one is fined 2s. 6d., and the date is the 31st October, 1905.

4740. What was the evidence there ?—Causing slight damage to buffer. Then there is another one on March 28th, 1899. I may say that this fellow has been very careful in saving up these things ; it is not everyone who would have been so careful in saving them up. He is fined 1s. for allowing the oil cup of engine No. 25, to get lost. In running, his oil cup might get loose, and he would lose it, and yet he is fined 1s. for that. I do not know really whether they expect the man to be screwed on to the engine in order to look after these sort of things and see that they do not work loose and get lost. Then on November 21st, 1899, there is a fine of 2s. 6d., "for causing brake van to leave the rails at Burnley," and on 14th January, 1902, a fine of 1s. "for not sending in your report for December 22nd in due course." Then on October 31st, 1899, he was fined 5s. "for inattention to signals at Nelson." That may be a more serious offence, but inattention is a very vague word here, and it is not to be taken for granted that it was something very serious. Then on the 1st of April, 1900—a rather significant date—he was fined 1s., "for losing the big end oil cup," and on the 11th Deember, 1900, he was fined 2s. 6d. "for causing van to leave rails at Accrington." Those instances are very typical of how the Lancashire and Yorkshire, at any rate, treat their men.

4741. I am going through your statement. Those are instances affecting one man, I understand ?—Yes.

4742. You are able to give us those instances because of the fact that the man has kept his tickets, and you have been able to obtain them from him ?—That is so, but it is very likely that he is only one in a thousand, because the majority of the men would tear them up in disgust, probably.

4743. Have you any other instances ?—Yes, I am just sorting them out. I take now the Midland. I have got the Midland particulars from St. Pancras. A man was fined 2s. 6d., "for omitting to sign off duty." The man coming in with his train might have done that deliberately, or otherwise, but it is not a very serious offence. Anyhow, he omitted to sign off duty, and he was fined. I have here not the original, but a copy of the form which I can put in if you like. It is supplied by the Company, and it reads as follows—"Midland Railway Company, Locomotive Superintendant's Office, Derby. April 25th, 1906." The man was a driver, stationed at Kentish Town, and he is "hereby notified that a fine of 2s. 6d. will be deducted from his wages for week ending April 26th, 1906, for neglecting to sign off duty April 10th, 1906." That is signed, "pro Mr. Deeley," the chief mechanical engineer, but inflicted of course by some local person whose initials are attached, "G. J. P.," whoever that may represent.

4744. We will ask you to put in all those documents in a bundle ?—Certainly.

4745. That you say was on the Midland system ?—That was on the Midland system. Another instance from the Midland is this ; it is a complaint from Staveley where a man had been fined 2s. 6d. for omitting to sign for some order or instructions which come into operation on certain days. It is a customary thing for railway companies to put out what one may call weekly notices. Some of them are posted up in some of the stations, and in other instances a notice is given to each individual and for which they are asked to sign. They are expected to sign for them whether they simply hang it up in a case provided for the purpose, or have one supplied to them. In this instance the man was going off duty at two o'clock in the morning, and did not bother to trouble about this notice. He thought it would be time enough to look at those things when he came on next day. But because he did not sign for those notices which came out on the particular day that he went on duty—that is the day previous to his signing off of course so far as dates are concerned—because he omitted to sign for it he is fined 2s. 6d.

4746. Have you any other instance ?—Yes, I have here the London and North Western. That is the company which I referred to just now which has practically, if not wholly abolished the system of fining, and has adopted the system of suspension. These are in my opinion most unreasonable in the majority of instances But, however, here is an illustration from one station alone—that at Stockport. Three brakesmen, for an error made on the driver's ticket—and to explain this I should say that the guards and the drivers each have to make what the men call a ticket, a return of the working for the day, showing all the detentions in running and all the particulars of the day's work with the train. On some railways the driver has to make out his own ticket, but in nineteen cases out of twenty, the driver on the foot plate with his dirty hands and so on, invariably asks the guard to make it out for him, and I venture to say nineteen men out of twenty get this ticket made out for them by the guard or brakesmen, as the North Western call them, and there may be some difference. The signalman times the train arriving at a certain depot, times the train away, enters down in the book there how long shunting, and various other reasons why they are there a certain time, and the guard makes out a similar one. It invariably happens that the guard and the signalman's time do not happen to be exactly the same. They do not consult one another. The signalman may look at the clock and find that the train arrives at 12.3. The guard's watch may not show the same time as the signalman's, but even if it did, he may take it out a minute or two before or after, and put it down as 12.5, and not bother about the odd minutes. In the instance in question these three brakesmen made a mistake in the driver's ticket. In making out this ticket the brakesman shows the time of arrival at a certain station ; how long the shunting occupies ; how long they are stationary, and time of departure. All three cases were for not having accounted for all the time at the stations. For example, in one case the ticket showed it arrived at 9.50, shunting five minutes, stationary five minutes, departure 10.3. The times of arrival and departure are correct, but you will see there are three minutes unaccounted for. For this these three men were suspended one day. The total amount would just depend on what was the day's wages. The wages of these men vary, one may get 25s., another 28s., and another 30s. I have not gone into the particulars of that, but it would be a day's wage, and for this class of man it would be a wage varying between 25s. and 30s. a week.

4747. Before you pass from that, can you tell me whether when a day's wages is deducted the men work there that day or not ?—No, they pay them off ; they dismiss them for that day or week as the case may be.

4748. They are told to come back in twenty-four hours or a week or whatever it may be ?—Yes.

4749. That is how it works out ?—Yes. I have given you those three instances, but there were eighteen cases in all of that same kind at that one station.

4750. Within what time ?—During that particular month. This is July last when I had this statement sent to me.

4751. Have you any other instances ?—The other instances are put in along with these, but I will mention them. This one here shows the fashion in which the North Western each week hang up a list at stations.

4752. You mean a list of the delinquents ?—Yes, and the summary of this list is that twenty-seven men were suspended sixty-three days.

4753. What year would that apply to ?—This would be for the week ending March 2nd, 1905.

By Mr. Cawley.

4754. That is for one week then ?—Yes, I suppose that would be for one week.

By the Chairman.

4755. Out of how many men would that twenty-seven be ?—I suppose this would be practically for the whole of the system for this one particular class. This would be for all the engine-drivers and firemen—that one department.

4756. Running up to some hundreds, I suppose ?—Yes, thousands ; at least I should say it would represent five or six thousand men. Of course the particulars are set out here, and really looking at these particulars as well as the others the particular causes of the offence is where the real grievance comes in. For instance smoke nuisances are about as frequent as anything, and the punishment is pretty high for those nuisances. I do not suppose for a moment that an engine driver would deliberately make smoke, but he has to burn coal as to which he has no voice in the selection. The company buys the coal which suits them best financially I suppose by getting the cheapest quality and they do not trouble about the result of the burning of it. The thing is that the men have to keep up steam and keep along the road, never mind how they can manage to burn this coal.

4757. Yes, but what we would like from you about that if you can conveniently give it us is if you would run your eye down that list and state to us whether in your judgment the suspensions are in excess of the offence ?—I certainly think so. Here is another list here for Crewe, April 20th, 1905. Twenty-three men were suspended for thirteen days. Two of these instances were where men were suspended one day each for allowing their engines to blow off. Even a man in the street knows that a driver cannot at all times avoid his engine blowing off steam He has to keep his steam up to the standard to be ready at any moment to take its train both at speed and load, and just because for a moment or two he blows off steam and some officious individual is near by, he is reported and he is suspended one day. In this instance just now there are two men who have been suspended a day each for blowing off steam, and two men who have been suspended for emitting smoke. Those are two prominent features about a locomotive, the steam and the smoke, and for showing a bit of smoke and emitting a bit of steam, the men are suspended a day. If on the other hand they were called upon to do some work, and the man had his steam a bit low, or his fire was a bit low, then he might be suspended for not having sufficient steam up. There is another sheet here for May 18th, 1905. In this instance thirty-nine men were suspended fifty-nine days and ten of those were for smoke nuisances.

4758. The penalty being one day ?—Yes, it invariably is one day for the smoke nuisance. It is very strange that all the smoke nuisance cases seem to be round Wigan and Eccles and that way, which seems to show that they must have very bad coal up there.

By Mr. Stephen Walsh.

4759. The thirty-nine men and the fifty-nine days would include cases where one man had been suspended more than once ?—No, these were all different men.

4760. Therefore they must have been stopped for more than one day in some cases ; at least in twenty instances ? —Yes. I was just referring to the one day each for the smoke nuisance. There are some here suspended for six days. For missing his train one man is suspended six days, and another man for passing a signal at danger at Whitchurch, three days.

By the Chairman.

4761. Does that exhaust your sheet ?—No ; I am just giving you the summary of what you asked me about, of these what I may call frivolous cases —the smoke nuisance, for instance, which is out of all proportion. There are others here and of course we do not know the degree—whether the thing was a serious offence or not. For instance, there is a man suspended here three days for passing signal at danger at Whitchurch. Here it is vague. If a man passes a signal with his train on the main line it is no doubt a serious thing, but it may be, as invariably is the case, that he may pass simply a little shunting signal in the yard where really there was practically no danger attached to it. I am unable to form an opinion from the statement here whether the thing is serious or not. Here is another one suspended six days for disregarding a flagman's signal and causing damage to a painter's trestle at Smethwick. He was suspended six days. Another man, missing his train, six days ; absent without leave, two days.

By Mr. Stephen Walsh.

4762. What would you take to be the meaning of " missing his train " ; it is rather a technical expression ? —He may have been due out at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning and may have been knocked up by the caller or his wife, or whatever arrangement is made for calling him—sometimes they provide a call boy and sometimes the boy goes two hours before the man goes on duty and the man thinks he can have another hour's sleep and he goes to sleep again and misses his train.

By the Chairman.

4763. We will put other questions to you about this, but meanwhile I am rather anxious to get on the notes the cases where you think the punishment is in excess of the delinquency ?—Dropping lead plugs is one ; that seems to be rather a systematic thing, and for the offence that is a three days' penalty.

4764. What does that mean ?—There is a lead plug in all fire boxes at a certain point and if the water gets below that the plug melts and prevents any explosion and the water and steam from the boiler put the fire out. But that is not always the cause of a lead plug dropping.

By Mr. Stephen Walsh.

4765. Fusible plugs, they call them, do they not ? —Yes. In this sheet I have a number of instances of lead plugs being dropped and in each instance it is three days. That seems to be a kind of standard punishment for dropping lead plugs, but it has been proved in more instances than one that I have personally investigated and got expert engineers to go into the thing, that the lead plug does not always drop for the want of sufficient water. There have been instances proved, and I think that the late Superintendent of the Locomotive Department of the North Western, the late Mr. Webb, also has made a statement that lead plugs drop for various reasons. It depends largely on the kind of water you use. Sometimes the water has a good deal of matter in it that corrodes round these plugs, and therefore the lead that comes nearest the fire inside the fire box gets melted because there is so much ; it would not be rust of course inside but other material that is in the water that causes it to get so thin that in some cases there is simply only a scale left and an end comes to that and it bursts out. The companies never stop to inquire into it or to investigate the thing. They simply say there is the fact that the plug has dropped, and therefore you did not have sufficient water, and the men have no opportunity of explanation or defence at all.

By the Chairman.

4766. You have given us instances with regard to the London and North Western, the Midland, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Companies ?—Yes, and I think they may be regarded as typical of most of the other companies.

4767. I think you gave us a case where there were a good number of tickets which had been kept and which were furnished to you ?—Yes, that is so.

4768. What I would like to ask you is this. Do you think that case where you have been fortunate in getting the tickets is an exceptionally bad case, or a fairly representative case ?—No ; I have no reason to think that that case is an exceptional one at all. I think you would find a very large number of the same kind of thing if the men had only taken the care that this man has to preserve the tickets. He has kept a record of every transaction connected with himself during the whole time that he has been in the service.

4769. Would you now be good enough to look at your proof. I gather from you that in your opinion the rate of fines for minor offences is defective in this respect, even if it was strictly legal, that the workman is not fully aware of what the penalty is to be in amount ?—That is so.

4770. And secondly it is defective in this way, that so far as you know the railway companies themselves have not a fixed amount except at the will of the superintending officer, whoever that official may be for the time ?—I believe that to be the case excepting in some particular instances they may have.

4771. The result, of course, in such circumstances is that the workman is absolutely at the mercy of the figure fixed by this official ?—Yes.

4772. His only remedy in those circumstances being that he must either accept that situation or leave his employment ?—Yes, that is right.

4773. Similarly where fines have disappeared and given way to the system of suspension or dismissal the same thing holds, that is to say, that the workman does not—or does the workman in that case know—what is to be the penalty ? He does, does he not, by reason of that sheet ?—No, because the penalty has been paid before those sheets are published.

4774. Yes, I see ?—The penalty has been paid and this is a kind of record like the railway companies put up at some of the stations that so-and-so was caught travelling without a ticket and fined 40s. and costs or whatever it may be. It is one of those instances of adding insult to injury, so to speak.

4775. You give the instance of a porter on the North Eastern Railway at Hull ?—Yes, but I have not the particulars of that here more than there are in my proof of evidence.

4776. Just state to us what happened there. What you say is that "he threw an envelope of invoices into an empty cask inside a wagon instead of attaching it outside" ?—Yes, and this particular cask was a part of the consignment of the wagon.

4777. That was construed as an offence and he was fined 2s. 6d. out of a wage of 22s. per week ?—Yes.

31 Oct. 1906.

4779. You gave an instance of a man neglecting to sign for the notices. That was at Normanton ?—Yes.

4780. You give instances here as to Wigan ?—Yes.

4781. That is on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway ?—Yes.

4782. The total number of cases in which fines were inflicted during the ten weeks ending May 18th, 1905, amounted to ninety-five ?—Yes.

4783. And the total amount of fines came to £13 5s. 3d. ?—That is right.

4784. What do you conclude from that figure ?—That like those instances of the North Western that I mentioned they were really in excess of any offence that may have been committed. For instance, in one case here seven cleaners are fined 2s. 6d. each and one cleaner 5s. This is for the week ending March 16th, 1905.

4785. What had they been doing ?—I have not got the particulars of what they had been doing here, but what I desire to point out is that a cleaner's wage is only from 15s. to 16s. although in some instances he may get as high as 18s. a week. But out of those wages to be fined 2s. 6d. and one of them 5s. is a very excessive fine in any case.

4786. I wish to ask you specially about the proportion that those cases at Wigan bear to the number of men employed. The depôt at Wigan has 230 men and boys employed there ?—Yes—I was going to say about 250.

4787. It is out of that number that in ten weeks there were ninety-five cases ?—Yes.

4788. The point I wanted to get from you is, are you quite sure of that figure, because there seem to have been in ten weeks ninety-five employés fined out of 230 ?—Yes.*

4789. You observe that is about three-eighths of the whole staff ?—Yes.

4790. Some of these might have been double cases, might they not ?—Yes, it is true that some of them might have been double cases. I have not got the names of them here as I have with regard to the North Western lot.

4791. With regard to the suspensions, is it the case that eighteen men were suspended at Wigan for an aggregate of ninety-eight days ?—Yes, that is so.

4792. Does your evidence again agree in that particular that you think that the punishment was out of all proportion to the actual gravity of the offence ?—Yes, it does.

4793. You will hand in the list of the suspension cases that you refer to ?—Yes.

4794. Then with regard to damage to the engine, in your opinion is damage to the engine sometimes caused by the defective condition of the engine prior to taking it out of the shed ?—That is so. There is a material difference now in the method of working railways from what it used to be during the time I was in the service. Then every man had his own engine and took much pride in it—more perhaps than some of them took in their own wives—but now there is a kind of a scarcity of engines. I suppose that is part of the economic changes, but the companies now keep fewer engines and keep them always working and one man if he gets an engine on a Monday, once he takes it back to the shed may not see it again that week Therefore men have to work on engines that they perhaps have not worked on before and may not have an opportunity of working on again for a whole week and so they cannot get to find out every little defect. Again, the engines are not cleaned now like they used to be. A locomotive some years ago was a pleasure to look at, well shined and polished and quite bright, but now you can hardly see any brass on an engine, and most of the companies adopt dark colours for painting them, particularly black, and black does not show up so well as the green

* See, however, Questions 9768–9769. This was a mistake.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

used to do, and those engines are not in the condition that they ought to be for the men to observe in the short time at their disposal the many little defects there are.

4795. The next thing I want to ask you about is the procedure adopted in a case of suspension. You have it on page 3 of your proof of evidence. You give an instance of a man at Northampton who was suspended for seven days in connection with a collision?—Yes. Happily this contract applies only to the North Western. It is bad enough to apply even to only one company.

4796. Before a man is allowed to resume work he has to sign a form?—Yes, a copy of which I have inserted in my proof of evidence.

4797. Will you just read that form?—"I do this day of agree to forego all claim, if any, from the London and North Western Railway Company for wages during the time I have been suspended from my duty for from to on condition that I may be allowed to resume work." That is a tyranny of the extreme kind.

4798. Just explain that?—It is in this way. Something has happened in connection with the man's working and some subordinate official, we will say, has suspended the driver in this instance for seven days pending inquiry. He may be suspended seven days or fourteen days or a month just at the convenience of the officials in working the inquiry. When the inquiry has been held by the officials with or without the presence of the individual who has been suspended (and as frequently without as with) the companies come to their conclusions upon the reports made by those holding the inquiry and they may or may not find that this person was responsible or was guilty of some negligence, and even assuming that he was not guilty he has got to sign this form because he has been suspended, and to put the case that he was not guilty of any negligence, and therefore should not have been punished in connection with it, yet he has to sign this, and although he may have been suspended fourteen days pending this inquiry——

4799. Erroneously?—Erroneously—he signs this, and he is not paid for the time that he has been suspended. This man in this particular instance made a very bold fight; it is very seldom you can get a man on the North Western to stand up for his rights as this man did, and he positively refused to sign the thing for nine or ten days. He felt he was innocent of the cause, but he was bound to sign it eventually. He asked me finally, "What shall I do under the circumstances?" I saw that the man's job, 7s. a day, was not to be picked up everywhere, and although it was a hardship that he had to sign a thing of this kind and forfeit all the time he had not worked in addition to the nine or ten days that he was negotiating after the verdict, if you like to call it so—he had to lose all that time in order to be allowed to resume work.

4800. On most of the railways the signalmen receive a bonus for good conduct, do they not?—Yes.

4801. That is usually paid half-yearly?—Yes.

4802. If the signalman is fined above a certain amount or suspended does he lose the whole bonus?—That is so.

4803. For the half year?—Yes. They vary. Supposing the man had had his bonus last month and something happened early this month, and therefore there were only two or three weeks gone, in that instance they would very likely fine him to such an extent as to say he should lose his bonus for the current half year. If, for instance, his bonus was due next month—just a month to run—they might in that instance suspend it for five months and he would lose five months instead of six. It usually works out to the greater advantage of the company.

4804. Can you tell us before we pass from that point, is the bonus considered a substantial element in the man's remuneration?—It is considered in two ways. If the men apply for an advance in wages the railway company say, "Your wages are not so bad; it is so many shillings a week and so much bonus equal to so many shillings a week, and your uniform which is equal to so many shillings a week more." That is the reply that is given by the companies in response to an application for an advance of wages. But if on the other hand it is for the convenience of the company, then the bonus is not considered as part of his wages; they say, "That is simply something we give you for good conduct." So that the companies always use the thing in two ways, whichever is most convenient to them. If the men claim an advance in wages then the bonus is wages, and "Therefore your wages are so much a week and not what you contemplate," and if the men claim it as wages they say, "It is not wages at all; it is simply a premium we give you for good conduct."

4805. Take a case, if there is such a case before you, of men from two companies, one which of has the bonus system and one which has not?—I think the majority of our big railways have the bonus system. Perhaps some of the smaller companies have not got it—the North Eastern, for instance, have not got it, but that is the only large company that has not got the bonus system.

4806. There is a Stoke-on-Trent case mentioned here. I should like you to refer to that?—Yes, that is a very glaring case.

4807. Tell us the facts about it?—The facts are that once a year they have been in the habit of deducting a day's wages or a day's pay from the men's wages towards the local infirmary.

4808. The North Staffordshire Infirmary, that is?—Yes, and there were some objections raised to it by some of the men a short while ago, and they objected for two reasons. The man who raised the objection first was a fireman only receiving 3s. 6d. a day, and was married and had a wife and one or two children to maintain, and he could not afford to pay 3s. 6d. towards the infirmary out of his earnings, but he had no choice, because it was deducted. Then he took it up with the officials and endeavoured to get the money refunded to him, but he was informed that thirty years ago it was agreed then that the company should deduct a day's pay from the men's wages towards the infirmary, and they had followed out that practice I suppose ever since, and although the new men who came in of course knew that the thing was not binding in any way and was a kind of voluntary thing, they followed up the practice. The difficulty is you cannot get men to protest against these things.

4809. I see you have a reference to Clause 3 of the Truck Act. You say, "It may be asked why is not advantage taken of Clause 3 of the Truck Act in those cases where a man considers the fine excessive or the deduction illegal"?—Yes. I have said it to ever so many, but the difficulty is to get men who would be prepared to take action, because it would be a certainty that as soon as they took action under Clause 3 so certainly would their period in the company's employ be at an end. Therefore of two evils they had chosen the least, and they would rather put up with it and press for other means of putting an end to these practices than avail themselves of the law to obtain what they think is reasonable and just to themselves, but at the same time sacrifice their employment.

4810. There is another point you wish to mention, namely, about the benefit societies. You might explain that?—Yes. Most of the companies, particularly the larger companies, because the smaller companies do not adopt the system very much, have a system of having friendly societies attached to the employment, and it is compulsory upon all those seeking employment with the companies to become members of those societies. It is not a question of choice, and I have since I have been in the House protested on every railway Bill that has come in where they had this compulsory membership of these societies, and I shall always continue to do so, to prevent the railway companies having such things attached to them.

4811. Would you just explain in a word the real hardship. Of course it occurs in the case of dismissal?—Yes, the hardship comes in in more ways than one, but I will take my own case if you like. When I entered the service of the Great Western Railway I was a member of the Foresters and of the Oddfellows Societies, so that I was already well provided with a friendly society. My wages were only 16s. a week, and I had to pay 6s. entrance fee to get into the Great Western compulsory societies. The contributions to those societies was 11d. a week out of my 16s., and I could not afford to keep up the Oddfellows and Foresters, and in order to gain employment I had to forfeit my Oddfellows and Foresters, of both of which I was a free member, in order to enable me to join the others—not to enable me, because I could not very well afford the 11d. a week out of the 16s., and the 6s. entrance fee, but I did. However, I was in the employment of that company for seventeen years. When I left I got a certain percentage of my contributions to one of the societies. One was optional; I could remain a member by paying higher contributions or else I could leave it, but with regard to the other one there was no option at all; all the money subscribed was forfeited. So that when I left the service I was obliged to leave one of these societies; the other one was optional by paying a higher contribution: I got, as I say, a certain percentage of my contributions back from one and nothing from the other. The very same societies have since then, owing to the narrowness, if you like, of the field from which they can recruit their members and the increase in the demands for benefits by accidents and so on, more or less of a permanent character, had to increase the amount of the contributions and the contributions to those same societies now amount to 1s. 3d. a week—from 11d. at the time I was in the service to 1s. 3d. now—and they are on the poverty line even now, and they will always have to continue increasing it. That is one hardship. The compulsory society compels a man to give up other societies in order to join them. Secondly, whether he leaves by his own will to better his position or whether he is dismissed he is obliged to forfeit the whole of his contributions. They are therefore objectionable on those two grounds.

4812. You mention among the prominent societies two societies connected with the London and North Western Railway—the Provident and Pension, and the Insurance Society?—Yes.

4813. You say a man may have been compelled to contribute to those societies for years and then be subject to forfeiture at the end?—Yes, that is right.

4814. Then you refer to the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Pension Fund. That is a voluntary one, is not it?—Yes, it is a voluntary one, but it is a peculiar way of being voluntary. It is the official influence getting round the men.

4815. The management I think you indicate are continually circularising the men?—That is so. There was a circular issued on May 31st last which concludes with the following paragraph: "If the form be not returned within one month from this date it will be assumed that you have decided not to join the fund, and a record of that fact will be made accordingly against your name." Is that not intimidation? The men regard it anyhow as intimidation.

4816. And they feel constrained to join accordingly?—A man when he gets a circular of that kind with a conclusion of that kind thinks, "Well, with a record against my name there is no chance for me to get promotion and there is no chance for anything else if I do not join," and he joins.

4817. Arising out of your statement, there are one or two things I would like to put to you?—Have you finished with the friendly societies? I should like to add a little in connection with them, and that is that the London and North Western since I sent in my proof of evidence have increased the contributions to their society by 1d. per week from the first week of June in this year. Again, they are now issuing a circular to all their staff to ascertain what societies the men belong to, what benefits they get from them and other information of that sort. The workmen very much resent this inquisition on the part of the employers and they do so for various reasons. Some of the men think the employers want to know what trade societies they belong to or whether the majority of the men are well provided for in friendly societies outside of the works, which might enable them to reduce the benefits from the company's societies, upon which I understand there was a loss of £5,000 last year, and in order to meet that the company has increased the contributions.

4818. In the case of these company's societies is there a contribution made by the employers?—There is almost invariably, but insufficient to meet the case. I hold very strongly that if an employer makes it a condition of employment that his workmen shall become members of friendly societies attached to the employment he should be responsible for the sound financial position of such societies.

4819. Of course you agree that in railway work it is of the highest importance that discipline should be maintained?—Yes, I do.

4820. I gather that as a general principle you are against the system of fines?—Yes, I am.

4821. And do you think that in all cases an effort should be made to substitute some other disciplinary method?—Yes, and I do not think that should be very difficult.

4822. Are you against the system of suspensions?—Yes, for the same reason that I am against fines. I should qualify that by saying that in the case of a serious accident—not so serious as the one at Grantham but anything approaching it—where several men are concerned and it is not clear which is to blame I would not quarrel with suspending several of them for a couple of days or so, pending inquiry. If that was done honourably, and if the men suspended are paid for the time they were suspended in the event of it being found that they were not to blame; but such cases would be quite exceptional.

4823. You see the case is one of employers managing a business in which discipline, as you agree, is especially necessary, and they adopt first the system of fines and then a substitution for fines in the form of temporary suspension. I understand you think that there is a better way?—Yes.

4824. We should be glad if you would give us your assistance in that matter by explaining your views and suggestions?—My idea of maintaining discipline in the railway service would be that instead of fining men or suspending them and giving subordinate officials power to punish the workmen in that way I would adopt a system of rewards and encouragements to those who do well. It is absolutely useless for a workman to appeal against the penalties now imposed because usually he cannot get a fair hearing and the matter is decided by officials who make an enquiry, send in a report, and have the penalty fixed whether it be a fine or a suspension. My method would be a system of rewards rather than of punishments; give favourable marks to a man who steers clear of complaints for a stated period, somewhat in the way that marks for good conduct are given in schools. I see no reason why that should not be done. If a man goes through a specified period, say six months, twelve months or longer, and all the time steers clear of complaint, I would give him a certain number of marks which might accumulate until in course of time they represented a certain moderate amount in money.

4825. What occurs to one's mind is that as compared with the present system the result of your plan would, in effect be almost the same, and would be as broad as it is long?—I think not.

4826. A workman would either get his full wages plus the reward, or his wages and the reward minus certain deductions. Would not that work out just the same as a fine?—I do not think so. I would not make the system work like the bonus which has been mentioned as given to signalmen. The marks might run on for a long period, say three years or perhaps even five years, at the end of which period if a man had succeeded in obtaining and keeping so many marks he would get a reward of £2 or a similar sum. You may be sure that no man on a railway is going to deliberately throw a truck off the road whether you have a system of fines or of rewards, because the trouble of getting it on the road again is a sufficient punishment to any such man. Railway servants do not commit offences for the sake of committing them.

4827. In order to elucidate this point, because it is well worth considering, let me put the case of a man with a good record of that kind and with £5 due to him as a reward after three years of favourable marks; even under that system he would be open to be deprived of his advantage at the caprice or will of his superiors just as you say is now the case. The man himself is of opinion that he has not committed any except the most trivial offence; yet there may be marks put against his name that would tend to deprive him in some measure of his bonus?—I am afraid we cannot altogether avoid that, any more than a school teacher can be prevented from sometimes giving a boy a mark more or less than he is entitled to. There is no one to prevent him doing so, and the remark may apply also to the railway service. What would be gained by it would be the abolition of present penalties upon men with small wages for flimsy offences such as blowing off steam for a moment whilst the fireman puts on a shovel-full of coal or for emitting a little smoke. Instead of being fined or losing wages by suspension a man who commits minor offences would only be deprived under my system of a certain number of marks which might reduce his total at the end of the three years and so postpone the anticipated reward, but the reward would only be postponed until the time came when he had his full complement of marks.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

4828. Of course there is one manifest advantage in your suggestion, that, at all events, unless in serious cases where a man has to be actually dismissed, the workmen in all ordinary cases would know that their wages are sure?—Yes.

4829. And their employment sure?—Yes. My proposal would make no difference to the man whose actions merit dismissal. If the officials thought his offence sufficiently serious they could dismiss him just as they do under the present system.

4830. Assuming the Committee not to see their way past allowing fines in some circumstances I suppose you would agree that at all events it is better if both parties know where they stand?—Yes, certainly.

4831. You would, of course, apply the same principle to the case even of dismissals in lieu of fines; that is, it should be part of a plain contract known to both parties that certain acts would be followed by certain definite results?—Yes, I think that might be well. At the same time, speaking from a large experience both in the railway service and out of it, I am afraid if you insisted upon a notice being posted up in particular places setting forth the offences for which men would be subject to penalties of dismissal, the railway companies might take a minimum offence with a maximum penalty, and announce perhaps, that for emitting smoke from his engine a driver may be liable to instant dismissal. Whatever may be my opinion about officialism, and it is not a very high one, I would prefer leaving the extreme penalty to officials to decide as is done now.

4832. What would you say to a suggestion, which has been mooted here in some evidence, that both in the case of fines and dismissals the conditions of these should be clearly known to both parties, but that the rates of punishment should be a matter of arrangement between a committee of the workpeople and the employer, and that failing a settlement, there should be an appeal allowed to some central authority? What would you say to that?—In view of the advantages which railway companies have at their disposal I do not think I would advocate that, because it would invariably mean that the few men selected to meet their employers would not like to run the risk of many things that might follow if they opposed the will of officials and employers. The railway companies can deal with men differently from factories and mines. Railway men are required to reside at a place convenient to the employers and much additional power is given to the employers over men who have resided some time in a place and become attached to their surroundings, either through their children going to school or to work, or perhaps through the purchase by a workman of his own house.

4833. Would railway men have any objection to an inspector being made the judge as to the reasonableness of the scale of punishment?—I doubt whether that would be possible. I cannot express the opinion of the workmen generally upon it, but I can give my own view which probably reflects that of others, and I don't think I should care for anybody to come from outside to decide these things.

4834. I must now ask you, broadly put, do you prefer suspensions to fines or the reverse?—Assuming that we must have one or the other I should say that I prefer fines, as a suspension is never for less than one day, whereas a fine may be less than a day's wage.

4835. Always assuming these two conditions, namely, that the parties should know where they are and that the fines should be reasonable in amount relative to the amount of wage earned?—Yes, and to the nature of offence.

4836. Quite so. How could this Committee get the scales of penalties to which you have referred and which so far as you know are not accessible to the workmen?—They are not accessible to my knowledge.

4837. I presume we should have to apply to the railway companies in order to see whether they would be willing to furnish that information?—Yes, and, if I may suggest it, I think it would be well for the Committee to get that information.

4838. In regard to all these societies where the contributions are either compulsory or substantially so, in such circumstances as you have told us about, where a man feels that he must really join or something may happen to him, would you favour a system, where a man is dismissed, of paying back to him the actuarial result of his contribution?—Perhaps I may be considered prejudiced, but I try to look at the matter fairly, and I cannot forget my own experience, namely, that I was compelled by my employers, as a condition of employment, to enter their friendly society notwithstanding that in that respect I was already fairly well provided for. Now I had to forfeit these other societies and the contributions I had previously paid to them in order to enable me to take employment under the company, but if I left the company's employment of my own accord to improve my position or if I was dismissed for some alleged offence, in either case, I would have to sacrifice the advantages of the company's friendly society. I maintain that in such a case the companies ought to return to the men the contributions they were compelled to subscribe less any benefit which they had received.

4839. That is practically what I had suggested?—On quitting a railway company's services many a man is debarred from rejoining another friendly society because he has got beyond the age for entrance.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4840. Is the sick club from which you were not able to take out any money when you quitted the company's service, still in existence on the same lines?—Yes. There was the Sick and Provident Society, the Pension Society, and the Widows and Orphans Fund. The Provident Society was optional in respect that a man may continue a member by paying an increased contribution. In the case of the Pension Society a certain percentage of the contribution could be paid back, but in the case of the Widows and Orphans Fund a man who left the company's service had to sacrifice all he had paid in. These are the three societies which I was compelled to join.

4841. And they are still maintained on the same lines?—Yes, with increased contributions since I left the company's service, and decreased benefits, I think.

4842. Have you contemplated action under the Shop Clubs Act?—That Act was not then passed.

4843. I know it came into force in 1903, but you say the same system still continues?—I do not know that it has occurred to anyone to take action in such cases under that Act. I have never been approached by anyone who took that view, but possibly it never occurred to an individual member when leaving the company's service.

4844. Under the Shop Clubs Act a workman leaving his employment when connected with a "shop" friendly society is somewhat in the position described by the Chairman?—I am, nevertheless, a little doubtful whether the Act in question would help us as these railway societies are established by Acts of Parliament.

4845. I think the Shop Clubs Act was designed to meet cases of the kind you mention?—I thank you for the hint and we may try to take advantage of it.

4846. Section 5 of that Act does not seem to me to exempt from all the benefits of the Act the members of a friendly society organised by a railway company. And to secure any exemption, the society must have existed before 1903?—The point has never occurred to me. I was in Parliament when the Act was passed and very nearly got it extended to cases of the class which I have especially in view.

4847. Do the companies contribute to all these societies?—Yes.

4848. Do you feel satisfied that the scheme you proposed in the nature of a bonus or reward would not degenerate into the bonus scheme as we find it already existing in many cases ?—I don't think so. If such a scheme was recognised it should be definitely provided that it could not so degenerate. What I object to is to a bonus being considered as part wages. I would have the marks carried forward for a sufficiently long period and the reward given eventually need not be a very big sum, but really something to encourage the maintenance of marks. A workman would never like to feel that he had lost say 350 marks in the course of three years. That would be just as objectionable to the man and no less repugnant to his feelings than to have it said that he had been suspended six times in three years or been fined 22s. on twelve occasions. A man does not like even a bad record to the extent of losing 350 marks.

4849. Do you see any reason why discipline could not be maintained by a railway company as it is by certain employers in factories and workshops without either fines or suspensions ?—I see no reason. Nevertheless, there is a difference between a railway workman and the man in the factory, because in the former case there is not the same constant and close supervision. There are officials in the factories always on the spot, who have the men or women workers under observation, and that is not possible in the case of many railway servants. We do think it rather hard that in the case of a man running a train say from London to Crewe, if there is some officious foreman on the platform at Rugby who sees the driver blowing off some steam or emitting some smoke from his engine, the matter is reported and a fine imposed.

4850. I understood you to say that your Union has difficulty in imposing its views upon the railway companies with regard to the present bonus system; but do you see any prospect of greater ease in imposing its views about your bonus system ?—Yes, I do. I am hoping that the present bonus to signalmen may be regarded as wages and paid every week instead of half yearly.

4851. What is there to prevent railway companies saying to a workman, whose wages may be 25s. a week, that if he earns a certain number of marks the wages shall be 27s. per week and that, therefore, assuming him to be a good workman, the wages might be reckoned at the higher figure ?—I would carry the marks over for a longer period than half a year, and would suggest that, say, three years of good marks would entitle a man to a reward of say £2 10s. If there was a minor offence committed a certain number of marks might be taken off.

4852. Do you not think that a railway company would feel that the effect of certain marks upon a distant prospect of £2 10s. would be an inadequate deterrent ?—Very likely the companies would think so, because they would not make so much out of it. The fines now total up to a considerable sum in the year; some companies hand these fines over to their friendly societies. I think the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway does so. That means, sometimes, a good source of income to these societies at the cost of somewhat unreasonable fines being inflicted for trivial offences. These societies should be provided for by the employers upon the men paying their fair contribution, and if the contribution is not enough the employers should make up the deficiency and not take it out of the men by heavy fines.

4853. I understand you feel that the difficulty about supervision places railway companies in a slightly different position from other employers of labour who might be expected to maintain discipline without the help of any form of fines ?—I certainly think there is a difficulty in the case of railways upon the point of supervision, but I do not admit that railway men as a class are badly disciplined.

4854. Might not the difficulty of supervision operate another way, and make it somewhat difficult for good marks to be recorded if there is nobody there to judge of a man's conduct ?—I take it that if there is no complaint against a man his marks would stand good. I would give, in the absence of complaints, something like 500 marks in three years, entitling a man at the end of that period to a reward of something like £2 10s. But if he is reported from time to time for small offences then either ten or twenty marks might be taken off at a time.

4856. I gather that it is an essential part of your scheme that these gifts or rewards should not take effect for a considerable time, say three years ?—Yes.

4857. How would you provide for men engaged for shorter periods ? Do not railway companies take on certain occasional men for say six months or a year ?—Not usually. When a man gets into the employment of a railway company he becomes, as a rule, a permanent servant, but there may be casual men who are not on the staff, and who are hardly subject to the same conditions.

4858. Are there not a good many porters taken on for short periods at big stations ?—In most instances they would be permanent men. Some few extra men may be taken on in the summer season at large London terminal stations, and when the summer traffic is over they may perhaps be put temporarily into some other department, where the goods traffic is getting heavy prior to Christmas.

4859. May I take it that you consider suspensions to be a form of fining and a bad form ?—Yes, absolutely.

4860. Would you consider it practicable for the legislature to deal with it as a form of fining ?—Yes, I should put it on the same category as a fine and deal with it in the same way. Except, of course, in the case of rather serious accidents, where a number of men may have to be suspended pending an inquiry, not suspended as an immediate punishment, but because something serious has happened and it is not known which of the men, if any of them, is to blame. But the other men who are not found to blame should, after the inquiry, be paid for the period during which they were suspended.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

He said:—I desire to put in one or two more matters by way of supplementing and confirming my evidence of last week. You will recollect I then said that the railway companies have voluntary associations and societies, but there is a peculiar interpretation placed by them upon the word voluntary.

By the Chairman.

4861. Are you referring to charitable organisations?—No, to such organisations as the provident and pension society. I have here a schedule of contributions and benefits to the London and North Western Locomotive Department Provident and Pension Society, and a circular on the subject which has been issued to the men. I think I said last Wednesday here that a few years ago—perhaps three or four years ago—the locomotive men approached the directors with a view to forming or agreeing to form a pension fund. The directors then refused the request, but presumably they reconsidered it afterwards, and they themselves formed a society without consulting the men at all. They arranged their own schedule without any consultation whatever, and issued notice of it as a voluntary association.

4862. Among their own work people?—Yes. I want to read the circular issued to the men, which shows how a voluntary association is worked by a railway company. The substance of the circular is as follows:—

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

Admission of various grades in the Locomotive Department into the Provident and Pension Society.

"Certain grades of workmen having desired to be provided for by pensions payable in old age or on incapacitation, I hand you herewith a copy of the General Manager's Circular No. 3163, embodying the terms on which they can be admitted into the London and North Western Railway Provident and Pension Society.

"On and from the 1st October next all new appointments and promotions will come under these Rules and Regulations.

"In the case of new appointments, and also in that of the present staff required to join the society on promotion, the medical certificate will be obtained from the railway company's medical officers, and the company will pay the examination fee, but the necessary medical certificate will have to be furnished at their own expense by the men joining voluntarily. The certificate of any qualified medical practitioner will be accepted, and a form for the purpose may be obtained on application."

At the bottom of this circular there is a form which applicants are supposed to fill up. It is as follows:—

"I ———— ———— ————
(Signature in full) (Working Number) (Grade in Staff List) rated at ————————————am desirous of (Staff List Rate of Pay)
becoming a member of the London and North Western Railway Provident and Pension Society, and would be willing to pay such an equitable amount of premium, according to my age, as may be fixed if the privilege is extended to men 45 years of age and upwards.

Date of Birth————Age in completed years last birthday———
Date of entry into service————————

In addition there is another form issued to each man, of which I could not get a copy, as each applicant had to return it with his statement whether he intended to join or not, and that form distinctly stated that no advance of wages or promotion would be given to men who did not join, notwithstanding that the circular referred to men who are desirous of joining. The men resent this very much and I have had a good deal of communication on the subject with men on different parts of the system. Some of them called upon me to be advised as to what should be done under the circumstances, but really there is nothing to be done unless the whole of the men could organise or agree as to the filling up of these forms, and the Company required them to be returned within such a short period that the men had no time to consult each other, yet if they refuse there is no prospect of advance or promotion to them.

4863. Do I understand you that, after the directors had refused the men's requests for such a society, the company itself initiated this society?—Yes, that is so.

4864. Having, as it were, tapped the feeling of the men which showed that they were moving in the direction of a society of this kind, the company, as you suggest, utilised it especially for company purposes?—Yes, without any consultation with the men at all.

4865. Do you know whether the railway company contributes to this society?—The men cannot tell me that. The first page of the circular which I have produced sets forth the contribution, and benefits in detail.

4866. I rather wanted to know, if possible, how the capital is made up?—The men know nothing more than is contained in the circular to which I have referred.

4867. I gather from your evidence that, in your opinion, that which began voluntarily is now substantially a condition of promotion in the company's service?—Yes. The company say it is voluntary whether the men shall join, but such restrictions are put on the men's future that they can hardly refuse to become members unless they are prepared to sacrifice any chance of advancement or promotion.

4868. From one point of view is it not rather a good thing that the workmen should be members of such a society?—It is a good thing provided the society is based upon a sound foundation, and that the workmen who are members have some control of its management.

4869. In regard to that latter point you suggest that it has come to be a company affair and nothing more?—Absolutely.

4870. Have you any fresh instances that you desire to mention?—Yes, in order further to substantiate what I stated last week as to the way in which men are sometimes suspended for things over which they have absolutely no control, I may mention a case that occurred on the 23rd and 24th of last month. It refers to a man who was called upon to travel as acting inspector with a special train from Stafford to Liverpool. The train contained some wide material that overlapped the side of the trucks and owing to the dangerous nature of the load the special train was run on a Sunday. The goods guard, to whom I have referred, was appointed to travel with this train as an inspector. It is usual for some order of working to be issued in such cases, and before leaving Stafford on the Sunday morning the man in question, the goods guard, made inquiries from all who were about the premises at that time, and was informed that no special regulations had been left. He therefore took the train to Crewe, but on arrival at Crewe instructions were given by an inspector there for the train to travel via Warrington. It afterwards transpired that the train should have gone via Runcorn, and that the station master at Stafford had received these instructions, but was not about when the train started and had not left them out. Yet a fine of two days' wages by suspension was imposed upon this man.

4871. Would that not be a case in which the man would sign such a document as you referred to on the last occasion ?—I do not think the London and North Western men have to sign such a document as in the case of a Lancashire and Yorkshire driver, as suspension does not come directly under the Truck Act, and therefore they did not adopt the measures necessary in accordance with that Act as they would have done in the case of a fine, but they have to sign one similar to the copy I mentioned in my evidence-in-chief.

4872. Is there any other instance ?—Last Wednesday I mentioned the case of an engine driver at Normanton who was fined 2s. 6d. because he neglected to sign off duty. These men have to make a return of their day's working. I have a copy of the return here which shows that the man has to sign when he goes on and off duty. In the case in question the man omitted to book himself off duty on arrival at the sheds, because his time was taken up largely in filling up other returns as to the quantity of coal used, defects of the engine, necessary repairs or other matters requiring attention. He overlooked to sign himself off in the book, and was for that fined 2s. 6d. He was particularly anxious that I should not mention his name, because he says if that came out there might be a more severe penalty than the fine.

4873. Are you at liberty to mention the name of the company ?—It was the Midland at Normanton. Others besides him are treated in the same way.

4874. Are these all the fresh matters that you wish to bring before us ?—The following is an extract from a letter received from Wigan, dated November 7th, 1906. "I have to again call attention to the suspensions on the great and mighty London and North Western. At our meeting last night we had a suspension claim for three days by a London and North Western driver for dropping lead plug with three inches of water showing in the gauge glass and injector working. I am further informed that some case has arisen recently of a man being suspended for dropping lead plug of an engine that had not been washed out for four weeks previously. Another member was suspended two days for going out a few hours and not having returned when sent for, although when our member went out there were several men in front of him. Such punishments are altogether unreasonable, for if a man has not even time to go to get any requisite, the company should pay a wage to enable him to make other arrangements." I also have a typical instance of how these sick societies are operated with regard to these men. It is a recent case with regard to which I had a letter yesterday from the solicitor. It was the case of a man, late engine driver, Class 1, in the employment of the London and North Western Railway Company, who was injured whilst in the employment of that company on 29th October, 1904. The company paid him £1 per week from a fortnight after the accident until May, 1905. In January of this year, being a member of the London and North Western Railway Insurance Society, this man put in a claim against that body for the sum of £50 under Rule 8 of that society, which set forth that should a member by accident receive bodily injury which renders him permanently disabled from following his present employment, such member shall receive, etc. The society got him examined and their own doctor twice advised him not to go back on the engine again, but to try and get a light job. The company declined to find him such a job, and the general committee rejected the claim because another doctor thought he was not permanently unfitted for his regular employment. It was not until June this year that the General Committee came to that decision, and they were informed that an appeal would be made against it. The reply was that the delegate meeting would decide whether the case should go before the arbitrators. It now appears that the case will have to be submitted to a delegate meeting in April, 1907, as the rules of the society do not permit a case of that kind to be brought before the courts of law. It will therefore be probably eighteen months before this man gets a final decision. There are scores of such cases, perhaps hundreds of them, because these societies are largely in the hands of officials who dominate their whole policy, and the men cannot get their reasonable due, although compelled to join these societies.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

7 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

4875. You mean officials of the company ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

4876. That would hardly be a shop club on the lines of those which you spoke of last week for insurance purposes to take the place of the Workmen's Compensation Act ?—The company has powers for these societies.

By the Chairman.

4877. In so far as our Committee's inquiry is concerned, I gather your evidence to be that whatever our opinions are upon the subject of the sick and benefit clubs, it is important to note the management under which they are conducted ?—Yes, and that they are enforced upon the men as a condition of employment or promotion.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4878. As distinction is made under the Shop Clubs Act according to whether the railway companies subscribe or not, I suppose you will ascertain whether the company subscribes in this case ?—I think the companies subscribe something in almost every case.

4879. I think you said you did not know ?—I cannot say definitely as the circular conveys all the information I can get. The men know nothing apart from what that document indicates.

4880. But in consideration of the fact that you may be able to deal with them under the Shop Clubs Act, I suppose you will ascertain whether the company does or does not subscribe ?—Yes, I shall endeavour to do so.

By Mr. Cawley.

4881. In connection with the subject of fines and suspension I understand that of the two you prefer fines ?—If there is to be a penalty of some kind a fine would be less than a suspension. A fine of 2s. 6d. is always to be preferred to making a man lose 7s. for a day's wage.

4882. Then what it comes to is that if there must be one of the two as a deterrent you prefer the fine ?—Yes.

4883. You went on to advocate a system of rewards instead of fines ?—Yes.

4884. I think in one part of your evidence you said a man might get such a pile of black marks against him that he would have no chance of getting the reward ?—Yes.

4885. Don't you think in such a case he might become callous ?—He would not become any more callous than by being fined a dozen times.

4886. If a man has accumulated a certain number of black marks a company would have no other resort by way of punishment ?—A man would in any case have before his mind the fear of dismissal, and he would not deliberately misconduct himself and run such a risk.

4887. I am not saying whether fines or suspensions are right or wrong, but my point with reference to your suggested scheme is that it is the most negligent men who get the black marks and the company would have no redress against that man except dismissal ?—A man would always remember that there was the alternative of dismissal staring him in the face. The penalties are largely due to the caprices of officialism. Some official may make himself so over officious that a poor man can hardly look over a hedge without having the fact reported against him.

4888. They are a little arbitrary ?—I agree.

4889. That is really a condition of employment ?—I agree

4890. You were speaking of fines for small offences and amongst the rest you particularly emphasized the emitting of black smoke ?—Yes.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

4891. I suppose you are aware that the railway companies themselves get fined by the local authorities when black smoke is emitted ?—Yes, I admit that.

4892. Do you not think it is rather hard on a railway company if they have an engine-driver or stoker, whoever it is, who continually fires up so that he makes black smoke to the detriment of the neighbourhood of a local authority that the local authority should fine the railway company ? Do you not think the railway company ought to have some remedy against the man ?—I think that the railway companies might have a little relief from the local authorities in regard to this, because the black smoke at a station does not very much affect the neighbourhood outside.

4893. I am afraid that the neighbourhood would not agree with you in that, nor the local authority ?—No, but I would certainly support a railway company against these arbitary prosecutions by corporations for a matter of that kind, anyhow.

4894. We have all suffered perhaps from arbitrary corporations in regard to smoke. You are aware of course that a man can prevent smoke to a great extent ?—He cannot always prevent it at all times.

4895. How is it that some men get fined and others do not ?—Because it so happens at the moment. Various circumstances operate in these things. Take a man running from London to Crewe—those who know a little about engines, would find that engine not in the best condition by the time she got to Crewe with a heavy train. The result is he has got about two or three minutes at Crewe only in order to get himself ready to go on again from there to Manchester.

4896. He knows he has to stop at Crewe and he knows the exact distance ; do you not think he ought to regulate his firing up so as not to make a big smoke at Crewe ?—I only wish it was so easily done as you suggest. No man would do it deliberately. Passengers grumble at the company and curse the driver if he is five minutes late in arriving, and he is punished if he loses time.

4897. Is it not a fact that some men get fined for making black smoke, and others do not ?—They all get fined if they happen to do it.

4898. Is it not a fact that some men do not get fined, and others often get fined ?—That does not prove anything. The men who run a certain express are a certain section, and because those men happen to be dropped on and fined, it does not follow that other men who are running goods trains are not also emitting smoke.

4899. Your assertion is that on all passenger trains that are run in long distance journeys the men get fined for black smoke ?—Yes, or even short distances.

4900. All of them get fined ?—All get fined if some officious person interferes.

4901. Yes, but that is not quite my point. Is it or is it not the fact that all the men get fined ?—Yes, if they are caught.

4902. But do they get fined, as a matter of fact ?—Yes. They are suspended on the North Western.

4903. Is it a fact that every engine-driver at some time or another, or fairly often, gets fined or suspended ?—Every one that is caught. I will put it in that way, because I should not like to say that everyone is fined.

4904. The blowing off of steam comes in the same category ?—Yes.

4905. Have you an objection to the fines being published ? The fact that they are published does act as a deterrent, I think—it is an addition to the fine, in a way. The men do not like their names being published, I understand ?—No. Why should they be black-listed ? Is not a fine sufficient without black-listing them all over the country ?

4906. Does not the fact that the fines are published, and their names known, make the men more particular ?—Why should a passenger object to his name being published when he is fined for travelling without a ticket ?

4907. His name ought to be published ?—The Courts have held that that is wrong. If it is wrong for a passenger to have his name published when he deliberately does a wrong, it is more wrong for the engine-driver to have his name published. If a passenger travels without a ticket, he deliberately does so, but a man cannot always help his engine blowing off or emitting black smoke. To be fined and black-listed all over the country for that is certainly wrong.

4908. Do you not think that it makes a man more particular if he knows his name will be published ?—Not a bit of it, because none of these men do that kind of thing if he can avoid it.

4909. Your contention is that neither a fine nor suspension has a deterrent effect ?—Not in the least. If they had a deterrent effect, with the fines and suspensions which have been going on, we should have had these things reduced now to a very small quantity.

Mr. Walsh.

4910. I have paid some little attention to your point that there have been very few cases where the men, although they knew that the deductions or fines must be reasonable and fair having regard to the circumstances of the case, under the Truck Act, have taken any action on those grounds under that Act ?—That is so because they have a fear that if they did there would be no more employment under that company.

4911. Have the companies themselves ever had the illegality of their action brought before them ? For instance, you know that they should really schedule the list of offences for which they intend to inflict fines, and they should also schedule the extent of the fine for that particular offence ?—Yes, but I think that these schedules would not be found posted up anywhere except perhaps in a very few instances.

4912. Of course, there is another alternative. If they do not schedule, there is supposed to be a contract in writing between the workmen and the employer stating the nature of the offence or damage or omission and the amount of the fine agreed upon. Does that take place ? —No, not by agreement. There are only those little notices which I mentioned at the last meeting, which a man has to sign.

4913. That is supposed to be a written contract, is it ? —I take it it will be considered as a contract. No ; it is not signed by the man himself; it is simply a kind of notice.

4914. So that it certainly is not a contract at all, in any way ?—No, it is not a contract.

4915. First of all, I understand there is no schedule of the fine, nor of the offence, nor is there a written contract which ought to follow in the event of the first condition not being complied with ?—No, there is not. Since my attendance here last Wednesday I have written to a large number of depots to ascertain if any such thing is posted up, either in the locomotive sheds or anywhere else, and all the replies which I have had are to the effect that they know nothing of them ; in fact, they have had some difficulty in understanding what I referred to, because they absolutely knew nothing of it. I have made those enquiries in order that I might be positive in what I was stating.

4916. I only wish to draw attention to that particular part of the Act, because it seems to me that the Act of 1896 did at least try to give the workmen and the employer some reasonable assurance in this matter. Now, I would like to ask you with regard to some of those particular matters for which the men have been fined. In two cases I think the fines were in connection with the dropping of an oil cup ?—Losing an oil cup in running.

4917. And in the pulling of the brake van off the road ? —That would be at a siding.

4918. Do you submit that these are matters over which a man has really no effective control ?—I could hardly say that a man would have control over his oil cup. He may be satisfied that it was all right when he last attended to his engine, and after running fifty or one hundred miles, when he stops again, he may find his oil cup has dropped off.

4919. Of course we are not here to express our own opinions, but simply to ask questions. I take it your own opinion is that the best workman on the line might very well have this particular class of accident occur to him ?—The chief mechanical engineer himself, if he was on the engine, could not help it.

4920. That leads me a little bit further. How far can fines inflicted upon men for matters over which they have no effective control act as a deterrent ?—It is impossible that it can have any. If a man lost his oil cup to-day and was fined 2s. 6d. for it, or suspended for a day, by which he would lose perhaps 6s. or 7s. in wages, that would not prevent him losing an oil cup again to-morrow in running between two points.

4921. If he were fined the whole of his wages could even that act as a deterrent ?—Not at all.

4923. With regard to the pulling of the brake van off the road, is that a thing over which a workman could exercise some reasonable care ?—They always do that, and if you fine a man twenty times it would not prevent it. No man would pull a brake van or truck off the line, because he has to pull it on again, and that is sufficient punishment.

4924. Do you think the companies themselves have the idea that these fines do act as a deterrent ?—I do not think they have given any consideration at all to it.

4925. We will take it a little bit further for ourselves, and leave the companies to themselves. Inasmuch as the companies do inflict fine after fine, and these offences are continually occurring, am I to understand that the men are still retained in their employment ?—Yes. I will refer you to that Accrington incident which I gave you on the last occasion, where a man had been fined eight or nine times and is still driving to-day on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

4926. So that really one can only assume that the companies are still satisfied with the ability of the workman as a capable workman, or they would not retain him in their employment ?—I should certainly suggest that, because if they thought he was not they would be wrong in retaining him in their employment.

4927. Then you put it that this can only have the effect, if not of decreasing the capacity of the workman, at least of making him more embittered against the system which inflicts fine after fine for matters over which he has really little or no control ?—If I may go back to what Mr. Cawley put to me, he asked me whether these fines would not be a deterrent to a man and make him more careful, but I should say that it would make him more careless. Here is a man, doing his best, fined and suspended, fined and suspended—well, it makes him think, "It does not matter what I do; I am doing the best I can, and, for a paltry thing over which I have no control, I get fined like this"; he will then probably use a strong adjective and say, "What is the good of taking any interest in the thing at all ?"

4928. I am to understand, then, that these fines are not determined by any system or method, but that the amount of the fine depends upon the caprice of an under official ?—In some instances an under official, but sometimes it is inflicted by a superior official, although always on the report of an under official.

4929. And of course, as a matter of fact, there is no particular system which would, so to speak, limit the amount of the fine, and which would give a definite character to the nature of the offence ?—No, there is no particular system existing in that way at all.

4930. I would like to ask you with regard to those voluntary societies. You quoted the case of the London and North Western, and as I listened to you it seemed to me that the voluntary part of it only applied to those workmen who are now in the employment of the company ?—That is so.

4931. Their advance of wages, or future higher appointments, are made dependent upon joining this particular provident and pension society ?—That is so.

4932. So that although many of these men may have been working since fifteen years of age, possibly to middle age, forty-five or fifty ?—I would not put it so high as that.

4933. Would you say forty-five ?—Yes; they get it up to forty-five.

4935. So that people who have been working for between twenty-five and thirty years in the company's employ, and who in that sense may be said to have earned the right to higher wages as they come along, or to better appointments, will have those rights determined—or at least those privileges if you care to put it in that way, for I suppose it could hardly be said that a right existed—will have these privileges determined unless they join this particular provident and pension society ?—Yes. I will put it in another way to emphasise that it is a right and not a privilege. Here is a man who has to apprentice himself, as it were, as either a cleaner or a fireman to become a driver. By the time he has become a driver he will probably have been in the company's employ say eighteen to twenty years. His minimum wage as a driver would be 5s. 6d. a day, and by right he is entitled to an advance up to, say, 7s. a day. If he happens to be at 5s. 6d. a day after, say, eighteen years service, next year he will be entitled to his 6s. a day, but unless he joins this fund he does not get that 6s. a day.

4936. Of course it will still be in the company's power to keep him in the lower job ?—That is so.

4937. They are not bound to give him the higher job ?—They are not bound to in any case, but I have never found a case in which a man has not gone up unless his reputation did not warrant them in raising him.

4938. Why I used the word "privilege" instead of "right" was that it could not be said that the man had any legal right ?—No, no legal right.

4939. We had better not get into the realms of metaphysics. Is there any guarantee of solvency in these societies at all ?—Absolutely none.

4940. So that when the men are asked under these conditions to join the societies they do not know they are joining a society which will pay 20s. in the £ ?—No, they do not know what it will be able to pay.

4941. There is no guarantee as to solvency ?—None whatever. In fact, every society is insolvent, and in a very bad state of insolvency too.

4942. Now with regard to the retention of membership: supposing a man leaves the employ of a particular company, is he enabled to retain his membership in that society, to which he may have contributed for many years ?—No, with one or two exceptions. One I know is the Great Western Provident Society, one of three societies to which the men are compelled to subscribe, and in this they can retain their membership, but they have no part in the conduct of its management, and they have to pay an increased contribution.

4943. They have to pay an increased contribution, and have no part in the management of the society ?—That is so.

4944. And that only applies to one or two cases ?—Yes. I know for certain that the Great Western is one, and I believe the Midland have similar conditions.

4945. In those cases where they are not allowed to retain their membership, is there any surrender value given for the payments made ?—Sometimes some companies give a percentage of the contributions. They give all with the exception of a certain percentage for management, and of course the deduction of any sums which they may have received in benefit as well. The London and North Western Company do not return anything from the Provident Fund.

4946. I suppose when that surrender value is given it will have been dependent upon a certain number of years' membership ?—Yes; nothing but a percentage of the contributions which he has himself subscribed.

4947. Have you considered the effect of such societies at all ? I do not know whether this is carrying it a little beyond our purview, Mr. Chairman; of course I will not press it if it is beyond our scope. Have you ever considered the effect of the men being compelled to be members of these societies upon those other societies, friendly societies to which they may have contributed voluntarily for a large part of their life-time? Have you considered the effect of the membership of these employers' and workmen's clubs upon the fortunes of the other friendly societies to which I have referred?—It must have a certain amount of effect.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

7 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

4948. I think Mr. Bell put it quite well just now, and that we can leave it there. I think up to that point Mr. Bell's evidence is very good, that it must have a certain effect upon the others.

By Mr. Walsh.

4949. I do not wish to press it. I will leave it there.

By Mr. Delevingne.

4950. I understand you to say emphatically that Section 1 of the Truck Act, 1896, which requires the employer either to make a contract with individual workmen or to post up a general notice in respect of fines, is not being observed at the present time by the railway companies?—I feel absolutely certain of that, unless the companies regard one of their own rules in the rule books to which I referred in my evidence last week as a contract, in which they say that the company reserves the right to punish by fines, suspension, or dismissal, and to withhold any moneys due.

4951. That of course is not a contract or a notice within the meaning of Section 1 of the Truck Act, 1896?—No.

4952. It clearly is not. If such notices were posted up or individual contracts made as required by the Act, it would be a protection for railway servants—at any rate it would be a great advantage to the railway servants?—I do not know that it would be any great advantage, but the men would know when they were fined how much they ought to be fined for the particular offence. As it is, one man may be fined 2s. 6d. for emitting smoke and another man 1s. 6d., and they do not know which it ought to be.

4955. The fine would be fixed for each particular offence?—Yes.

4956. Then again, Section 1 requires the amount of the fine to be fair, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. You have given us instances in which the fines were obviously unfair?—Yes.

4957. Cases in which, according to your account, the matter was entirely beyond the control of the railway servant?—Absolutely.

4958. You gave us one case last time in which, I think, a man pointed out a defect in his engine to the foreman when taking it out of the yard, and yet was subsequently fined in respect of that very defect?—Yes.

4959. That of course seems obviously unfair?—The railway company will always tell you these things are fair—that they only fix a fair sum. It is a question of who is going to interpret what is fair.

4960. Has any action ever been taken during the ten years in which this Act has been in force to test those points?—Not by the railway societies.

4961. Nor by railway servants?—No, just for that very reason which I before stated, that the men would be afraid of taking action.

4962. So far as the railway servants are concerned the Act of 1896 has been a dead letter?—Absolutely.

4963. Would that be remedied at all in your opinion if there was any system of inspection in the case of railways as there is in the case of mines and factories. You are aware that in the case of factories the Truck Act of 1896 and the other Truck Acts are enforced by the inspectors of factories?—At the depots and at the stations where men are employed that would enable the men at any rate to see that these notices were posted up in accordance with Section 1.

4964. A factory inspector's duty, in the case of a factory is not only to see that the notice is posted up, but also that it is a notice in accordance with the provisions of the Act, specifying the acts and omissions and the amount of the fine, and also that the fines specified there, and actually imposed, are fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of the case?—Yes; if someone has authority to consider and decide whether a fine is fair or unfair, I think that will be of material assistance.

4965. I understand your case to be that nothing has been done under the Act of 1896—that that Act has not had a fair trial in regard to railway servants?—That is so, for the very reason which I stated before, that the men are afraid. They would have to go to the police court, and any railway man knows very well that once he goes to a police court he goes out of the railway service the week after.

4966. Have you considered how far the Act of 1896, if put in force, would meet the points which you have laid before the Committee?—No, I have not, for that very simple reason that we cannot get our people to agree to take action, and therefore I have not bothered with the Act because there is no use for it.

4967. One question on the subject of suspensions: is that a convenient system for the railway companies? Is not suspension less convenient as a mode of punishment than a fine for a railway company?—I would say it is more convenient, because they make more money out of it.

4968. Do you suggest that the amount of the fines imposed by the railway companies is a consideration to the company?—Yes, a good deal, because as I stated, some companies place the money obtained by fines to the account of the provident societies for the purpose of augmenting the funds.

4969. Is that a benefit to the shareholders?—It is not a benefit to the shareholders directly, but it may be a benefit to them indirectly inasmuch as if the fund is well fed by fines from the men, the company have not to subscribe, whereas perhaps they would be obliged to, morally, if the income was not equal to the expenditure for a year's working. It is the company's own arrangement, and morally we would expect them to make up any deficiency. If they can feed it with fines from the men, it saves them from subscribing.

4970. Have you any idea at all as to the total amount of fines imposed in a year by any of the big railway companies?—No; it is not posssible to get at data of that kind.

4971. What is the amount of the contributions made by railway companies to these insurance funds?—That could be obtained from the balance sheets of the various funds. Of course I am not in possession of those now, but I could get them for you if the Committee desired it.

4972. You were saying last time that suspension is a greater hardship upon the men than a fine; supposing that fines were prohibited entirely, do you contemplate the prohibition of fines being also coupled with some control over the power of suspension?—I should say so in regard to those frivolous offences which I have enumerated. The North Western, for instance, have substituted suspensions for fines. They used to fine very heavily, but now, whether as a matter of convenience or for what reason I do not know, they suspend. I think a couple of years after the passing of the Truck Act they abolished fines in order to get out of the conditions imposed by the Act. They thought they would avoid all those difficulties, and therefore, they suspended the men instead of fining them. The result is they are not obliged to carry out the various conditions of the Act, and none of the employees can appeal, as they would have power to do under the Truck Act against what they thought was an unreasonable fine.

4973. Can you suggest to the Committee any practicable method by which the exercise of the power of suspension could be supervised or controlled?—It is rather difficult for the Committee, or even for Parliament, to say that the companies shall not suspend a man.

4974. That was not quite my question. My point was with regard to the difficulty of controlling the exercise of the power of suspension of a workman by his employer. Have you any suggestions to make to the Committee as to any practicable method of supervising or controlling the exercise of that power ?—I may compare two companies—the Midland and the London and North Western. The subordinate officials of the Midland have not the power to suspend men as they have on the London and North Western. The Midland subordinate officials have to report these offences to headquarters, and they are the people who decide the suspension. I venture to say that there is not 5 per cent. of the suspensions on the Midland Railway as there is on the North Western. That is putting it very high. Every one who is clothed in the least bit of authority on the North Western has the power to send a man home, and to bring his clothes in, and all that kind of thing. There you have it: one company has withdrawn the power of suspension from subordinate officials, and leaves it in the hands of those in higher authority.

4975. Is it possible for the State to control that ?—It is difficult for the State to control it, but I think if this Committee stated in its report that the power of suspension for these trivial offences should not be given to subordinate officials, or something of that kind, the thing would right itself.

4976. You think the railway companies would accept a recommendation of that sort ?—They might. If they are reasonable people they would certainly do so after an enquiry such as this Committee is making and after it has ascertained the facts. A reasonable company would do so, but I do not know whether the North Western would, because their policy is to evade all authority.

4977. Just one question on those offences of which you gave us instances. I rather gathered your suggestion was that in almost every case—certainly in the great bulk of these cases—the matter is really outside the control of the employee; it is not a matter implying either deliberate or wilful, or even careless action on his part ?—In nine cases out of ten they are outside his control.

4978. In nine cases out of ten, they are clearly outside his power to control ?—Yes. I may say if men deliberately did these things they would not be fit and proper persons to be in such an important occupation as railway service.

4979. Of course there is the alternative, that a man may not do a thing deliberately, but he may do it carelessly. Many a man does a thing through carelessness which he would not do deliberately—there is negligence or carelessness to be considered ?—If a railway man knows his duty at all, if he is fit to be in the employ of a railway company, he knows very well what is likely to follow his carelessness, and he is not careless in those respects because something is going to happen on account of his carelessness.

4980. Your suggestion is that the bulk of those offences are neither deliberate nor careless ?—I am absolutely certain of it.

4981. I have one or two questions to ask you with regard to those insurance societies which you mentioned: could you obtain for the Committee copies of the rules of any of those societies ?—Yes, I daresay I could.

4982. And hand them in to the secretary ?—Yes.

4983. They would be rather useful. With regard to the Provident and Pension Society of the London and North Western Railway, which bears date September 1st, 1906, is that quite new ?—Yes. The next circular attached to that states that it comes into operation on October 1st.

4984. Is it quite new only with regard to the locomotive department, or for the whole of the servants of the company ?—A similar one has been in operation for years with regard to what we may call the traffic men.

4985. It is new with regard to the locomotive department ?—Yes.

4986. Have you considered whether you can take any action in respect of that under the Shop Clubs Act, as the exemption which the railway companies have in regard to shop clubs is only in respect of funds or societies existing at the time the Shop Clubs Act was passed, which was 1902 ?—This fund is already in existence. Previously, they excluded the locomotive men; now they are admitting the locomotive men to the fund.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

7 Nov. 1906.

4987. It is a fine point, perhaps, but so far as the locomotive men are concerned this is a new society ?—Yes, so far as they are concerned.

4988. And if it is a new society within the purview of Section 5 of the Shop Clubs Act, then membership is absolutely illegal unless the provisions of Section 2 are complied with by the railway company ?—Yes, but the method of making it compulsory is such that they just obey that compulsory condition.

4989. Have you taken an opinion upon that ?—No.

4990. Are you satisfied generally with the terms of the society ? Do you think that the benefits it confers are fair in proportion to the contributions made by the men ?—No, not at all, because they have such regulations that they can confine the men to receiving a certain sum. A free man can enter two or three societies if he likes and if he met with an accident he would get benefit from each of the societies he subscribed to. If he is off duty for ordinary sickness, he would get benefit from all. But the regulations of these societies are such that if you are off for sickness you can draw upon one, and if you are off for accident you can draw a bit from the other, but not from the sick club. That is the way they regulate the thing, so that a man does not get value for his money.

4991. But this society deals entirely with cases which are outside accidents on duty apparently ?—Yes.

4992. It provides for a series of circumstances which are not connected with accidents ?—It deals with what I may call natural sickness, but then there is the accident society to which they are obliged to subscribe, so that when a man is off for accident, he gets the benefit from the one, and he is not allowed to get his full benefit from the other.

4993. Because the other does not cover injury from accident ?—After all, if a man subscribes to a friendly society, if he is off either from accident or illness, he gets his benefit from that society.

4994. Quite so ?—Take the Oddfellows and Hearts of Oak—a man may be in those two societies and when he is off from ordinary sickness he gets his benefit from both, and if he is off from accident he gets his benefit from both, because he subscribes to them both. In the North Western there are two societies which the men are compelled to join. If he is off from sickness, he gets benefit from the one, and if he is off from accident he does not get it from that, but from the other.

4995. Presumably a friendly society or any society which insures against both sickness and accident requires a higher contribution from its members than a society which insures against accident only or against sickness only ?—No, I do not think so. I think the men could get into the Odd Fellows and Foresters, and some of those friendly societies for less money than they are obliged to subscribe to this.

4996. In other words, the terms are unduly high ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

4997. I think you have made it clear that the Act of 1896 does not run on railways ?—That is so.

4998. It is a dead letter ? Now, supposing it were made to run, would you think that the effect would be to cause the companies to follow the North Western's example and substitute suspensions for fines ?—I am afraid it would, unless some expression of opinion is given in regard to the suspensions for these frivolous offences, which is a kind of evasion of the Act.

4999. And you have made it plain that as an alternative you would prefer fines as against suspension ?—I would.

5000. Is one of the reasons why you do that, that a fine is only imposed after they have come to the conclusion that a man has committed an offence, whereas in the case of suspension, as I understand it, a man loses his day's pay although he may be exonerated from the charge which is brought against him ?—No, that would not apply in all cases. That would only apply in the case of a serious accident, where they suspend three or four men, and after making enquiries, find that A. is to blame and reinstate B. and C.; but they do not pay them for the time they were suspended although they were not to blame for the occurrence.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

7 Nov. 1906.

5001. Your answer is that what I put to you was right, but only for the major offences ?—Yes.

5002. It is a fact that men do sometimes lose three or four days' or even a week's wages in certain cases, although they are proved to be absolutely innocent of any mistake ?—Yes, that is so; and as I stated, they have to sign a document that they surrender all claims on the company before they are allowed to be reinstated.

5003. Would you say in your experience that fining and suspension—we will put them together—have increased of late years on railways, or decreased ? Can you give us any idea of that ?—I should say they have considerably increased. Where the management has been more decentralised, if that is the correct phrase, where there are a greater number of officials in authority, the fines have increased. Prior to that, when the management and government of the men was more centralised, there were less fines and less suspensions.

5004. With your long experience, and close experience, as I happen to know, of practical railway working, having regard to the serious duties imposed upon the men, would you say that a railway company could work their system efficiently without some disciplinary operation, either of fines or suspensions, or, conversely, without some method of reward. That is to say, do you think they could work the line with no fines, no suspensions, and no system of reward—it is not right to say "reward," but something which operates in the same way—as an incentive to good conduct rather than a deterrent to bad ?—I think that something would be required. After all, in an industry which employs many hundred thousand men they cannot help having what I may call a useless fellow now and again. We have to guard against that. The company should be able to dismiss him, after giving him reasonable warning, if he did not do better. Happily, there are very few instances indeed of the kind, and my system of merit (if I may term it so, rather than "reward") would cover a case like that. If the men were given marks, which were deducted periodically if anything went wrong, the company could say to a useless fellow, "You have a very bad record, and we cannot keep you any longer." They would be justified in dismissing him.

5005. That is to say, you do feel, although railway men are so faithful and so competent, that there should be either an incentive or a deterrent ?—Well, an incentive, I should say, certainly.

5006. Which should be held in reserve by the company ?—Yes, I think so.

5007. Supposing such a system, as you have sketched, of merit, as you call it, was in operation on a railway, and a man (as has already been pointed out by an hon. member) made so many mistakes, or neglected his duty to such an extent that he had no good marks, but had arrears of black marks, if that continued we will say over the second year, would you have any hesitation in saying that that man was unfit for the service ?—I should at the same time consider the circumstances under which these things happened, which depends entirely on what the marks were placed against. If a man was frequently late on duty, or failed to come on duty, or something of that kind, I would regard that as a more serious thing, as it could be avoided, than emitting smoke or blowing off steam or dropping an oil cup, or something of that kind.

5008. I am anxious to see how far you realise the necessity for some reserve power on the part of the official. With regard to your system—200 marks in a year, I think it was—if a man did not reach them, but had a balance very much on the wrong side, continuing for two or three years, not confining himself to one kind of offence, but to general offences involving bad judgment, neglect of duty, carelessness, and various things of that nature, what would you say ought to happen to him ?—As I said before, I should consider the circumstances. I will put it in this way. Supposing one man has a long list of marks for emitting smoke, for blowing steam, dropping an oil cup, and matters of that kind, until he had exhausted all his merit marks, and another man has missed his train on three or four occasions, has failed to turn up on duty, has been under the influence of drink on another occasion, and has abused his superior on another, I should say when the latter had exhausted his marks for a particular period he should be cleared out. I draw a distinction between those two men—the one whose deductions are controllable, and the other whose deductions are not.

5009. That is to say, even with your merit system you would discriminate between offences ?—Certainly.

5010. I take it your point is that there is not this discrimination at the present time ?—There is not.

5012. As a trade union official you are very much alive to the necessity of discipline on a railway ?—Yes.

5013. What has been the attitude of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, of which you are the general secretary, to offences, especially the major offences affecting the public: do you always decline to associate yourself in any way with any attempt to shield men who have really neglected their duty ?—I have never done it during the nine years I have been secretary.

5014. And the society have always recognised the need of discipline of a special kind on the railway ?—Yes, that is so.

5015. Just one word about the case you gave us of a subscription to a hospital at Stoke. I am very anxious to know what is your feeling towards compulsory deductions from wages for hospitals generally: do you think that that should be interfered with in any way ?—I do not think that an employer should be allowed compulsorily to deduct what he thinks proper from a man's wages.

5016. Supposing a vote was taken at a depot as to whether the men would or would not subscribe and it went in favour of subscribing, would you then see any objection ?—No, we would agree to that. We would say, "We have agreed to pay," but if that was done thirty years ago the present men should not be bound by it.

5017. In that case, you would think that votes at fair intervals ought to be taken ?—Yes.

5018. But even in the case of a vote, would you say that the amount ought to be stopped out of wages ? Have you any objection to its being stopped out of wages ?—Not if the men say, "It will save us the trouble of getting somebody to collect it, and we will ask the company to take it out of our pay bill next Friday."

5019. Now, I want to ask a question or two about these provident funds. First of all, may I ask you whether the Midland Friendly Society, which you know all about, is not in striking contrast to the North Western Fund ?—It is, ever so much so.

5020. Will you just tell the Committee the difference ?—The difference between the Midland and the North Western (and I may couple the Great Western with the Midland) is that the management in the case of the Midland and Great Western is almost entirely in the hands of the men, with the exception of altering benefits or contributions, which have to have the approval of the directors finally. I believe it is managed purely by representatives of the men.

5021. And I suppose your objection in that case is not of the same kind as it is to the others you have described ?—There is an objection to a large extent to any of these being associated with a company. I would not say now that we should abolish all these things, but I should certainly say that the employers should not be allowed to start these things unless they themselves bear a greater share of the liability for the benefits than they do now.

5022. May I ask you whether deductions are actually made from the men's wages at pay time for these provident funds ?—Yes.

5023. The amount is deducted from their wages ?—Yes; they are taken out without any agreement on their part on the particular occasion.

5024. Therefore it amounts to this, that for a provident fund, membership of which is made a condition of promotion at least, if not of actual employment, a fund in the management of which the men take no part, a certain amount of money is deducted from their wages week by week, or fortnight by fortnight, or whatever it is ?—Yes.

5025. And you object to that ?—Yes.

5026. Do you know of a case now where a railway provident society has a rule that a man can only receive a certain amount of money, so that if a man is in two friendly societies outside that, the benefits from which make that amount, they do not give him anything at all ?—I will take the Midland Friendly Society as an instance. I forget what the benefit is, but I believe it is 12s. a week sick pay. If a man meets with an accident and comes under the Workmen's Compensation Act and receives half wages from the company, then he only gets 6s. a week from the Midland Friendly Society.

5027. That answers my question up to a point. But supposing a man is in the North Western Provident Fund and is also in the Oddfellows, we will say ?—An outside society ?

5028. Yes ?—I do not know of an instance. What the object of the North Western is at the present time in sending out a circular to each of their staff asking them to state the societies of which they are members, I do not know; whether it is with that object in view or not, I cannot say.

5029. You have told the Committee that you are not aware whether the company did contribute to the provident society ?—No, I do not know.

5030. I believe it is a general rule that the companies do contribute to those funds ?—Yes, they do subscribe something. I do not know whether I have the balance sheet here. I have the North Western balance sheet for December, 1905. They subscribed £6,827 to their provident and pension society for the year ending December, 1905, whilst the members' premiums and cards amounted to £58,566.

5031. May I put a further question. Have the men actually any representative on that board of management, or have they more than one ?—Just one or two. They have not very many, anyhow. There is a system there by which they keep their officials on the board of management. They say it is by ballot, but the ballot is such that a man is afraid to put his cross against a name when an official's name is also on the same list.

5032. I understood you to say that you did not regard the donation of proceeds from the fines to these sick funds as at all a philanthropic thing, but that it really saved the company, or might save the company, a part of their contribution ?—That is so. It is clear here. Whilst the amount supplied last year was £58,566, the company subscribed £6,827, and "Fines deducted from the pay of the staff and contributed by the London and North Western Company and various Joint Committees" amounted to £23 17s., and at the same time this fund was deficient by £4,805 12s. 5d.

Mr. R. Bell, M.P.

7 Nov. 1906.

5033. Are we to understand that that is the total amount of fines ?—On the North Western. This is the North Western, which has adopted the suspension system in lieu of fines to some extent, and that is the total amount of fines in that company, but the amount would not be anything like that in a company which has not adopted the system of suspension.

By the Chairman.

5034. In view of your evidence being so much in favour of fines as against suspensions, would you mind just saying that you are emphatically in favour of the conditions of the Act of 1896 with regard to the amount of fines being ascertainable, being in a contract, and being fair and reasonable, and that all these things should be emphatically enforced ?—I emphatically state that. If we are to have fines we should have them on those conditions.

5035. I call your attention to this, that Sub-section (1) (c) of Section 1 of the Act of 1896 says that the fines imposed under the contract shall be in respect of some act and omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer. Do you see that condition ?—That condition is entirely applicable to where damage or loss is caused to an employer.

5036. Do you think the same principle ought to be applied in the case of railway servants ?—Yes, and these lists would not occur, because they are neither damage nor loss in most of the cases.

5037. Now let me put the alternative to you. Assuming that we are in favour of suspension instead of fines, and that that could be accomplished, would you suggest that even with regard to suspensions some of the same conditions should be imposed as with regard to the fines, as, for instance, that the duration of the suspension should be fair and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case ?—If something of that kind was in operation, I venture to say that many thousands of days in the year which men suffer by suspension now on the North Western would no longer be days of suspension.

5038. And, secondly, that the acts or omissions with respect to which there were suspensions should be such as to cause damage or loss ?—Yes.

5039. Of course you recognise the difficulty, but if that could be accomplished you think it would be a great protection to the workers ?—I feel sure it would.

5040. And no injury to the company ?—I do not see that the company would be injured at all by those conditions being in force.

5041. It was my duty to point out the statute to you. We are very much obliged to you for helping us so much ?—I think you asked me at the last meeting if I would leave some of those forms with you. I will hand them to the secretary.

Miss CLEMENTINA BLACK, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Miss C. Black.

7 Nov. 1906.

5042. You have kindly come to-day as representing the Women's Industrial Council ?—Yes.

5043. Will you tell the Committee what that is ?—It is an association of persons who devote themselves to various branches of inquiry and organisation in the general interests of working women. If the Committee would like, I can supply them with an annual report, which would show exactly what it is.

5044. If you would be so kind ?—I will have it sent to you.

5045. You have been made aware of the nomination of this Committee, and of its labours ?—The council through its secretary was made aware of it.

5046. And in consequence you have issued the document which you now produce, making certain inquiries ?—Yes. It is as follows:—

"Name of Industry. Age and sex of worker. (1) Particulars of fines levied for: (a) Absence or lateness. Are these reckoned according to the wages which would be earned by the worker for the time lost, or are they larger ? (b) Misbehaviour, or supposed misbehaviour. How much ? For what faults ? (c) For failing to sell to customers in shops. (d) Other causes, specifying these in detail. (2) Particulars of deductions for material, tools or power used in the work. How do these compare with the real values of the articles ? (3) Particulars of deductions for damaged work or materials. How do these compare with the real value ? (4) Deductions for firing, light, rent, food and drink, etc. How do these compare with cost to employer ? (5) Deductions for sick or benefit club, medical attendance, hospitals and other charitable institutions. (6) Cases of obligation to buy from, or deal with, the employer. Complaints of such breaches of the Act should be sent in. (7) Apart from actual obligation, cases of a general understanding or practice, to same effect as (6), wherever instances have occurred of penalty or dismissal for a breach of such understanding or practice. (8) What proportions do the fines and deductions bear to the weekly wages, e.g., if a worker's wages are 12s. does she usually get the 12s., or can you tell us what the average amount taken off weekly for fines and deductions would be ? (9) Whether the practice of shop assistants and other classes of workpeople being lodged and boarded by their employers gives rise to abuses needing remedy by an extension of the Truck Act or by other action of the State. (10) Can contrasts be given showing differences between good and what may be considered questionable treatment as to board and accommodation, so as to show by specific instances the abuses to be corrected or the improvements to be effected.

When filled in, please return to the Secretary, Women's Industrial Council, 7, John Street, Adelphi."

5047. I will ask you what has been the result of those enquiries. In the first place, did you circulate it widely?—It was sent to a very large number of clubs and other societies, branches of the Women's Co-operative Guild, and so on, but not to the trade union because we understood that another society was dealing with that.

5048. You have received in answer about thirty of the forms, filled up?—Yes, which I have here, and will leave in the hands of the Committee if desired.

5049. Now we want a summary of those. First, with regard to fines for lateness or absence. You say in your précis "Two correspondents say no fines at all?"—They mean in their own factories.

5050. "One, a book folder, says 3d. stopped on any wage if more than ten minutes late?"—Yes.

5051. Can you give me generally the wage of such a person?—I should think roughly it would be 12s. a week, but that is quite a rough average.

5052. Then you say that a stationery worker is fined 1d. if half an hour late, and a great many others mention ½d. or 1d. or 2d. fines if a quarter of an hour or half an hour, or an hour late?—Yes.

5053. Some fines are higher; 1d. for five minutes, 1½d. for ten minutes, 3d. for half an hour, and so on?—Yes.

5054. In one case, bottling wines and spirits, the girls are paid by the hour, and not otherwise fined?—Yes. They are piece workers, and what they mean is, that they are paid by the hour and they miss an hour's pay if they are absent. That is what that means, I am sure. It came to us in that rather obscure form, reported by the girl herself, but that is no doubt the meaning of it.

5055. Then you say that one dressmaker fines 1s. 10d. for a day's absence?—Yes. We think that simply means the same thing, and is not a fine. It means that the girls are paid by the week, and that 1s. 10d. is taken off for a day it they are absent, because the girl says "not otherwise fined." Of course it is not a fine, and we have noted that it is scarcely to be counted as a fine. It is a deduction in the strictest sense of the word, because it is taken from her weekly wage, but it is really because she has not earned it.

5056. Then you have some facts in regard to engineering?—Yes. It is a rather curious case in which they fined a boy ½d. for half an hour, 1d. for three-quarters of an hour, and at the end of the year they reckoned up how many hours he had lost and made him work that number of hours for nothing in addition to the fine. In this case it amounted to four and a-half hours, and 4½d. was deducted. He was reckoned as being paid 1d. per hour.

5057. That really doubles his fine?—Yes. They held it over to the end of the year and then made him work that time.

5058. The next item is with regard to fines for misbehaviour. You have been hitherto dealing with fines for lateness or absence?—Yes.

5059. As to misbehaviour, six or seven of your reports say no fines at all, and some correspondents say there are no fines in the industries with which they are acquainted?—Yes.

5060. Others mention these fines in a paper factory—talking 1d.; reading whilst working machine, 1s.; meddling with tools, 6d.; bad language, 1s.?—Yes.

5062. What harm are they doing?—They are doing no harm, but there are factories in which there is a rule against talking. That is quite common. If the foreman hears the girls talking, he fines them. That is one of the fines which is imposed very capriciously. In fact, you will see that one or two of the girls say it depends on the temper of the foreman. That is a fine which will sometimes not be imposed and at other times will be imposed very severely.

5063. Then you say that another correspondent reports that in an important Midland town the workers are fined for every conceivable thing. What town is that?—I believe it is Leicester. I have the paper here.

5064. They are fined for sitting, talking, laughing, going upstairs during the day, going up the wrong stairs, late coming back at night, taking bad money, or telling customers their money is bad. What is the amount of fine that is imposed?—That is not given by our correspondent, who is the representative of a branch of the Shop Assistants' Union. He gave us this as an instance of what occurs to some of the members of that union. You will probably be having representatives of that union before the committee. We felt that you would, and therefore did not carry that enquiry further.

5065. A lady working amongst laundry women has given you some details?—Yes.

5066. She says that in some laundries there are no fines, the workers being simply dismissed if they fail to obey rules?—Yes. That is a lady who has a club chiefly frequented by laundry girls.

5067. In others, 6d. may be the fine for scorching an ironing board, and ironers are often fined for scorched work?—The ironing board is the property of the employer; it is covered with linen or calico, and if it is scorched, the next thing ironed upon it may be scorched. The fine for scorched work ought not to appear there; it really belongs to another head.

5068. The next item of inquiry was with regard to deductions for materials etc.?—Before we go on, may I say that I find amongst our papers one funny little fine which is not mentioned specifically in my précis, namely that a certain West End dressmaker fines her girls if they come down stairs in couples. On what ground, I do not know at all. They must come down one by one; they are not to come down in twos.

5069. How much would the poor things suffer for that? Sixpence?—No; I think it is only a 1d., but it may be sixpence; I am not sure. I have the facts here and can refer to them presently.

5070. With regard to deductions for materials, several correspondents say there are no deductions: these are in bookfolding, millinery, dressmaking, stationery and packing soap?—Of course, it must not be understood that there are none in the trade, but only in the particular instances they are speaking of, in their own factories.

5071. Now we come to the laundry cases. In a laundry it is complained that 1s. in the £ is deducted for use of gas, irons, etc., even when not in use during the whole week. Do I understand that you think that these cases are serious?—We think this laundry case is a very serious one.

5072. In some laundries 1d. a week, in others 6d. a week is charged for the use of ironing boards?—Yes. Of course the ironing boards are absolutely essential; the work could not be carried out without them. They are as much the employer's plant as a table or a chair.

5073. In hosiery, it is stated that needles for machines are charged for, sometimes 40 per cent. above cost price?—Yes.

5074. For that information you are of course dependent upon the report which you received?—Yes. I think that report is from an official of a union which includes women, and if so, he is a very trustworthy witness of great experience.

5075. Then from Birmingham it is stated that in the clothing trade, deductions are common for power, needles, cotton, and sometimes for gas, and the corset makers said that wages had been raised to meet those deductions?—The women themselves say that wages have been raised to meet those deductions.

5076. Some dressmakers have to supply their own needles and their own scissors ?—Those are not from Birmingham. Our informant in Birmingham is Miss Cécile Matheson, and we have perfect reliance upon her report, but these dressmakers are not in Birmingham.

5077. A machinist mentions that girls earning 12s. per week and over are charged 3d. a week for use of machine, and 3d. for use of button-holing machine ?—Yes; I do not think that is usual. Certainly, in the larger number of factories, and in the better factories, no such charge is made; but those charges do occur.

5078. In that place all girls supply their own cotton ? Yes; that is not usual, but I have known instances of it, especially in provincial factories. I have known a stay factory do it, for instance, but it is not usual at all in good London firms.

5079. In an envelope works, the workers find their own gum, brushes and folders; they do not have to get them from the firm, and they find nothing else ?—The folders are simply things like ivory paper knives which they press things down with. I find from inquiries in the printing trade that it is usual for the workers to find the brushes and folders, but in most instances the firm finds the gum. In this case they do not.

5080. In a shirt and collar works, the workers find their own tools ?—The tools would simply be needles, thimbles and scissors.

5081. In a ready-made dress and blouse factory, the workers pay 1s. a week for "power money" ?—That means of course the engine.

5082. In some laundries there is a deduction of 1d. to 6d. for use of ironing boards ?—Yes.

5083. In a wholesale blouse factory every worker on piece work pays 3d. a week for power ?—Yes, every worker on piece work; the girls who are paid weekly wages probably do not pay that.

5084. Then in a mantle-making factory every worker on piece work pays 2½d. a week for power.

5085. You have stated your general remarks afterwards ?—Yes.

5086. May I interpolate this question. Do you think that it is a satisfactory method of payment to name a wage and then to begin chiselling off the wage by deductions for power and use of plant ?—No; we on the council think it a most unsatisfactory method. We think it not only unfair for the workers because they do not know what they are going to take, but we also think it very unwise of the employers, because we are sure it arouses a spirit of irritation and resentment on the part of the workers which is not at all advantageous to the employer. In our experience, workers resent these things very much, perhaps out of proportion to their money value. We also think that it does not tend to maintain discipline—that there is a sort of feeling on the part of the workers that if they pay for a thing they are entitled to do it, and therefore that the discipline is distinctly lowered rather than improved by the existence of fines.

5087. Then on the third head of your enquiry, with regard to deductions for damaged work or materials, five correspondents say none; these are in book-folding, millinery, dressmaking, stationery and envelope making ?—Yes.

5088. In hosiery, the charges are in accordance with the Hosiery Act 1874 ?—Yes.

5089. From Birmingham there are no complaints from girls on that head, and employers take each case on its merits and only enforce rules when real carelessness is proved ?—We have no complaint from Birmingham on that subject. Perhaps the reason is that class of trade deals with things which would not be very easily damaged. It is not easy to do serious damage in making things like iron hairpins.

5090. Some machinists have to pay for broken needles ?—Yes.

5091. And one dressmaker pays for the material she spoils ?—Yes.

5092. Might that be a very serious thing ?—It is not very serious in her case. We think it unjust because she is quite a young girl, but she adds that she raffles the material among her fellow workers, and loses only a few pence. Still, we do not think that at all a desirable thing.

5093. In patent packing works, workers are sent home for two days to a week, according to damage done ?—Yes. Sometimes the foreman will pass things over, and sometimes he will come down heavily for them.

5094. Do you find there is uneasiness on account of the caprice of the foreman ?—Yes; that is one of the most annoying things with regard to fines, that they are inflicted capriciously in some firms—of course not in all.

5095. What do you say with regard to the worker being charged for carriage ?—I assume that is the carriage of the next book which is sent in its place.

5096. In relief stamping, damaged work is charged for at the value of the work ?—Yes.

5097. Is that a serious matter ?—I should think not, because relief stamping is done sheet by sheet, so that there would seldom be much damage at a time. If there were continuous damage, it would indicate very careless work.

5098. Then in a soap factory, if more than one bottle of scent per month is broken it must be paid for ?—That is called a soap factory, but it is scent, soap and perfume; it is the S1 Works, and of course scent is rather valuable. The firm allows one bottle a month as unavoidable.

5099. In a paper factory there are deductions for damaged work even if cut by the defect of a machine ?—Yes.

5100. In envelope making, no charge for damage, but many have to do some work free of charge. In shirt and collar making, some require the work to be done again without pay. In rope works, 4d. stopped for a knot in a rope ?—Yes. We have the report of the worker passed on to us in her own words; it is rather full. But I confess it is not very clear to us whether a knot is inevitably the worker's fault or not.

5101. In rivetting hair-curlers, deductions are made for damage if through carelessness. In ready-made dresses, etc., damaged materials must be paid for the real value. Children's millinery, the same deduction. In laundries sometimes deductions for scorched work, but not generally ?—Yes.

5102. Before I pass from that head of deductions for damaged work or materials, have you any observation to make about them ?—We think it very hard that young workers especially should be charged for spoilt material, because in the course of learning they must inevitably spoil a certain amount of material. In the case of the dressmaker referred to, she was a girl of fifteen, obviously a learner, and in such cases deductions may press very heavily. I do not think that in London that does press very heavily. We have had instances quoted to us with regard to weavers. Of course that does not come into our purview officially, but we have instances noted of weavers who have been charged for spoilt work and that spoilt work has been afterwards sold; the material has not been given to the worker.

5103. Do you think that discipline could be maintained without these deductions ?—I think generally the idea is to prevent loss to the employer. Sometimes I think the employer puts upon the worker a loss which ought to be his own loss, but I do not think that is a very great evil—not so great an evil as some others.

5104. The next head is deductions for firing, light, rent, food and drink, etc. Three correspondents say none; one has to pay for tea. What is the meaning of that ?—It means they get tea in the afternoon, and have to pay for it.

5105. That is not a deduction; it is a charge for goods supplied ?—Yes, but it sometimes happens that the charge is made whether the tea is had or not.

5106. One firm charges 2d. for tea, but it is not compulsory ?—That is not a deduction at all.

5107. One correspondent says deductions for gas and hot water vary from ½d. to 1½d. per week. In one place girls sign agreement that 4s. a week be deducted for dinner and tea, and seemed to consider this a fair cost of food. Have you considered that case ?—We think that it is a bad plan. We do not think there is any hardship in that particular case, but it is a bad plan that girls should sign an agreement of that kind, because their position is such that they cannot resist it if it is enforced upon them. The food may not be good, and they may lose upon the bargain considerably. We do not think they do in this case, but we think the principle is a bad one.

Miss C. Black.

5108. Another girl pays 1d. a week for kitchen and ½d. for tea-making. Some shirt and collar firms charge 2s. 6d. for firing, but this is exceptional. Rope-makers pay 1s. 6d. a week for dinners ?—They may call them dinners, but I think they are not very much of meals. I also think it means that the employer is not charging full price.

5109. Needle case workers pay 1d. a week for gas for melting glue. Laundries sometimes charge 1d. a week for stove and lighting. Wholesale blouse making, 2d. a week for fire for warming food ; ½d. a day for cups of tea. Mantle making, 3d. for kitchen, whether food taken or not. —Yes, that is an instance.

5110. In Leicester, these deductions are said to be frequently to the disadvantage of assistants ?—Yes.

5111. Now, in regard to deductions for firing, light, etc., let me ask you this : in so far as all these things form part of what we may call the oncost of the business, do you think they should not be the subject of deductions at all ?—We think so, very strongly. We think they should not be the subject of deductions.

5112. Would you carry that principle to having hot water supplied and so on, when meals are taken on the premises ?—That seems to us to be very much on the line. It is a very difficult thing to say, but it seems to us a little hard that where hot water is part of the material for the workers, as it is of course in some works, it should not be given free for the purpose of tea. I am speaking of cases where hot water has to be supplied for shop purposes.

5113. Then the fifth item of your enquiries is deduction for sick and benefit clubs ?—Yes.

5114. Some correspondents say none ; in others the subscription is "entirely optional." In Birmingham ½d. or 1d. a week or fortnight is very general for sick club and hospital. In box making, 2d. a week or less. In book-binding, 1d. a week, optional ; 5s. sick pay when ill ?—Yes.

5115. In a paper factory, 2d. weekly for sick club, 8s. a week allowed if very ill, and shared out 2s. 6d. or 5s. at Christmas. Envelope making, some firms have none ; some 1d, a week sick fund : 7s. for two weeks. Some pay 6d. a week and get 10s. for six weeks and 5s. for six weeks. Some add the fines and share out at Christmas. Rope workers : women 1d., men 2d. Sick and burial club had only once been known to give out anything. Rope works 2d., envelope-making, ½d. in each 5s. earned for hospital ; very seldom any sick fund in laundries. Now, have you any observations to make with regard to these deductions for sick and benefit clubs ?—We have very strong views indeed upon the subject. We feel that the existence of a compulsory sick club in a firm really creates a penalty on leaving employment ; it puts a penalty upon the worker, a penalty involved in the workers' own payments. The employer inflicts a double penalty on dismissal, because by dismissing a worker, he can cause that worker to lose the benefit of his subscriptions. We also feel that it strongly operates against a real form of thrift, because very few workers can afford to belong to two societies. They have to belong to a more or less temporary society belonging to the firm which prevents them belonging to one of the larger and sounder provident societies to which so many workers belong. We are very much opposed indeed to an employer being allowed to institute a sick fund. Of course we do not feel that to the same extent with regard to deductions for hospitals, which are very frequent, except as regards the interference with the workers belonging to a friendly society. There are large numbers of places in which every worker is so strongly expected to subscribe 1d. a week to a hospital that it is practically compulsory, and in some places it is actually compulsory.

5116. What do you say to ordinary sick and benefit clubs ?—We feel they are very much worse.

5117. Then the sixth head is the obligation to buy from, or deal with, employers ?—Yes.

5118. One says none. Hosiery worker says only for needles to maintain uniform working of machines ?—Yes.

5119. In Leicester, there is no actual obligation, but it is more or less understood ?—Yes.

5120. Substantially, you have little or no evidence to give on that head ?—No ; we have had instances, but I think they do not exist now. I have known an instance of a man who made his home workers buy their cotton from him, and charged them ¼d. a reel more than they could get it retail, but that was not a recent case, and I do not know that it goes on now.

5121. The seventh head of enquiry was instances of penalty or dismissal for breach of obligation imposed on the worker to buy from, or deal with, employer ?—We do not seem to have had instances of this at all.

5122. Then the eighth head of your enquiry was as to the proportion borne by fines and deductions to weekly wages ?—Yes.

5123. Laundry workers say 7d. in 12s. wages ?—Yes ; a certain small group of laundry workers say that.

5124. Box making, etc., each girl has 2d. deducted. In one Paper factory it is said that a careful girl does not lose 1d. weekly on an average ; ready-made dressmaker says 1s. each week ?—I think that must be a ready-made dressmaker who is charged for power.

5125. In Leicester, fines are said to vary from 6d. to 6s. Can you give us any details about that ?—We have not further details. It has simply come to us in that way, that fines vary from 6d. to 6s.

5126. With regard to whether living in gives rise to abuse, a Leicester correspondent says it most certainly does ?—That is no doubt a shop assistant.

5127. We will come to that in another branch of our enquiry. Now, as to your suggestions ?—We feel that all classes of workers ought to come under the Act, except domestic servants. We do not see our way to include them. Except in the case of apprenticeship, we think that all conditions of hiring shall be declared illegal which require on the part of the workers the making of any payment or the submitting to any deduction. The reason we say "the making of any payment," is that the decision in Hewlett v. Allen seemed to open the door to demanding a payment if it was not a deduction from wages ; but as wages form practically the whole of the income of the worker, we do not think any distinction should be made.

5128. You suggest that the only exceptions to this prohibition should be disciplinary fines, and payment for wilful damage ?—Yes. We feel, however, that disciplinary fines are a bad way of maintaining discipline.

5129. I was going to ask you about that ?—We feel that very strongly, but we do not feel that we can ask the law to forbid them. Perhaps I might quote here the remarks of two employers which happened to come under my notice in the same week. One of them was a well known employer of labour who had a strike going on at the time. He has a confectionery works, where very rough girls work at very low wage. He said, "If I did not have fines in my factory it would be a bear garden." I happened in the same week to visit X. 10's factory at Dartford, and I asked the proprietor, who is now dead, the question. He said, "If I could not run a factory without fines, I should be ashamed to have one." I submit to you those two points of views of different employers.

5130. Then you suggest that neither a written agreement, nor any acquiescence on the workers part shall affect the illegality of such payments or deductions, nor the right of recovering money thus illegally deducted. I think we follow that ?—Of course we feel that if they cannot resist by word of mouth, they cannot resist in writing either ; they must put up with it.

5131. You think that compulsory sick clubs are unfair to the workers ?—Yes. I have given you my observations with regard to that, but there is one point which I did not mention, namely, that their solvency is apt to be precarious.

5132. You say that they put, at the worker's expense, an artificial premium upon his remaining in one employer's service ?—Yes.

5133. And they give to the employer the power of enforcing an extra penalty on dismissal ?—Yes. We also think that they are unfair to him by practically preventing him from belonging to the better sick clubs.

5134. They prevent the worker from joining larger societies ?—Yes; we feel that very much. Then I have made a note that the council has had reported to it one case, said not to be a solitary instance, of a retail shop in which the foreman was required to make up, as best he could every week, a certain—rather large—total of fines. I say that written evidence of this case cannot at the moment be produced, but the person reporting is known as trustworthy, and has herself verified the facts. I do not know whether you would care to go into this case. It is not a very recent one, and I believe it to be quite exceptional. It is a very bad one.

5135. I think we had better have it ?—This is the case. A lady, who is willing to come and give evidence of the case herself if you wish it—Miss Flora Kirwan, of 29, Palace Court, who is the head of the St. Edward's Roman Catholic Girls' Club—was some few years ago a regular visitor at one of the hospitals. She saw a man who was dying, who was very much troubled in his mind about this thing. He had been a foreman in a retail drapery and fancy goods shop and there had been a rule that he was to provide a certain sum by means of fines each week, which he tried to levy as indiscriminately as he could upon the different assistants. He had on one occasion fined two different girls 7s. out of a wage of 11s. a week to make up the total. He said he knew he was doing wrong, but he was a married man with children and could not afford to lose his place. Both of those girls took to bad courses, and he considered that that was upon his conscience when he was dying; it weighed on him very much. Miss Kirwan was inclined to think at first that his mind was wandering, but she visited the shop and made personal enquiries with regard to the case, got the names of the two girls, and followed them up. The tale was confirmed at every point. She found both girls. One of them she succeeded in putting into respectable work again, and I believe the girl is still alive and is doing well. With regard to the other, she was not able to keep her hold upon her, and she drifted away, and she does not know what has become of her. These facts Miss Kirwan got at the time, and had them in writing, but she has removed since and cannot find the books. She says she considers that in those circumstances the case is hardly definite enough for you, but she is willing enough to come and report it. She cannot give you the name of the shop, because she promised both the man and the girl that she would not, though she knows it quite well.

By Mrs. Tennant.

5137. You say that 1d. fine for talking or laughing seems not uncommon: can you give the Committee the names of any factories or workshops where, within your knowledge, that fine is imposed ?—I cannot give any one in which it is imposed at present within my knowledge. It used to be imposed by the firm T1 but I do not believe it is now. There are several cases mentioned here, but we have not the names of the firms. They were not given. No doubt they could be got from our informants.

5138. Your correspondent from Birmingham speaks of the complete absence of fines, have you more than one correspondent from Birmingham ?—No; it is Miss Matheson. We applied to another lady, and she was not able to give us any information of fines; she knew of none.

5139. Would you say that those ladies were fully aware of the conditions in the pen trade ?—I should think Miss Matheson was.

5140. We have had instances of fines relating to the pen trade which were considered bad ?—We do not feel that our information is in the least degree exhaustive.

5141. With regard to relief stamping, I do not know whether you state the district to which your information refers ?—Do you mean the case in which damaged work was charged for ?

5142. Yes. I am not sure whether you mentioned the district ?—No, I did not. I have it here. I think it is a London case, so far as I remember.

5143. Was the information given by a relief stamper herself, or by somebody interested in her ?—I think hers is a club case, and that the leader of the club took notes of it and passed them on to us. I have not the names of the girls, because we promised we would not give the names. If we had not made that promise we should not have got the information.

5144. Then it is only the impression of the lady ?—Oh, no; it is a direct statement from the girl.

5145. I had not finished. I was going to say it is only the impression of the lady that the charge does not work out heavily upon the workers ?—That is my own impression, merely from seeing relief stamping and knowing that it is done page by page. She does not express an opinion.

5146. It is your own impression ?—Yes. It is my own impression that it is not a very heavy charge.

5147. We have had some evidence on that point from one of the inspectors. I think the Inspector's impression was that it did work hardly ?—I am only giving you my own impression, judging from the process as I have seen it.

5148. That was characteristic of that factory, not of the industry ?—No; of that particular factory.

5149. You say that though you would like to see fines abolished, you do not feel you can advocate their abolition ?—That is with regard to disciplinary fines. Well, the Council has come to that conclusion. Personally, I should be inclined to advocate their prohibition altogether, but the Council, which I am, of course, representing, does not see its way to ask that disciplinary fines should be forbidden by law.

5150. Do you know on what grounds your Council have come to that conclusion ?—They seem to feel that an employer ought to be allowed a certain latitude in the way in which he enforces discipline, and that there might be cases in which a fine is a preferable alternative to dismissal. I think myself that that is a mistake on the part of my Council. I do not wish to dissociate myself from the Council which I am representing, but I should go further than they do; for my own part, I should like to see disciplinary fines abolished by law.

5151. Have you in your experience known cases in which firms which had adopted the system of fining have abandoned it with success ?—Not in my personal experience. I have had such a case quoted to me lately of a large London shop, but it is not within my personal experience.

5152. You gave the case of X. 10. They have never had fines ?—They have never had any fines there.

By Mr. Walsh.

5153. I should like to ask you some questions very largely on the same lines upon which Mrs. Tennant has already questioned you. Your own idea is that the fines really do not maintain discipline ?—That is my impression.

5154. You say here that a number of girls in one particular factory are fined for every conceivable thing ?—I think that is a shop, not a factory; I think it is a retail shop.

5155. In which, however, many girls will probably be employed ?—Yes.

5156. It will be a large retail shop ?—Yes.

5157. You say that the fines are largely dependent upon the caprice of the official at the moment ?—They very often are.

5158. I do not know how far we can dissociate you from your council, but is it your own opinion that if disciplinary fines were to be allowed, that it would open the whole door again to the establishment of a system which you consider vicious ? That is, if the fines were dependent upon the caprice of the individual who had the power to exact them, is it your opinion that the whole door would be open to the establishment of a fining system which you consider wrong in principle ?—I think it ought not to be very difficult to discriminate, but I do think that a certain degree of evil, a certain degree of unfairness, is admitted by allowing even disciplinary fines. I do think that.

Miss C. Black.

5159. My point is this : I wish to put to you that the word " discipline " is an extremely elastic one ?—Yes.

5160. And that what some people would consider a fair standard of discipline might be considered by other people, under exactly the same circumstances, a very low standard of discipline ?—That is so.

5161. And therefore there would be no assurance, or no safety, for the workers who had to depend upon the particular standard of discipline in a certain person's mind. Would there be safety, in your opinion ? Could they have much assurance that fines would not be imposed unfairly ?—I think a certain number of fines would be imposed, but at the same time I think that the worst evils might be escaped even if disciplinary fines remained. Personally, I should like to see them go, but I do not think they are so bad that one must insist upon them going.

5162. You gave us two very striking cases where the workings of the minds of men in control were absolutely dissimilar ?—Absolutely.

5164. That shows the very great elasticity of the word " discipline," does it not ?—Yes.

5165. You say that workers are prevented from joining larger, more permanent, and sounder provident societies, because they are compelled to pay to the shop clubs : do you know of any case where for that reason they are prevented from retaining their membership in larger and sounder societies ?—I cannot say that I do, but where the wages are so very low it is fairly obvious that it is impossible for them to afford both subscriptions.

5166. Therefore, although you know of no special case, you think that on account of the pressure the workers must cease their membership of the larger society ?—I do not think it takes the form of their ceasing their member ship. They go fairly young to the factory, where they have a club—I am speaking of girls chiefly—and then they do not join the other.

5167. Are you aware that in the weavers' trade, particularly in Lancashire, they have for many years done witho it a system of fines altogether ?—Yes.

5168. Are you aware of that ?—I am not aware of it. I said " Yes " acknowledging it, but I was not aware of it as a fact, though I knew that fines were much less in some trades.

5169. I am told they are non-existent in the weavers' trade. I suppose the nature of the girls is very much the same in both places ?—Yes. I think it is always the mark of a bad employer to have much fining ; it is the mark of a mismanaged factory.

5170. Just a few questions on some of the points you have raised. With regard to fines for talking and laughing, how would the employer justify them under the Truck Act, 1896 ? Does he really maintain that they cause interruption or hindrance to his business ?—That would no doubt be the line he would take.

5171. Could he seriously maintain that ?—I should think not, but I do not think a case has ever been tried. It may, perhaps, interest the Committee to know that in the case of a big confectionery works where the girls went out on strike, after they had been out for two or three days, many of the best conducted among them were hoarse, and they attributed it to the fact that they had been able to talk, whereas they had been accustomed to be absolutely silent in the factory. They thought they became hoarse because they were able to talk all day. That they were hoarse, I can testify, because I heard them.

5172. Looking at the matter from the employer's point of view, you do not think there is any ground at all for saying that talking and laughing cause any interruption to business ?—No. I think probably it is easier for the foreman to insist upon absolute silence than to prevent noisiness. I take it that is really the explanation of it. To make a hard and fast rule that nobody shall speak is a little easier than to keep conversation at a proper level. But, of course, they ought not to be allowed to tyrannise like that ; I think it is quite shameful.

5173. In one case you mentioned that the workers were simply dismissed if they failed to obey the rules : was dismissal inflicted for any trivial infringement of the rules ?—No. I have no doubt that they discharged the workers only for serious infringement of the rules, which seems to us much the better plan.

5174. In the case of a laundry, where you said 1s. in the £ was deducted for irons and so on, even when not in use during the whole week ?—It would mean in use by the particular worker.

5175. Is not that an infringement of the Truck Act, 1896 ?—I should think so, certainly.

5176. Has that been brought to the notice of the inspectors ?—No ; we have only lately had it brought to us ; but it certainly should be brought to the notice of the inspectors, and we propose to do so.

5177. With regard to the Birmingham cases, you mentioned that the corset makers said their wages had been raised to meet the deductions : why did the employer introduce the system of charging for materials and at the same time raising wages ; in order, I suppose, to cover the average amount of the deductions ?—I suppose so.

5178. What was his object ?—I cannot conceive what his object was. I think that Miss Matheson writes that " the corset makers say wages have been raised to meet these deductions " because she thinks there must be some other explanation. She does not say that they have been raised, but that the corset makers say they have been raised. She probably thinks there is some other explanation.

5179. It looks as though the employer thought there would be some advantage in the system by which he supplied materials and deducted the amount from the wages ?—We are frequently met in the tailoring trade by the declaration that if the workers were not made to pay for trimmings and so on, they would use too much. That may be in this employer's mind too.

5180. Do you think there is anything in that ?—No, I do not.

5182. I am speaking of cases where they have to find their own gum and materials : you mentioned a number of them ?—I should have thought that the law could have made it compulsory for the employer to provide the materials which are in the finished product which is actually sold to the public. I do not see that it can be made compulsory for the employer to find such things as brushes, because some workers might prefer a particular brush of her own ; but things which are actually sold to the public, like the glue in fancy boxes or paper in fancy boxes should, I think, be provided by the employer.

5183. There is no question here of deduction or fine ?—We feel that the compulsion to buy certain goods ought to come under the prohibition of the law.

5184. Do you suggest there is any abuse in the employer saying to a worker, " I will employ you, but I shall expect you to find your own tools or your own materials " ?—We think the finding of the materials is exactly the same as all the other deductions, and that whether a worker has to buy them out of her own pocket or whether they are deducted at the end of the week, makes very little difference to her—that it is really practically a deduction. Tools probably come under a different heading, but we feel very strongly that material is a deduction in whatever form it is taken from the worker.

5185. Is there any actual abuse ?—There is precisely the same abuse as in the case of charging for power and so on ; it is on all-fours, I think.

5186. Is the worker ever taken advantage of ? Does not the worker presumably make the contract with her eyes open ?—She does not always know. There is no written contract or agreement in those matters. In some factories the workers provide their own glue or gum, and in other factories it is provided for them. It is not a matter over which the worker has, practically, any control. She is generally told that her wage will be so much and the question of glue or gum would not be entered into at the time.

5187. If the gum or glue were provided by the employer would the wages be reduced ?—No, I do not think so, because they are so low already that they could not be reduced.

5188. Do you think that any hard and fast line could be drawn between certain materials ?—Yes. I think that that which enters into the sold product, that which is actually sold in the finished product, ought not to be provided for by the worker. That is the line which I should like to see drawn.

5189. You mentioned several cases where dressmakers had to pay for spoilt material : do you mean by that that they had to take the garment ?—It is generally in the course of making up, before it gets to that stage. It is generally a mistake in the cutting.

5190. She has to pay the value of the whole of the material if badly cut ?—She has to pay for the value of the piece she has cut ; it would not be the whole dress necessarily.

5191. Would not that often exceed the actual loss to the employer ? An employer can only deduct, in the case of damaged work, an amount equal to the loss sustained by him, but if the worker has to pay the actual value of the material badly cut, surely that must exceed the loss to the employer ?—No, not necessarily. Let us suppose it was a skirt and one breadth of the skirt was cut wrong ; then an equal length of material must be bought to replace it. That is what the worker is made to pay. I think she should not be made to pay it, but it is not so manifestly unfair as some.

5192. But the material which is badly cut is not absolutely useless ?—It may be absolutely useless. In the case I have quoted she has the material.

5193. But the employer may only deduct an amount equal to the actual loss sustained by him ; he cannot set off the value of the material which he gives to the worker ? —No.

5194. So that unless the material is rendered absolutely useless, these cases which you have mentioned are illegal ? Have they been brought to the notice of the factory inspector ?—No. The worker in the particular case I have quoted does not consider she lost much, because she raffled the piece of stuff among the workers. That, of course, do esnot alter the law, but it alters her willingness to bring a case.

5195. You think many of these cases do not come to the notice of the factory inspectors ?—Yes ; I think a great many do not.

5196. Because the girl does not feel she has suffered hardship ?—Yes, and again, she is very unwilling to make herself marked. No doubt there are abuses, but I do not think they are very excessive, though I think it is a charge which should not be made.

5197. You have called attention to one or two cases in which the workers, instead of having to pay for the damaged work, had to do it over again ?—Those are generally cases where the material is of very little value.

5198. Do you suggest that is an abuse ?—It is very difficult to say. It is a case exactly upon the line.

5199. Would it be usually the case that there would be no punishment for piece workers ?—No punishment at all, and I imagine it is generally piece workers. The particular cases we have brought forward are instances in which the material is of very little value, envelope folding and things like that. I do not think we suggest that should come under the Act, though I think abuses might arise.

5200. Would those deductions for food and drink and so on which you have referred to be in factories ?—One case is a rope works, and I am not sure whether a rope works is, strictly speaking, a factory.

Miss C. Black.

7 Nov. 1906.

5201. Yes, a factory or workshop. Is it not an infringement of the Truck Act 1831 ?—I am inclined to think it is.

5202. You do not suggest the Act of 1831 is insufficient to deal with cases like that ?—I forget for the moment the exact clause. I think it forbids the selling to the worker of food except when it is prepared and cooked on the employer's premises. Well, this is prepared and cooked on the employer's premises. I will not be quite sure, but my impression is that that is what the Act says.

5203. Whatever the law is, you are only here to give information ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

5204. I think you are right there. But are you suggesting this as a case of abuse ? Are you suggesting that those powers should be taken away ?—We are suggesting it. We think that it ought not to be done We know it is not illegal at present, but we suggest that all conditions of hiring shall be declared illegal which require on the part of the workers the making of any payment or the submitting to any deduction and that the only exceptions to this prohibition shall be disciplinary fines and payments for wilful damage. We think cooked food should come under it.

5205. Is it not an advantage to the workers to have a meal cooked on the premises ?—Yes, there is very often considerable advantage, but we think on the whole it is outweighed by the disadvantage.

5206. You raise the question of compulsory shop clubs ; has any action been taken under the Shop Clubs Act ?—Yes. The Women's Trade Union Association, which is the parent society to my society carried through the whole case of Hewlett v. Allen, which is the test case.

5207. That was under the Truck Act. You know the Shop Clubs Act 1902 which provides for compulsory shop clubs except under certain conditions ?—No. I do not know that any case has been tried. The existence of compulsory shop clubs is very general.

5208. But the matter is dealt with by the Shop Clubs Act 1902 : " It shall be an offence under this Act if an employer shall make it a condition of employment that any workman shall join a shop club or thrift fund unless the shop club or thrift fund is registered under the Friendly Societies' Act 1896, subject to the provisions of this Act, and certified under this Act by the registrar of friendly societies." Then certain conditions are imposed as to registration ?—It does not mention sick club, does it ?

5209. Yes. " The expression ' Shop Club ' or ' Thrift Fund ' means every club and society for providing benefits to workmen in connection with a workshop, factory, dock, shop, or warehouse ? "—It is only on the condition of their being registered ; it does not make them in the least degree illegal.

5210. No, but it places them under strict regulations ? —Yes. But it does not affect our first point, of their putting a premium on remaining in one employment. It only affects our third point, with regard to their solvency. Our fourth point, that it interferes with their joining more permanent societies, is not affected.

5211. I think your first point is dealt with by a later section of the Act which says that if a workman ceases to be a member of the shop club, he has to be compensated to a certain extent. He is either allowed to remain a member or he has to receive the actuarial value of his share in the funds of the club. That rather meets your first point, and the solvency is guaranteed by the Registrar. But you have not considered that Act ?—No, I do not think so. We object very much in regard to the sick clubs to the employers' dictation as to how provision for the future shall be made by the workers. We think that is wrong and unfair altogether.

By Mr. Maddison.

5212. I should like to ask you whether you regard these thirty replies which you have received as fairly representative ?—I think they are.

Miss C. Black.

7 Nov. 1906.

5213. And so regarding them, what is the impression on your mind? Does it indicate a bad state of affairs, or an improved state of affairs, or what?—It seems to me that things are perhaps a shade improved since I first enquired into this question. We do not find quite such flagrant instances as I have met with in former years.

5214. Taking this digest, on the whole does it indicate a very bad state of affairs on the subject we are enquiring into?—I think it indicates an unsatisfactory state of affairs.

5215. You have made it plain that you personally, with your great experience, would be prepared to advise us to abolish disciplinary fines altogether?—I personally should, but my council does not instruct me to say that.

5216. I quite follow the distinction, and it is your own opinion I am asking for now. Would you say that if disciplinary fines were made illegal, there would not be some considerable danger of girls, where there is a great deal of girl labour, being discharged very readily?—I do not think it is possible that they could be discharged more readily than they are now.

5217. Discharges are very frequent now?—Yes, and they are discharged for every trifle quite readily. The constant fluctuation of girls' work is so great that it is difficult to think it could be increased.

5218. Assuming that Parliament would not go so far as to prohibit fines altogether, would it in your view be an improvement if they were limited to a percentage of the wages, that is to say, that no fines should exceed more than a certain percentage of the wages per week, not by accumulation, but in that particular week?—Yes; I think that would be an improvement.

5219. If so, have you any percentage in your mind? We are talking of girls, chiefly. Have you any percentage in your own mind up to which an employer should be permitted to fine?—I have not considered it, because I confess that suggestion had not occurred to me, so that I really have not an answer ready to that.

5220. I notice you confine your view with regard to prohibition to disciplinary fines?—Yes.

5221. I gather you would not try to prohibit payments for wilful damage?—Well, it is very difficult to do that. We feel that "wilful damage" is not a satisfactory way of putting it, because it opens the door to all sorts of discussion as to what is wilful. On the other hand, we feel that sheer accident ought to be carefully excluded. We do not feel it is satisfactory.

5222. I wish to know whether you—not your Council—but you, in your statement about the prohibition of fines, also want to include prohibition of payments for damage—a certain kind of damage at any rate?—I think that ought to be very carefully guarded. I think there is a certain damage which ought not to be deducted for. For instance, it is within my knowledge that a certain firm of refreshment contractors deduct enormously for breakages. I think they ought to be prevented from deducting for the breakages of customers from their employees' wages, as they sometimes do, but it is difficult to say that they should be prevented from deducting for a tumbler broken by an employee.

5223. In your experience, what rule obtains as to deductions from weekly wage-earners in, say, the case of relief stamping? They are very rare, I suppose?—Very rare, in that particular case.

5224. But in other similar cases, what is the practice prevailing as to deductions for damages in the case of a weekly wage-earner?—There is no general rule, but I have known cases, for instance, of girls filling jam jars, where, when a jar has been broken, the girls have had to pay at the end of the week when their wages are paid—it has not been deducted, but they have had to pay it—for the whole price of the jar of jam, while, at the same time, the bits of glass have been picked out, more or less perfunctorily, and the jam has been sold to the public.

Miss GERTRUDE TUCKWELL was called; and Examined.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

9 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

5225. You are chairman of the Women's Trades Union League?—Yes, that is so.

5226. Does that League number about 100,000 women trades unionists?—Yes.

5227. Are you aware of the objects for which this Committee has been appointed?—Yes, I think so.

5228. Am I right in supposing that your League particularly sympathises with the case of the shop assistants?—Their association is affiliated to us. We have a right to speak for them; but I understand you are likely to take evidence from the shop assistants themselves. Miss Bondfield, the assistant secretary, is absolute mistress of the whole case and it seemed to me better not to trench on the ground that she will cover, except to give you instances of the sort of complaints we get from this particular trade, which has a fairly strong organisation.

5229. Does Miss Bondfield represent the female shop assistants?—She is assistant secretary to the whole.

5230. What about the textile leaders?—I presume evidence will be given by them for their own organisation. The textile organisations are in great numbers affiliated to us, and are now proposing to affiliate to us through their Amalgamation, which will represent the affiliation of the entire body. I understand, however, Mr. Shackleton hopes to give evidence, and I understand also that a woman member is hoping to give evidence. With regard to the shop assistants, I would like to give you a sample or two of the complaints we receive.

League has a central executive in London, and of that all the secretaries of the different organisations connected with us are ex officio members. They can attend if they please. Our organisers go round the various organisations once a year and attend meetings and give them advice; sometimes oftener than once a year. The different unions are all in close correspondence with our secretary, Miss Macarthur, and in that way any grievances of the various bodies are brought to our notice. We have been in the habit for years past of keeping the record of their complaints under various heads, so it is not as the result of any special whip but as an outcome of our usual experience that I can offer evidence.

5232. The main concern of your League is with the condition of the workers ?—Yes.

5233. And the remedies for various grievances may be classified under various headings, legislative and otherwise ?—Yes.

5234. Now we can come to your examples, if you please ?—I have only brought a few as to the shop assistants as I did not want to overlap Miss Bondfield's evidence. Here is one case of a girl serving in a large drapery establishment. During sale time there is a rush of customers and her check book was lost or stolen. It contained a record of the premiums or commissions she was entitled to, about £1; but the firm would not pay that, and not only so but they fined her 2s. 6d. for losing her book.

5235. May we have the name of the firm ?—It is a large drapery establishment in Hammersmith.

5236. Are such complaints brought before the League in ordinary course ?—Yes.

5237. Is it a fact that complaints have been brought before you with reference to large establishments in which there are from 150 to 200 fines and deductions ?—That concerns the shop assistants.

5238. No doubt we shall have evidence from Miss Bondfield on such points, but is it in accordance with your knowledge as chairman of the League that there are fines in some establishments to such a huge number as that ?—I ought to say that I have not given very special attention to the shop assistants' grievances, because of the great skill shown by Miss Bondfield and others in dealing with them; but I know that this is not an unusual instance. I have one case in my mind at Chelsea, where the fines ranged from 5s. downwards, and the list of fines and deductions was kept in the manager's office. It was only seen accidentally upon the room being cleared for cleaning and whitewashing. The girls ran the risk of frequent punishments and really do not know for what they are liable to punishment.

5239. You know the provisions of the Act of 1896 ?—Yes.

5240. Probably you would have little hesitation in pronouncing that that is a systematic violation of that Act ?—Well, we thought so; but there is nobody appointed under the 1896 Act to enforce the protection of the shop assistants. We had hoped ourselves to take a case, but at the last moment the young lady most likely to give successful evidence was promoted to a branch establishment and the whole thing dropped through.

5241. Have you yourself any doubt that that system exists to a disastrous extent in shops ?—No; none.

5242. Do you think it is a case in which the legislature ought to attempt more effectively to interfere ?—Yes, absolutely. I don't know whether I ought to trouble the Committee with somewhat personal matters: but not long ago I was at a large West End shop buying gloves, when a very irate shopwalker came up to a lad who had hurried in and said, "You are going to be fined 2s." The boy asked "What for ?" and the reply was "Because you were rung for twice." The boy turned to another man and remarked, "I would not mind if it had been just." That is the sort of comment we often hear; but the matter seems to be beyond control.

5243. We shall have evidence later from Mr. Shackleton, also from Miss Bondfield and the other lady as to their skilled trades. Having regard to that fact, perhaps you would give us evidence with regard to the less skilled women workers in factory, workshop and home ?—Yes.

5244. What is the nature or category of their employment ?—I have before me a list of complaints from different trades, including tarpaulin waggon covers and sackmaking, feather curlers, cap makers, envelope makers, upholstery trimming manufacturers, jam making, shirt machinists, embossing works, printing, blouse manufacturing, tailors, especially in "ready made" and "slop" work, capsule making, cartridge works, shirt and millinery manufacturing, paper making, mat making, making of children's frocks, etc. (see Appendix VIII., A.)

5245. Do most of these trades represent home work ?—Not all; they are mixed.

5246. Have you an idea of the average wage of these women workers ?—Yes.

5247. In the case of those employed in factories or workshops, what would be their average wage ?—Probably from 8s. to 10s. per week.

5248. And less for those who work at home ?—Yes, sometimes down to 3s. per week.

5249. Generally speaking, what relation does the pay for such classes of work bear to the subsistence level ?—No relation at all.

5250. Is the wage below it ?—Oh, yes. I think the lowest on which a girl can live in one our of big towns, clothing herself properly, feeding herself decently and allowing perhaps a shilling now and then for some entertainment, without a penny for saving, is 15s. per week. I have based that estimate upon a detailed computation as to the cost of lodging, washing, dressing, etc.

5251. Your estimate would include rent ?—Oh, yes.

5252. Of course when a working girl in such a position of life is one of a family, she could live at less cost ?—But she would have to pay the mother and help to keep the family together.

5253. Your estimate strikes one as rather high ?—If the Committee knew the sort of prices that girls have to pay as part of their regular daily expenses, including 'bus fares, etc., they would realise that I am not putting it too high; indeed, some of our people tell me I have put the estimate rather low.

5254. Would you oblige the Committee by confirming or illustrating your estimate with details showing how you make up the 15s. ?—Yes (see Question 5718).

5255. It may not be strictly within our province, but it bears on the question of the relation of fines and deductions to the wage question. As we have now got your view about the subsistence level and the wages, please tell us what you have to say about the deductions from the wage, in the form of disciplinary fines, etc. ?—I can quote some illustrative cases. Here is a case of feather curlers (U 1); workers, if five minutes late, are shut out and fivepence deducted. The wages are 5s. per week, and the working hours are from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., with three-quarters of an hour for dinner.

5256. Shut out for how long ?—For the day I imagine; at all events till the dinner hour.

5257. Are they pieceworkers ?—No, employed on a set wage. My next case is (V 1) a firm of cap makers; workers, if ten minutes late, are shut out and fined half-day's wage; wages, cap cutters, 6s. per week; stampers, 7s. per week, hours 8 a.m. to 7 p.m.; one hour for dinner. Take next the case of a jam factory (W 1); fine of 6d. if workers arrive after the gates are shut (at 8 a.m.); average wage 10s. In the case of another firm (X 1) workers receiving 9s. to 10s. per week are fined if one minute late. My next case is that of some confectionery works, and here I have lumped disciplinary and other fines together to give an idea of the totals arrived at:—(Y 1): fines for being late; 2d. weekly for sick club; value of tools spoiled or lost either fined or deducted; dismissal for swearing; 1d. for doctor; 1½d. for Saturday hour short: wages 5s. 9½d. The fines for unpunctuality vary from 1d. to 6d.; a worker who is late for the first time 1d., the second 2d., and so on. Another case of a jam factory is "disciplinary" purely (Z 1). Burns frequently oblige workers to attend Guy's Hospital: in this case 2d. is deducted from wages for every hour worker is absent. A bad burn entails dismissal: wages from 8s. to 10s per week. This firm dismisses workers for such trifles as the fetching of hot water from one floor to another. The next case I may quote (A 2) is a firm which makes upholstery silk trimmings: if the worker is ten minutes late she is sent home and 6d. deducted from her wages. In the case of a firm engaged in the chromographic enamel trade (B 2), my note says "making tea, 1s. and 2s. fines; eating bread and butter, 6d.; fined for talking.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

9 Nov. 1906.

5258. What does "making tea" mean?—They try to boil and make their own tea, but it is not allowed by the firm.

5259. What is the wage in these cases?—From 9s. to 10s. per week. In the case of an Irish firm the stated wage is 6s. and bonus of 1d. on every shilling earned, if late 1d. in the shilling deducted as well as lost time.

5260. What is the nature of the business?—Textile. There is a case of a firm in Manchester employing home workers, who are fined for not shopping work at given hours.

5261. What are the wages?—I do not know in that case: but I mentioned the case because it raises an interesting and rather difficult question. There is next a firm of cardboard manufacturers (C 2) where girls are stopped 2d. for being late—pay 2d. an hour in machine room. My next note has reference to a cotton weaving firm (D 2) in Lancashire, where there is a fine of 1d. for being late; 6d. going in at breakfast time; 2s. 6d. if a day off is taken (piece workers). In a firm (E 2), my note is: Unpunctuality may entail "play" for a fortnight: equals fine of 16s., the average wage being 8s. per week.

By Mr. Delevingne.

5262. Do you mean that they are suspended for a fortnight?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

5263. Are you satisfied that the workers know what is the penalty for each particular offence?—Only in some cases.

5264. Is there in these cases a notice or contract set out in some prominent place in the factory, so that workers may see it and know?—In some cases such a notice is exhibited, but in a great many cases it is not put where it can be seen.

5265. Are any of these precautions taken with regard to home workers?—There ought to be a list of fines, etc., in the room where they come for the work.

5266. But is there?—In some cases.

5267. Not in all cases?—No.

5268. With regard to these fines for unpunctuality, have you any general view that they are much too heavy relatively to the wages paid?—It seems to me that they have no relation to the wages. The fines so far as I can make out are never proportioned to the loss in time.

5269. Nor to the loss indirectly caused through disorganizing the work?—The amount of fines seems extremely in excess of any disorganisation which could be caused by one girl being late.

5270. Or any possible loss?—Yes.

5271. Perhaps the unpunctuality fines are based not on extent of damage or loss but on disciplinary grounds?—Yes.

5272. Suppose that fines were abolished altogether, do you think discipline could be maintained?—I have no doubt of it.

5273. We value your opinion on that point, but we should be glad to know your grounds for it?—It is based on observation. You will find in some factories a thoroughly well-ordered room under a good foreman or forewoman in which there is an absence of punishments. You may find in a neighbouring factory or perhaps in another room of the same factory continual fining and continual disorder. I was myself originally a board school mistress, and my experience in that respect confirms my view. A good teacher can manage very well without punishments, whereas a bad teacher may be always punishing and yet not secure good order.

5274. You think the same principle applies to industrial concerns?—Yes, I think so certainly.

5275. Do you know of any cases where fines have been abolished?—Yes, there are certain well-known firms such as E. 10, who have abolished fines. They are good employers.

5276. What is their line of business?—General drapery. After a good deal of reflection, Cadbury has abolished fines I understand.

5277. What has been the effect in those cases? Has it been satisfactory?—I believe so. I have heard nothing to the contrary.

5278. I have some general questions to put to you on the whole subject afterwards, but now we will take your evidence with regard to deductions for damaged work. You know the system of compelling workers to buy their work?—I do. The first case with regard to damaged work is a paper factory. Twenty girls sort 115 reams of paper. The paper is passed through the mill and sent to London. It is partly through the press when complaints are sent that four sheets of broken paper had been found which ought to have been laid out by the girls. The sheets could not be identified because so many processes had taken place. The forewoman fined the girls 2s. each.

5279. How many girls were there?—Twenty.

5280. Now pause for a moment, and answer me this if you can. Was there a rule authorising that to be done?—I do not know whether there was a rule or not; I should say there probably was. I mean, I should say that there was probably some abstract of the Truck Act, some list of fines and deductions put up.

5281. The case you have given was one in which a cumulative fine of £2 was imposed, while the actual damage or loss was four sheets of paper: am I right in so putting it?—Yes.

5282. That fine of £2 could not under such circumstances be defended on the ground that it was to recoup that damage or loss. What then is the reason for such a system?—I imagine that the reason for the system is——

5283. Discipline, again?—Of course, one draws one's own conclusions. Seeing that these deductions put a very large sum into the pocket of the firm, I think in some cases that they may look upon it as an addition to the gains of the firm.

5284. Will you furnish the name of that firm to the Secretary?—Yes, I will get it.

5285. That is one case of deductions for damaged work?—Yes. The interesting part of that, apart from what you have asked me, was that the girls were fined for a thing which could not be traced to them.

5286. I follow that. So that they have to fine the gang, so to speak?—Then the next case is ———— & Co., a jam factory. (F. 2.) There are exorbitant deductions: 3d. for each empty glass jar broken; full value charged if a jar containing jam was broken, although jam was not wasted, but put into the "mixed fruit tub," to be sold at a reduced price. The manager on being questioned said it was not worth it, that it did not represent the loss, but that it taught the girls to be careful. Then ———— Bros., wholesale clothiers. (*G.*2.) Exorbitant deductions; trouser finishing paid for at the rate of 2s. 3d. per dozen pairs; 9d. was deducted, as buttons were sewn on in wrong places on one and a half dozen pairs. The work was taken in by a cousin, but informant (an outworker) had to go up to the factory and alter the buttons there herself as well as having 9d. deducted from 3s. 4½d. Messrs. ———— a London firm engaged in mat-making. (H. 2.) This is home work again. If there is any defect in the mat, such as a falling short of the exact length prescribed owing to its being too tightly woven, the worker is compelled to buy the mat at its full price. The mats are sold at 1s. 11d. each.

5287. What are the wages paid?—This is home work, and one of the lowest paid descriptions. I will get you the exact figure. I imagine the wage would be 4s. to 5s. a week. Jam and Pickle Factory. (I. 2.) This I give as bearing on compulsory, as opposed to voluntary fines. The business is tying and carrying 1 lb. jars: 2d. for putting on a wrong label, and fines for breakages. There were fines for other things, among them deducting for a hospital. After the inspector's visit, the 1d. a week to the hospital box, which had been paid compulsorily, was paid voluntarily. Of course, the construction to be placed on "voluntarily" is left to the Committee. I have a great many instances of voluntary deductions. ———— Jam Factory. (K. 2.) Two shillings and sixpence charged for broken glasses out of a wage of 10s. or 11s. per week. ———— Blouse and skirt maker. (L. 2.) Payment stopped or deductions made in cases where work required alteration. Example: in the case of skirts (at 5s. per dozen) payment stopped for half a day. On one and a half dozen blouses at 3s. per dozen in which strapping was omitted because of worker's illness, 2s. 4d. was deducted. Here is another case of home work—blousemakers. (*M.*2.) Deductions made for slight faults in work. Also worker must supply material for trimming blouses if that given her is not sufficient. Examples: When in stitching the armhole of a blouse the velvet caught, a worker had 8s. deducted and was obliged to keep the blouse. On other occasions, 9d. and 2s. 6d. were deducted for extra trimming on cashmere blouses made with thirty-six tucks and twelve bands of narrow velvet ribbon, which are paid for at the rate of 3s. 6d. per dozen.

5288. What does that kind of worker earn per week? I am always trying to get at the comparison?—You are right. I should not like to give it to you at random. This worker could have earned about 1s. 9d. a day. The next are blouse makers. (N. 2.) This is also home work. Deductions made for alterations. Any alterations required are made by the inworkers. An out-worker had 2s. and 3s. deducted from work paid for at the rate of 6s. per dozen (blouses).

By Mr. Delevingne.

5289. May I ask in respect of what were the deductions made?—The alterations were required, and those were made by the in-workers. The work I suppose was not done absolutely to sample. In one case 2s. and in another case 3s. was deducted for alterations from the price of 6s. per dozen.

5290. Does that represent the payment to the in-worker?—No, I should say not. I have never heard of such a system.

By the Chairman.

5291. What we want to get at is the relation that 2s. or 3s. bears to the cost of putting the thing right. In your judgment, what could this mistake have been rectified for? Or could the goods have been sold notwithstanding that the sample was varied from to a certain extent?—I should say certainly. I have already given some instances in which the thing was afterwards sold at the full price. I remember I gave one just now. That of course very frequently happens. I do not consider from my experience of home work and that of the friends working with me that these deductions either from home work or from the lower skilled factory work do represent damage done; in the great majority of cases they represent a payment into the employer's pocket over and above the damage done.

5292. The ostensible object may be to repay the damage done, but the true object is discipline: may I put it so?—If you like to put it in that kind way.

5293. I mean that is the best defence that could be offered for it?—Yes, if there is any defence which can be offered for making deductions like that from a sum which is never in any case a living wage. The next are———— shirt makers, Poplar. (O. 2.) When a shirt is wrongly cut, the worker is fined or allowed to buy the shirt. Then ———— makers of underclothing, Stratford. (P. 2.) Deductions are made where work is damaged, and certain work is paid for at a reduced rate. In the case of a chemise soiled through being caught in a machine, 1s. 2d. was deducted. I have not the rate of pay, but it averages 8s. to 10s., and in the home work cases a little below that.

5294. Your next head is "Deductions for materials; payments by worker to employer for or in respect of anything deducted by employers"?—That was intended for an abbreviation of Section 3 of the Act of 1896. The first are ————, blouse manufacturers, (Q. 2.) Exorbitant deductions. Halfpenny in every 1s. earned for steam to drive the machine; 6d. a week for cotton. If earning over 5s. a week 2d. a week is deducted for kitchen girl. The kitchen girl only gets 8s. 6d. a week, though nearly 100 girls pay the 2d. The kitchen girl is paid by the deduction from the other girls while at work. She gets 8s. 6d. though there are 100 2d.'s.

5295. What wage do the girls get who contribute the 2d.?—I have not the exact amount here, but I take the average as 8s. or 10s.

5296. Assuming the wage to be 10s., the ½d. for steam for every 1s. amounts to 5d.?—Yes.

5297. And 6d. per week for cotton makes 11d. certain off each girl's wage?—Yes.

5298. And then she has the other 2d. deducted?—If she earns over 5s. a week.

5299. I am taking the 10s. case?—Yes, then she has 2d. per week to pay also.

5300. That makes 1s. 1d.?—Yes.

5301. So that a 10s. operative thus earns 8s. 11d., and the 8s. operative earns 6s. 11d. net wage?—Yes.

5302. That 6s. 11d. or 8s. 11d., as the case may be, is then subject to all the other fines and deductions in respect of discipline, loss, and so on, on other heads, in the same factory?—Yes.

5303. You have given us deductions for steam and cotton. Have you any other examples?———— ladies' tailors. (R. 2.) Deductions for cook, 2d. Four hundred machinists' pay, equals £3 6s. 8d. per week. Cook receives 14s. For lateness, five minutes 4d. These complaints have all gone to the factory inspectors. Those they could deal with they have dealt with, and it may be possible that they have been able to do something. Then the next (S. 2.) Fining for accidents to machinery: four girls fined 1s. a week till repairs paid for. Wages 10s. or 11s. a week.

5304. Was that accident caused by the girls?—It may or may not be.

5305. Then a firm in Leeds. (T. 2.) There the particulars books were paid for. It is a clothing factory, so that they have to give particulars, that is to say they have a contract with their workers as to the amount which is to be paid on any job, and the little book in which those particulars, which are required by law to be furnished, are entered, had to be paid for. That is one of the many cases we have sent into the factory inspectors.

5306. Are deductions made for hospitals in any of those cases?—I have many instances of that.

5307. Are deductions made for medical attendance?—I have also instances of deductions for medical attendance. The next case is ———— (U. 2) 7s. 6d. was deducted for cotton and 3d. for power from a wage of 18s. 10d.; the amount received was 11s. 1d. Then a cartridge factory (V. 2) 2d. deducted for cooking from all who earn 4s. 2d. or over, whether cookshop used or not. Then ———— (W. 2) 2d. for steam. Buy cotton and string for piping. Cotton is 3½d. a cop, which is enough to do a dozen skirts. Girls must buy the spoilt work; they cannot unpick it. The errors are often the fault of the cutter, giver-out, or machine cleaner. A girl earned 5s. 6d. in a week and had to buy a 3s. 4d. skirt. This happened three times in a few months. Spoilt work is generally raffled at 1d. each. I have a large number of cases here also which perhaps you would rather I should put in.

5308. Have you given us examples of them?—Yes, but among these I have a case of a hospital to which payment is made voluntarily, and I have deductions for cotton and clogs and other things.

5309. There is another department of your evidence, namely, with regard to the bounty or bonus system: in your opinion that is a source of abuse?—I think it is invariably a source of abuse. I think the position is best summed up by some Belfast girls, among whom there was a saying that "half their wages were paid in bounties which they never got."

5310. Will you give us the facts about that?—The wage would be a set one of 6s., and anything paid after that would be in the nature of a bonus, and from that bonus all the deductions would come. The girls summed it up by saying that it virtually came to this, that they never got it.

5311. It has been suggested to us very broadly that the system of fines should be abolished, and that in lieu thereof there should be the system of a fixed wage, with an attainable bonus. I wished to ask whether you agree to that?—No, I disagree entirely; I do not think you could do it.

5312. Do you think the bonus system is practically the fine system over again?—Absolutely. You abolish the fines and you allow bounties or bonuses, and all the man has to do is to make a low set wage and take all his fines out of the bonus. He will call it a bonus, and knock off the bonus. It is another way of doing the same thing.

5313. With regard to that system, you are speaking from your experience and from complaints you have received?—Yes.

5314. And you find the bonus system operates to cause exactly the same bad effect as the fine system? Is that so?—I think so most certainly. I have one instance here. It is ——— Indiarubber Works, ——— (X. 2). The work is very slack in winter. The girls get 1d. per pair for goloshes. They make 8s. to 10s. per week. They get a standard wage of 6s. a week. Of anything they earn over that they get half as bounty. If they earn less than 6s. they will be mulcted of the deficiency the next week. Apart from the half, what was short last week comes off as well.

5315. It very often works back to the minimum wage of 6s., is that so?—If you disallow fines and go on the system of bounties, I do not know what point one would stop at. It seems to me that anyone who wanted to fine would then necessarily fix the wage so low that he could make what profit he wanted out of his bounty.

5316. I will now ask you with regard to the general conclusions which you have formed. How long have you been engaged in this kind of enquiry? I have been connected with the Women's Trade Union League as a member of the committee since about 1887, but as I have told you, I was a board school mistress for six or seven years, and I suppose I did not become as intimately connected with the work as I am now till about 1893.

5317. Have you formed any opinion, as the result of that long experience, on the question of the retention or abolition of fining as a system, and if so, what is your opinion?—Of course, I think the abolition of fines is essential.

5318. Absolutely?—Absolutely.

5319. In all cases and under all circumstances?—In all cases and under all circumstances.

5320. That is broad and strong evidence. You might fortify your own position, and help us, if you would give us your reason?—My reason is partly what I have already given you. From personal experience as a teacher and organiser, and working among women, I find that discipline is maintained without punishment—that the best discipline is, in fact, arrived at without punishment. Then one has only to turn to the difficulties which attend on any system, such as for instance, the factory and workshop system where the thing is made possible by law. We published some time ago a report full of abstracts of the factory inspectors' reports, explaining that while any overtime was legal, it was almost impossible to prevent illegal overtime. In the same way, if you build up rules and say that certain things are legal in the way of fines or deductions and others are not, you are bound to have illegal fines and deductions. I do not say that you would do away with them at once by abolition, but you would give everyone a much better chance of dealing with them if they all came under the same category of illegality.

5321. Do the instances of their successful abolition justify you in your opinion?—Those I have heard of, certainly.

5322. Do you know of any cases in which they have been abolished and in which there has been a reversion to them?—I have not heard of any case, but if I had it would not shake my opinion.

5323. I am not sure of that. You should not commit yourself to that till you have investigated it?—I ought, perhaps, to give my reason. I should only feel that my alternative had not been properly tried. When one has had considerable experience in dealing with people, and knows that they can be dealt with without punishment, what one feels is that the alternative, which is proper management of the rules, is unassailable, if only trouble is taken to get it.

5324. I follow your opinion, which is very strong, in this sense, that you think that proper discipline would effect, for disciplinary purposes, all that fines at present effect?—Yes.

5325. Do you carry that also into the region of fines for loss or damage, say by spoiling material? Do you think that also can be effectually cured by proper discipline, coupled of course with the terrible possibility behind, that a chronically bad worker can always be dismissed?—Yes, certainly, because unintentional damage surely ought not to be punished. You ought not to punish a person who does damage through no fault of his own; perhaps from the fact that the hours are so long that he is worn out. Intentional damage is just the thing that a good disciplinarian would prevent, and prevent far better than by fines and deductions, which leave on the mind of a girl or a lad, whoever it may be, the feeling that they have really paid for what they have done. I would go much further, and say that the work would be enormously improved if fines and deductions were made illegal.

5326. We want you to go the whole length of expounding your views to us?—I should bore you if I were to give the sort of lists of fines and deductions at Leeds. I will put it in as evidence. I have here the sort of fines and deductions which one finds, taking any place at random. At the Liverpool Trade Congress two months ago I went to watch our Secretary, Miss Macarthur, giving out bills to the work girls asking them to come to a big meeting. She took from the girls at random, as they came from the factories one pay day, the lists they had. Everyone of those has deductions on it. The lowest was 3s 9d., with 7d. off for fines and deductions. That was a girl who ought to have been earning subsistence wage. It is impossible to get the best work while the girls are paid as they are, very often, as I contend, not half a subsistence wage. But if you are going further to reduce their power and capacity by making fines and deductions and leaving them still less to live on you will still further interfere with their work and health and general efficiency.

5327. I think if you see no reason to refuse us, you might furnish us with that, on the understanding that it will not be published?—With pleasure, always remembering that wherever we find anything wrong, we notify the inspectors. Of course they may have been going on for a very long time before we find them out, but amongst those things there is probably something the factory inspectors can deal with.

5328. This list has not been compiled by you, but has been received by you?—Yes. This other list which I have here was sent to me by the Secretary of the Textile Operatives' Society, Ireland. She sent it to me when sending information about some deductions which were made during the month. I have to patch it together out of two letters which she sent me. A woman, a textile worker, was fined the sum of 6s. 4d. for alleged faults in her cutting of damask. I wrote back to her and asked her the wage, and she gives me the wage as 11s. 2d. Another girl was fined 4s. 2d. out of a wage of 11s. 7d. This is a list of fines and deductions in Belfast factories. These are extraordinarily interesting. The girl's average set wage was 6s. with a bonus. If you take the first part, which are fines, you find they come to £1, leaving out the deductions. To return to the Leeds cases, in one case which I have here, the wages range from 5s. up to about 17s. or £1. In each case there are fines for cooks, benevolence and sewings, different sums all down the list—1s. 1d., 10½d., 1s. 8d., 1s. 7d., and so on. I imagine the tremendous variation in the wages is due to the same cause as we find in Pimlico, that one week they have good work and another week bad work.

5329. In the first place, for pure disciplinary purposes you are against the fining system as unnecessary?—Yes.

5330. In the second place, for damage to materials and so on, you look upon that as a branch of discipline?—Yes.

5331. If it is unintentional damage, the worker should not be fined; if it is intentional, the worker can be dealt with by warning, by dismissal, or the like?—Yes. At the present moment, in a factory which is a very bad one, you get both dismissal and fining. You might get dismissal and fining in the same case. You are not giving a fresh alternative; you have always got dismissal.

5332. You have told us about disciplinary fines and about fines for damage to material. The next thing I want to know is this. Are there any of the deductions which you have mentioned which you think ought to be treated as the standing-on cost of the work, as for instance, steam and the like? I gather that in your judgment all that cost should be defrayed by the factory itself, and the worker should be told his net wage instead of being told the gross wage subject to all those deductions?—Yes.

5333. So that we are agreed up to that point. Then as to charges, not for steam or the like, but for the supply of material, needles, cotton and so on, in your opinion ought that also to be part of the standing-on cost of the work, or should it be paid for by the worker ?—Certainly not.

5334. It should be paid by the factory ?—Yes.

5335. It should be treated as part of the standing-on cost of the factory, as its raw materials ?—Certainly.

5336. The suggestion is made that the workers take more care of the material if they pay for it themselves than they would if it were factory material, and that if the factory supplied the material there would be a good deal of avoidable waste incurred ; have you considered that point ?—I suppose you are referring to the present system, by which the worker pays for cotton and steam and so on ?

5337. Yes. It is suggested that they take more care of their own cotton than they would of factory cotton supplied at the factory charge ; what do you say to that ?—I do not think so for a moment.

5338. Do I gather that in your view that would be simply a branch of discipline ?—Yes.

5339. The factory would know how much had been supplied to each worker and whether they had or had not made a proper use of it, and there again, good organisation and discipline would effect the remedy ?—Yes. It appears to me to be a part of the initial cost which any manufacturer ought to be prepared to make. To ask the work-people to pay for material seems to me to come really very much under the same head as asking them to pay for tea, or the lavatory, or anything else.

5340. I must put the points to you which are suggested to us by the other side ?—Oh yes.

5341. I now come to another branch of the enquiry. You have a system of fines upon the one hand, and a system of temporary suspensions upon the other ; what do you say as between these two ?—I think they are both bad.

5342. May I point out the dilemma in which you are placed by giving that answer—that either the punishment of temporary suspension must be abolished, in the sense that the master must keep a bad workman on, or that he must dismiss him for ever ; now you do not favour either of those alternatives, do you ?—I think a bad workman should be dismissed.

5343. Would you not give them a chance, by a temporary suspension ?—I am sorry I am so crudely clear about it, but it seems to me that directly you begin giving chances by making these exceptions, you lay yourself open to the whole danger ; you again land yourself in the position we are in now in which the inspectors are afraid to take prosecutions simply because the whole subject has been dealt with in this detailed sort of way, so that nothing can be done. You must draw a hard and fast line and abide by it, or lay yourself open to greater abuses than you will by what seems a hardship on individual workers now and then.

5344. May I venture to put your point, as it appears to me, in the best way thus ; that if there is an intentional default on the part of the workman, or great carelessness, that should be, to begin with, the subject of warning, and then when a stage is reached at which repeated warnings are not attended to, the workman should be dismissed permanently ?—Yes, at that stage I would dismiss for the reason which I tried to show in one case I cited, that if you once admit the principle of suspension you have it played with as it is in that case. Instead of going to find other work, as they would do under other circumstances, the girls hang about waiting for the fortnight to expire. And as you know, when one lives on 8s. a week, there is absolutely nothing on which to live during the time of suspension, and they are either in debt, or—

5345. Yes, I know. Let me put these other points to you. Suppose the Committee did not see its way to the total abolition of fines, as you recommend, would you at all events desire that the fines should bear some percentage to the wage earned ?—I am afraid I cannot bring my mind to contemplate any of these palliatives ; they do seem to me to leave such loopholes for abuses. One has seen the breakdown of the 1896 Act and of the Hosiery Act and one can see the sort of ways in which a fresh Act will break down. It seems to me that nothing short of abolition will do. I know I was not always of this mind. In the first instance I thought that a percentage might be possible, but I have come to the conclusion that the fines ought to go.

5346. Perhaps we need not go further upon that head, but I wish to put to you a point as to the difficulty which has arisen under the Act of 1896, as to whether these fines, even though they are made upon open contract with the workers—though both parties know what they are—are in point of fact fair and reasonable. You know, of course, that great difficulty is produced by the Statute having used terms of that kind ?—Yes.

5347. I know it is a strain upon your imagination, but suppose we felt constrained to hold that fines under certain circumstances should be allowed, would you suggest any remedy of the present situation as to fairness and reasonableness ? Would you not make the inspector the judge of whether it was fair and reasonable ?—Considering the responsibility which inspectors have already, it would be very hard to put that responsibility upon them.

5348. Suppose we did not see our way to recommend temporary suspensions being reported against, in such a case, would you make the suspension open at least to all the checks that at present exist with regard to fines, viz., that the workers should know exactly, by contract, how much suspension would follow a certain act, and see that the suspension was reasonable and fair ? What do you say to that ? Again, I suppose your answer is that the whole system is repugnant ?—Absolutely. Directly you say that the suspension shall be reasonable and fair, you lay yourself open, as you have done before, to the doubt of what " reasonable and fair " means. I see no possible way out except by doing away with it. I am sorry, but I have thought about it a great deal and I can see no other way.

5349. The last point I would like to get some information from you upon is as to the failure of legislation in the past. You know that Parliament has attempted to rectify this state of matters from the year 1831 onwards, and you know how the system of fines and deductions was attempted to be legislated against in the year 1896 ?—Yes.

5350. What is your view as to the result of that legislation ?—I think it has quite broken down.

5351. Do you think that any other attempt on similar lines, even although made more stringent, would break down, short of absolute prohibition ?—I think patching is sure to break down.

5352. You illustrated one of your recent answers by a reference to another Statute ?—Yes, the Hosiery Act.

5353. Just take that as an instance, and tell us exactly what you are driving at about that ?—The Hosiery Act was a very good Act, and one in which we were very interested. When we were working at Amendments for the Act of 1896 we enquired carefully in the trade as to what was happening and how it was working, and we were told then it was a dead letter, and all enquiries showed that it was a dead letter. I have here a breach of the Hosiery Act which is quite recent, in which ten per cent. is deducted from the wages of trimmers for steam. A trimmer earning 20s. receives only 18s. ; a trimmer receiving £2 receives only £1 15s. Other operatives throughout the factory, except the warehouse men, are stopped, and so on. The Act being a dead letter, we could get nothing done under it. Before coming to this Committee I wrote to Nottingham and enquired whether it was being enforced there. I shall be interested to hear any instance in which it has been enforced, but my information from Nottingham is that it is a dead letter.

5354. I call your attention to the language of the Hosiery Act, which seems as strong as Parliament could use : " The earnings shall be actually and positively made payable in net in the current coin and not otherwise, without any deduction or stoppage of any description whatever, save and except for bad and disputed workmanship." Notwithstanding emphatic language of Parliament, your evidence is it has proved a dead letter ?—Yes.

5355. And these deductions still go on ?—Yes.

5356. Can you tell me why they are allowed to go on ?—I suppose it is because the Act is so difficult to enforce that it has been allowed to lapse.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

9 Nov. 1906.

5357. The point is, what have the inspectors been doing all this time?—I am sorry I cannot tell you. I can only tell you that that is my information from Nottingham; that it is a dead letter.

By Mrs. Tennant.

5358. You look upon suspension as only another form of fining?—Yes.

5359. If the system were made illegal, do you consider it would be a hardship on either employer or workman?—No.

5360. There would remain the opportunity of caution and the power of dismissal?—Yes.

5361. Do you consider that the abolition of the system of fines and of the system of suspension would be a benefit both to the workmen and to the employer?—Yes, distinctly. I think it would add to the efficiency of the work.

5362. I gather from your replies to the Chairman that you have considered the balance of difficulties between regulating fines and prohibiting them?—Yes.

5363. I gather also that your opinion is that there must be difficulties in carrying out the law, whatever the law may be, and that the result would be so much better if fines were abolished that it would be better to take the stronger course?—Yes, that is so.

5364. In fact, I suppose you would go so far as to say that the inspectors' work would be so much simplified that they would be set free for other work?—That I absolutely believe, that the inspectors' task must be very much simplified by having a perfectly clear issue; and of course I feel that you are really only depriving bad employers of an additional means of defrauding.

5365. Do you believe that all workers would like to see the legal prohibition of fines?—I can speak for the organised bodies. Of course they are anxious for the abolition of fines and deductions; they have said so over and over again. In Lancashire, however they may feel in certain quarters that they are capable of dealing with these questions through their great organisations, they are prepared for the abolition of fines and deductions. The resolutions at Trade Congress and from all our Womens' Associations are quite clear on the subject.

5366. Within your experience have the workers or any of them considered the alternative of suspension, assuming that that alternative were not made illegal?—No, I do not think so. Do you mean have they accepted it, or have they considered it at all?

5367. I mean, have they considered what their position would be if the Legislature were to make fining illegal, without touching the question of suspension?—I think that they strongly take the view that all these different means of stopping wages and of making demands of any sort which would in any way touch wages, are the same; I think they look upon suspension as coming under the head of fines, and they would assume that you are dealing with that as well as the other questions.

5368. That is what they advocate when they ask for the prohibition of fines?—That is so.

5369. Do you think their advocacy would be at all modified or would your advocacy be modified if the application of the fines was confined to a good object?—I do not see how it could affect the point.

5370. Their concern is not really so much whether the money goes into the employer's pocket or to a good object, but that they shall not be penalised, whatever the object?—I have never found that it makes the least difference to the workers what the money is spent upon. There are cases in which it is stated it is given to an annual treat, and cases in which it is stated it is given to a hospital, but I have not found that the publication of a balance sheet or anything else makes any difference to the strong feeling with regard to the injustice of these deductions and fines.

5371. The sense of injustice and irritation would remain?—Yes, just the same.

5372. Have you any experience of the pen trade in Birmingham?—It was owing to our agitation, and to the representations we made to the Home Office, that Miss Squire took the abortive prosecution of Brandauer's, which firm I had personally tried to stop from making these tremendous deductions for waste. Of course we worked very hard there some years ago.

5373. Have you any examples of the deductions there?—These, which Miss Squire took, I have before me. I have not brought any additional ones. I brought this in a list of cases to show where it had broken down. A woman was charged 2s. waste out of 8s., and had 8d. a week deducted till the 2s. was paid, and so on.

5374. With regard to the question of bonus, which the Chairman has told you has been suggested as an alternative to the system of fining, do you consider that any evil of the bonus system would be removed by the fact that the bonus was paid at the end of the year rather than at the end of each week—that the reward was to accumulate under a system of marks?—It does not sound to me in the least more satisfactory.

5375. I want your opinion on that because it was put to us that the fact that it was to be paid at the end of the year would make a difference?—It seems to me if it made any difference it would make it worse, because the worker would have to stand out of what she had earned for a year. It could not be an advantage; it must be an additional disadvantage to the bounty system if they have to wait for payment.

5376. You consider the proper system of reward for good work would be good wages?—Certainly.

5377. You ought not to have to bribe a workman by a reward at the end of the year?—No.

5378. Have you found examples of causes of suffering other than those you have described? You have described the sense of irritation; you have shown us very bad cases in which very low wages have been still further reduced by fining; do you know of any other disadvantage to which the system is open?—Yes, there is one disadvantage, and any employer or factory inspector would know what I mean—that you put an additional power into the hands of an unscrupulous foreman, to use favouritism. Very often you will find, I think, that a respectable married woman who objects to the sort of favouritism which goes on in a factory, would be punished by fines and deductions, while a girl, whose work is, of course, no better, would escape. I do not know that that need be reported, but that is the sort of case which we ought to bear in mind because it does exist, and any employer will bear me out. It is bad for the employers, and they try to stop it as much as anybody.

5379. That is a condition which would remain even though you regulated fines more than they are regulated now?—Certainly. It remains an additional power.

5380. Nothing but the prohibition of fines could possibly touch that?—I have thought about it a great deal, and I am very clear that nothing else will deal with that or with any other difficulty.

5381. The opinion which you have just expressed is not only your own, but that of the Women's Trades Union League?—Yes.

5382. And its affiliated Societies?—Yes.

5383. I suppose we may take it that those organisations have considered the position of the workers very fully?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

5384. You spoke of a girl's premium sheet, in the case of a London firm, having been lost, the premium or bonus to which she was entitled being £1, I think?—Yes.

5385. She was not only not paid her premium, but was fined 2s. 6d. in addition?—That is so.

5386. Could you state what length of time it had taken that girl to earn her premium?—It would be during a sale. The sales last a week or a fortnight, and I should say if she was a quick saleswoman she might earn more than £1 in a fortnight. It might be the result of ten day's work.

5387. She has earned this £1 premium in about a fortnight?—Yes; I daresay less than a fortnight.

5388. So that ten days' or a fortnight's premium was lost in addition to the 2s. 6d. fine for that single offence or accident of losing the check book?—Yes.

5389. Did the loss of this premium sheet inflict any loss upon the employer ?—It might add some difficulty in making up his books. It could make no other difference to him that I know of.

5390. Could it have inflicted any trade loss upon the employer ?—No. It was the girl's premium; that which she had herself earned.

5391. There was no trade or commercial loss which fell upon the employer ?—Not that I know of, and the premium sheet would be simply that which represented her own gains.

5392. You spoke of a young boy who was fined 2s. for not answering the bell; the bell had rung a second time, and the boy turned round to another attendant and said he would not have cared if it had been just ?—That is so.

5393. Therefore, you seem to think yourself that it is the injustice of the whole system which is felt ?—Yes. The system of fines and deductions puts power into the hands of the person who is responsible for the government of the shop. In this case it was the shop-walker. That power is very recklessly used very often.

5394. You think the whole system is a capricious one ?—Yes.

5395. As well as being unjust ?—Yes.

5396. I would like to take you to a few of those cases of low paid workers. In their case, as they are in receipt of wages which are not subsistence wages, but are very low indeed, do you think they would have a constant desire to keep them as high as possible ?—Certainly.

5397. Therefore, other things being equal, they would maintain as high a standard of discipline among themselves as possible in order to save their wages: is that your idea ?—Yes.

5398. As fines are constantly inflicted, does that seem to imply that the system of fining has had the effect of maintaining discipline ?—No, on the contrary. I think it does not work out in that way.

5399. Therefore, although the desire of the low-paid worker would be to maintain that wage at least at that particular level, you seem to think that the fines have not had the effect of improving the discipline or maintaining order ?—No, I certainly do not.

5400. Is it your idea that the fines have had no disciplinary effect at all ?—Very little indeed, not worth weighing against the disadvantages.

5401. You think that the effect is simply a very serious reduction in the worker's wages without any tangible improvement in discipline ?—Certainly the reduction is out of all proportion to any improvement of the discipline.

5402. Just at the moment I am not asking about the proportion; I only wish to see if your mind runs on these lines, that the first effect is a very serious reduction out of all proportion to the total wages ?—Yes.

5403. And secondly, so far as I have been able to grasp your general idea, there is a very serious sense of injustice in addition, due to the capricious way in which the fines are inflicted ?—Yes.

5404. You spoke of one case where 5d. was stopped if the worker was five minutes late ?—Yes.

5405. That is at the rate of 5s. in the hour ?—Yes.

5406. The worker's wages in that case were 5s. a week ?—Yes.

5407. Therefore, for one hour's delay they would be fined to the full extent of a week's wages ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

5408. I do not think it works out like that. They are not fined 5d. for each five minutes ?—Yes; I think I gave one case.

By Mr. Maddison.

5409. It would not go on day after day ?—I understood Mr. Walsh how it worked out.

By Mr. Walsh.

5410. I took down this particular statement. It is a printed regulation to which the workers have agreed, a fine of fivepence for five minutes.

By the Chairman.

5411. If the fact is as Mr. Walsh has put it, the result is very startling.

By Mrs. Tennant.

5412. For the purpose of fining, their wages are calculated at 5s. an hour; for the purpose of payment, at 5s. a week ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

5413. That is the point. Mrs. Tennant has put it with very much greater success than I. I wished to develop the point that, if I have understood Miss Tuckwell's evidence correctly, for the purpose of the fine, they calculate at the rate of 5s. per hour, while the wages are calculated at the rate of 5s. per week ?—That is so.

5414. I suppose you are aware that the Truck Act, 1896, states that a fine shall be fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case ?—Yes.

5415. Are you aware whether any union has taken action in any such case as this ?—No. I do not know whether the union has taken action. It is a sort of case where I think, considering the cases I have before me, the decision might be given against you.

5417. I also took down another case which you quoted, where, out of a wage of 3s. 4½d., 9d. was deducted for a particular fine ?—Yes.

5418. That is a little over 22 per cent. ?—Yes. The percentages of fines have been worked out in the Leeds cases. They are very interesting.

5419. In the case of K2 2s. 6d. out of 10s. ?—Yes.

5420. The Chairman has put to you a question as to steam being a necessity. Of course I do not intend to press you upon that because the Chairman has said all that is necessary. I would like to know from your own knowledge, or at least from knowledge which has come to you, what proportion of schedules containing the list of offences for which fines would be imposed, and the amount, have been placed in view of the workmen. Could you give us any proportion ?—No, I am afraid I could not give you any proportion at all. It is a constant complaint which we get, and which one gets at meetings and in various Labour papers: that the abstract is not put in such a place that it can be seen. In one case we had a complaint from a girl—I am afraid this is a chestnut—that she could not see the abstract because it was pinned on the manager's desk, and he would knock her head against it if she tried to look at it.

5421. It need not be in front of the people if it has been agreed to. Are you aware whether those schedules of offences and fines have been agreed to in many of these cases ?—In a great many cases the abstract is stuck up, but there are cases in which it is not. I do not wish to make any distinction between them, because to my mind the thing is equally bad whether it is or is not.

5422. Except that if the law is being systematically violated I think it would be desirable that we should find that out ?—Its value is that it is one of those technical points on which alone the factory inspectors appear to be able to get a prosecution. The unreasonableness may be quite plain, but the thing upon which it turns, in the mind of the factory inspector, is the point whether there was a contract or not.

5423. I wish to carry it to another point which I think it is desirable to know. Where schedules have not been agreed to by the work people, it is possible under the existing Act to make a contract in writing between the employer and the workman ?—Yes.

5424. Do you know whether any such cases have existed ? You are aware that when the schedule has not been agreed to, the employer and the workman has another alternative: they can agree to a contract in writing specifying the damage or the act for which the fine shall be imposed ?—I am afraid I am ignorant about that. I do not know.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

9 Nov. 1906.

By Mrs. Tennant.

5425. There must be a contract beforehand. It will not do to merely specify the act after the act has been committed; the worker must agree beforehand, either by the publication or by the contract in writing.

By Mr. Walsh.

5426. I am afraid there is a little difference of opinion between us there. You are not aware whether any such contracts have been entered into?—No.

5427. Therefore, as a matter of fact, no particular contract of that character to your knowledge has been entered into?—No.

5428. It has been suggested to us in the course of evidence given by other witnesses, that an incentive in the shape of a bounty to be received at the end of a particular term might be of use, as, so to speak, developing a spirit of emulation in the worker, who would be certain of his minimum wage and who, at the end of a particular term, might receive something in addition: have you anything to say to that?—I can only reiterate what I said before, that I think it most dangerous. I can quite imagine that a very good employer might be able to use it very well, but I think the fact of allowing a loophole would lead to tremendous abuse. I think in that and every other case, you have to take the sort of point that I recall, Mrs. Cadbury's stating that Cadbury's had to give up fines and deductions because they felt that although they could use them properly, the fact that they used them would induce others to do so who were not so careful and that that would lead to abuse.

5430. You mean you would be sorry to have the power to take the bounty away?—Or to give it.

5431. To give it or to take it away. But the employer would be bound to pay full wages under those circumstances, would he not?—You mean if there was a bounty?

5432. Yes?—But the point about the bounty is that where it is given the full wage becomes a lower wage, and the complaint which the girls from Belfast make is that half the wage they ought to receive is paid as a bounty, and they do not get it. They get a set wage of 6s.

5433. I would like to lay before you one case quoted by you where the girls had 1s. per week deducted from their wages until they paid the full extent of the loss: does not that imply that if the full extent of the loss were deducted immediately they would be working for some time without any wages at all?—Yes; we had once a case of that.

5434. Would not a bounty system, or a premium upon good workmanship, do away with such a thing as that?—How?

5435. Because the full wages would at least be paid to the worker. The bounty might not be received even if earned, but the full wages would be paid?—I am so tired that I find it difficult to follow anything now, but that is a point. But as a matter of fact, though in theory it is a point, in practice it is no point at all, I think you would find, because in practice you very rarely find that the whole of the wage is stopped. There is usually the practice which you remember in the case of the Bristol tailoress, who had to pay over £2 for damage done, of taking it over a series of weeks. Only a certain amount is paid each week, so that the person may be kept alive.

5436. The saving clause in the Hosiery Act is in the words "bad and disputed workmanship." Full wages must be paid except for "bad and disputed workmanship." Do you not think that the error lies in those words?—I agree. All I wanted to say is that the Hosiery Act was much better than the present Act, but good as it was, it broke down, and good as any Act may be which allowed fines and deductions, something is certain to happen.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 14th November, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thos. Shaw, K.C.,M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir Frederick Cawley, Bart., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
F. Maddison, Esq., M.P.
S. Walsh, Esq., M.P.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary.)

Mr. HERBERT WITHEY, of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives, was called; and Examined.

Mr. H. Withey.

14 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

5437. What is your position with regard to the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives?—I am secretary of the Leeds branch. We allow females to join our branch, but we have not many, because we do not find it easy to persuade them to join.

5438. Is your association connected with the General Affiliation of Trades Unions?—Yes.

5439. What is about the number in your amalgamated union?—There were 1,590 members last half-year throughout England. In Leeds we have 668 members of whom 19 are females.

5440. Has it been the duty of your union and your own duty as secretary to get information with regard to the condition of the workers?—Yes.

5441. In particular, have you directed your attention to the subjects remitted to this Committee, viz., fines and deductions?—Yes; we have actually waited upon many firms whose girls were not in our society and pleaded on their behalf to stop some of these deductions. I know of one firm where there have been, I think, about ten strikes in twelve years on account of reductions and deductions.

5442. Are you at liberty to mention the name of that firm ?—Yes, it is Y2. They have now closed their business.

5443. What was their line of business ?—Wholesale clothiers. Before the Boer War they made various classes of clothing, but then it apparently struck them that they could make more out of contract work, soldiers' uniforms and the like, in favour of which they doubtless neglected more ordinary branches of their work. When the war finished and fewer soldiers' uniforms were required, much of the rest of their trade had drifted away into other hands.

5444. What class of workers did they employ ?—Both males and females. When working full time they used to employ about 380 females and about 80 males.

5445. Had they a workshop on their own premises ?—Yes.

5446. Was there any out-work ?—Yes. Practically all such firms in Leeds have out-workers, the Jewish element. There are 187 clothing manufacturing firms in the town, nearly all of whom employ out-workers for the making of coats. The waistcoats and trousers are made in the workrooms.

5447. In the evidence you are about to give us you have in view firms like Y2, and other firms in the same line of business ?—Yes.

5448. And now please tell us something about what is the practice as to disciplinary fines ?—What I regard as exorbitant fines are imposed upon workpeople for going in late. I am especially thinking of girls who are not paid more than 4s. or 5s. per week. They worked until recently 52½ hours per week, but we sent a circular to the whole of the firms and got the hours of 1,700 workpeople reduced to 49½ per week. We found that if girls were ten minutes late they were fined 1d.; if they went in at 8.30 they were fined 2d.; at 9 o'clock, 3d. Now, that is entirely out of proportion to the small wage these girls are drawing. In the case of some of the firms if a girl stops away even through sickness, she is fined 6d., without opportunity of explanation. I have here a list of fines in the case of one clothing factory in Leeds (Z2). I find from this that a poor girl may be fined a total of 6s. 4½d. in one week.

5449. Perhaps it would be well for you to quote a few of the items ?—There are twenty-one items, eighteen of which involve a fine. For instance, any one leaving the factory without bonnet or hat and standing about in the doorway, fine 3d.; no baskets, mugs, plates, dishes, etc., allowed in the workroom, fine 2d.; any workhand taking work away without it being entered when it should be, fine 6d.; no workhand to take any work out of the workroom, fine 1s.; any workhand leaving her place in the room without sufficient reason, fine 2d.; any workhand talking, singing, or behaving unseemly, fine 3d.; any workhand disobeying her foreman or using saucy or abusive language, subject to instant dismissal or fined 6d.; any workhand absenting herself without leave, 6d. each day; any workhand changing from one machine to another without leave of the mechanic, fine 1s.; using the wrong sewing, such as cotton instead of linen thread, subject to instant dismissal or fined 1s.; losing or soiling garment tickets, for each ticket a fine of ½d.; losing or destroying file tickets, fine 2d.; bad work which cannot be altered, damages and loss of material to be paid for by the workhand; no workhand is allowed to touch the gas or electric light or the apparatus connected with it, fine 6d.; etc.

5450. Take the case of taking mugs into the workroom instead of leaving them where they have been used. Does any harm come to the work from that ?—No, none at all. I believe the firm in question is the only place where they don't allow it. I have seen hundreds of girls take a mug or plate upstairs for safety and put it beside or under her machine, in order to save them going down to the dining room for it at night.

5451. What about the fines for talking ?—Work girls sing and talk as much as they like in forty-nine out of fifty workshops in the town. There is no harm in it within limits.

5452. You think that is a case where ordinary discipline would suffice ?—Yes, if a notice was put up it would be obeyed.

5453. I see there is also a fine for saucy language ?—That again is a case for ordinary discipline.

5454. With regard to using cottons instead of linen thread, might not that cause damage or loss to the garment ?—Several firms charge 5½d. per reel for the cotton, although the girls could get exactly the same quality outside for 3½d. Mr. H. Withey. 14 Nov. 1906.

5455. That is a different point. What we are dealing with at the moment is the question of disciplinary fines. Where cotton thread is used instead of linen, does it not damage or deteriorate the garments ?—Yes, the garment would not last so long with cotton as with linen thread.

5456. Then in that instance, at all events, there is a certain damage ?—Yes, that is so.

5457. I see there is a fine of 6d. for touching the electric light. What is the damage done there ?—No damage at all. The foreman might be out of the room when it was getting dark, and a girl, anxious not to lose time, might turn up the electric light. It would be different in the case of gas if a girl carried about lighted paper, because the floors are soaked with oil.

5458. With regard to the whole subject of disciplinary fines, is it your view that discipline can be maintained without the imposition of fines ?—Yes, it is done by the majority of firms in the town, whose girls are as well behaved.

5459. You might quote one or two examples ?—I might mention the cases of four firms, A3, B3, C3, D3, and there are many others.

5460. In those cases there is no such list of fines as you have produced ?—There are one or two. I have some down here in other firms, but nothing approaching this one.

5461. Is discipline in fact maintained as well in those other places as at Z2, to which you have alluded ?—E3, and F3, and G3 are keener upon it without fining them than they are at Z2, with all their fines. They instil it into the people as they come into the shop that they will have no talking and singing, and of course they fall into line with it straight off the reel. It may be a hardship upon them at first, but it is grafted into them.

5462. The next part of your evidence is as to deductions for damaged goods ?—That varies a great deal. I have worked at A3 for twenty-one and a half years now and I have never seen a payment made in the whole of that time for anything damaged. Mind you, the girl or man has been severely censured, when it has been accidental, and they have cautioned them against doing it again, and it has blown over. At B3 if there is damage done which could be cured for 3d., they make them take the whole suit. On top of this they allow the girls to raffle the suits in the workshop. About six months ago I got to know two cases; I reported them to the factory inspector, and he told them it was illegal, and it was stopped. It was very prevalent in the clothing trade. If there were damage done, the girl took the suit and raffled it among her fellow-workers, and one of them got it for 3d. or 6d., as the case might be. If there is a little hole in the things, other firms will make the girl pay 1s. for it when it does not cost the firm more than 2d. I do not think that is fair. They should let it be at what it costs them. We do not charge anything, nor do F3 nor G3. They are the same firms time after time who charge, and those who do the best work do not charge the girls anything at all.

5463. May I put the point to you that these deductions for damaged goods are just another branch of the subject of discipline ?—That is so.

5464. And you think that under a skilful, good-tempered arrangement in a firm the discipline would be maintained, and it would be good for the workers and also for the employer ?—Undoubtedly it would.

5465. You do not think that it would result in loss to either ?—No. I would stick to the fines for being late in the morning, but they should not be so keen as they are. Still, if a person is told to be there at a certain time she should be there. I do not believe in people walking in twenty minutes late. I have never been late in my life, and I do not believe in it. You must state the time or they will be coming in at a quarter to ten, although they are getting nothing when they are away because they are all on piecework. There is only a little power running for nothing during that time, but still you must have something by way of a check on them, say ½d. up to nine o'clock. It goes up to 3d. to nine o'clock in some firms, although the girl is not earning 3d. an hour, nor 1d. an hour, taking it all the year round. With regard to disciplinary fines, there was one girl at Z2 —five weeks since, I think it was—who was fined 1s. out of a total earnings of 1s. 3½d. Sixpence was for speaking across to the girl opposite to her. I could not gather what the other 6d. was for.

Mr. H. Withey.

5466. Was the 1s. 3½d. all she earned that week ?—Yes ; they were slack. I do not believe that any firm should compel a girl to go at eight o'clock in the morning and stop there till six o'clock when there is no work, but Z2 will not allow them to go home, and one or two other firms also. I think that is unfair. They may sit there forty-nine hours and only earn 1s. or so, and some of them are married women.

5467. Supposing a person is late on a day on which there is no work for her to do, would the fine be imposed just the same ?—No ; I should not think it would be right.

5468. Is it, in fact, imposed ?—It is in some shops, but not in others.

5469. The third branch of your evidence that I want to go into is with regard to reductions for materials ?—That is for cottons, I take it ?

5470. Cottons, silks, needles and so on. What is the practice with regard to that ?—The practice is to pay for sewings week after week as they get them. I have a book here of A3. There is 11d. down here in one week ; 1s. 5½d. the next week ; nothing the next week ; then 11d. 1s. 2d. ; 11d., and so on. The reason I object to these sewings being deducted is that a girl will sometimes get an extraordinarily light costume to make which has to be sewn with silk—say light grey. She pays 1s. 9d. for the reel of silk and will probably only use one-tenth part of it, and the other, 1s. 8d. worth, is left on her hands probably for a twelvemonth. If the firm had to supply it and let the girl use what she wanted, and then take it back, it would not be wasted at all. It is altogether wasted because that silk is rotting away the whole of the time it is standing idle like that.

5471. Can you tell me of any firm which make no such deductions for materials ?—Yes ; there are one or two firms which do not, but I cannot tell you who are they ; I have not had time to get the evidence. I knew nothing about this Committee sitting till quite recently.

5472. Do you think that there would be waste by the workers if they were supplied with materials and had the use of them ?—No, I do not think so. Why should there be ? A girl may take a yard or two home, but there is the foreman there, and he is paid to watch the girls.

5473. You think again that that comes back to the question of good discipline ?—No ; I cannot follow it in that light, because I have seen the girls dodge these people. Where they are charging 5½d. in some shops for a reel they can go outside and buy the same reel, or what answers the same purpose, for 3½d. I have seen it done thousands of times. They go back into the warehouse and watch till the foreman's back is turned and then they whip out the cotton which they have bought outside for 3½d. and put the bobbin on to the spool and run one cotton on to the other and you could not tell the difference. The system encourages these females to act deceitfully to their bosses. If the firm supplied the cotton there would be no need for that. There are thousands of bobbins bought weekly at a reduced price in the town.

5474. Have you any particulars with regard to needles ? —Yes. Some firms sell the needles at ½d. apiece. The majority provide them for nothing. I strongly object to any firm charging for needles, because they are for doing their work, and if a needle breaks it is not the fault of the girl, because nine times out of ten the girl does not touch it. The mechanic puts it in, and if he puts it in a little bit false it is going to snap sooner or later.

5475. You would favour a net wage, I suppose ?—I would, so that a girl knows what she is going to earn. You will see in this book that a girl does not know what she is going to get. There are four items down here, week after week, printed in this form :

C.
B.
F.
S.

C. is cooking ; B. is benevolence ; F. is fines and S. is sewings. She does not know till those items are entered in the book on wage day what she is going to receive.

5476. Whose form is this ?—A3.

5477. The next part of your evidence is as to the deductions for power, cooking, and so on ; what is the practice ?—There is one item which we have missed—it may be my mistake. There is one firm in the town, I3, which has this rule—I have the book with me : "There being no fines imposed for the breach of any rule, offenders render themselves liable to suspension or dismissal." That is the only rule I wish to allude to. This firm stops a ½d. out of every shilling the girl earns, for power, which I think is the worst of the lot.

5478. You think the supply of power should be part of the working cost ?—Yes. When they are working full they will have 280 girls, and they average 10s. a week. They will pay for the building in a month. Stopping money for power is the worst thing in the trade.

5479. The same remark would apply to charging steam and hot water and all that kind of thing ?—Yes. That comes under the heading of cooking a great deal. At our place we have a cook, and we have two girl assistants. Those girls have to clean the office and all the lot, and then they slip downstairs and get the fire going and warm the girls' dinner up. They will have 600 hands going in the shop and each female has to pay 1d. a week towards the cook. The males do not pay.

5480. How much does that come to ?—£2 10s. a week.

5481. What does the cook get ?—I think 18s., and the two girls about 5s. or 6s. apiece.

5482. Where does the profit go ?—Into the firm. Some of the smaller clothing firms charge the girls 1d. a week for hot water, the girls having to cook their own food. In nine cases out of ten every female employee pays the 1d. whether they use it or not. That is another injustice. Out of our 400 hands at A3. to-day, 250 will go home to dine day after day and will never see the cook room, but still they pay the 1d. per week. That is another injustice. The men do not pay. They do not make us pay, whether we go down and dine there or not, but they come round and expect something very handsome at Christmas time for their three women. There was one firm—probably it may be three months ago—that used to charge the females 2d. per week for hot water, and the girls could not get the water. They came to my office one morning when I was taking the contributions and complaints. I went to see the factory inspector, and he went down and played Hamlet about it the very next day, and there were no more 2d.'s stopped. So you see it does good to go occasionally and see the factory inspector.

5483. With regard to compliance with the Act of Parliament, in the case that you first cited, where there was a long list of fines, may I ask you what steps were taken to publish that list by the employer ?—It is in every girl's wage book. I have here a wage book with the name of the girl torn off ; she would not let me bring it with her name on. The list is in front of the wage book. I have here the books of Y2 and A3., and of another firm.

5484. Broadly speaking, are you in favour of the total abolition of all fines ?—I am, and of all deductions in every shape and form as well. Let the girls know what they are going to have when they start making a garment.

5485. You made one admission just now, namely that you would fine them something in respect of being late ?—Yes, or, as an alternative, clear them off the premises. I am very keen on that point of people being there to time, unless there is sickness which is easily accounted for. If it is laziness or anything like that I would not tolerate it for a moment.

5486. Is not that again a question for the foreman ? If he is a skilled capable man he can judge whether the worker should be kept on or not ?—The foreman should be responsible for all this.

5487. So that in that case you would prefer the alternative of good discipline to fining ?—I would.

5488. Take this case, which I must put to you broadly. Take a works in which there are no fines, no deductions for damaged goods, no deductions for material, and no deductions for power or cooking, and so on ; do you know of any such cases ?—No, not one. There is not one in the trade in Leeds. I am only speaking of Leeds now ; I dare not speak for the other branches.

5489. You are aware of some, I understand, in which there are no disciplinary fines ?—Oh yes.

5490. And you are aware of some where there are no deductions ?—Yes, for damages ; and also in some of the little shops there are no deductions for cotton.

5491. And you are aware of some where there is no deductions or charge for power ?—Yes. There is only one shop where they charge for power at all, and that is the one I have mentioned.

5492. You are not aware of any where there is a total absence of fines and deductions under those four heads ?—No, I am not.

5493. Is your evidence to the effect that if they were imitating each other in abolishing the fines under different heads, they would come to total abolition and it would be no loss to any party ?—It would be again to the employers.

5494. You think so ?—I am confident of it.

5495. What is the ground of that opinion ?—Because in the first place the girls would put the proper cotton into the goods instead of slipping outside and getting 3½d. cotton instead of 5¼d. I have heard our firm say that the reels of cotton cost 5½d. and they could show me the invoices. That is when I have grumbled a bit. Being an old servant, they have allowed me to grumble a bit ; they know my position but they let me grumble, and I have grumbled about people being able to buy outside for 3½d. what they are charged 5¼d. for inside.

5496. Who gets the difference ?—Our firm tell me distinctly, and I have no reason to disbelieve them, that they cost 5¼d., but you cannot tell the difference between the two cottons if you get hold of them ; and they can get them for 3½d. outside, and the girls do ; they do it every day in the week. They practically keep a little shop going with nothing else but sewing cottons. The girls run there from all over Leeds to get them for 3½d. They have a little trouble in running it off from the reel on to the reel which belongs to the firm, because there is a name on it, or a different coloured bobbin, one red and one white.

5497. Does not the firm discover that the amount of the work done is not duly represented by the amount of cotton thread supplied ?—No.

5498. They have never gone so finely into it as that ?—No, that is too minute.

5499. Suppose we were of opinion that in some cases, and for certain things, fines or deductions should be allowed, would you be of opinion that the total of such fines and deductions should bear some kind of percentage to the wages earned ?—I hardly follow you.

5500. Take a girl such as you have named, who earns 4s. to 5s. a week ; if fines and deductions are to be continued, I fancy you would favour that, at all events, there should not be more than a certain percentage of that 4s. or 5s. taken from her ?—No, that is a fact.

5501. Are you acquainted with any cases under the existing system in which, say, a quarter or even half of her total wage is taken away ?—Z2. is absolutely the worst firm. Of course I have had only two days on this job, and the only item I got was the one I have told you, where the girl was fined 1s. when she only earned 1s. 3½d.

5502. As to whether these things are fair and reasonable in themselves, do you know there is great difficulty in establishing unfairness and unreasonableness in a court of law ?—Yes.

5503. And is there great embarrassment on the part of the workers in endeavouring to raise such a question ?—They are frightened to raise the question. They will not come near one. When we send our organising secretary to some of the shops, the best men will turn round and bolt ; they dare not be seen speaking to him. They do not let the foreman see them. The girls will run like mad from either him or me.

5504. Because they are being visited with punishment ?—Yes, they are afraid of being dismissed. I got three to join last Friday night, and they said, "Do not let our bosses know," as if I should go and tell them ! I said, "They will not know." There is one firm, K3, who put a notice up a fortnight since that any person going in three minutes late will be fined a quarter of an hour for each offence, and half an hour for the first. That means that if they are six times three minutes late, they will lose six quarters of an hour. They grumbled about that, but the notice is up.

5505. What we are most anxious about is to know whether, with your experience, which has now lasted for many years—— ?—Twenty-nine years in the clothing trade.

5506. With your experience, your evidence is distinctly in favour of total abolition ?—It is.

5507. Of fines and deductions ?—Deductions first—no deduction in wages for cotton, or damage, or anything, because it stands to common sense that a girl is not going to make a mistake purposely. If the goods drop on the floor and touch the oil, well, she has not done it purposely, but still she has to pay 1s. for letting the thing fall from her fingers ; and the bosses do it hundreds of times over.

5508. That is in accordance with practice ?—Yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5509. I did not quite understand with regard to the thread ; why do they pay for the thread ?—It is usual in the clothing trade in Leeds. All the girls have to go to a certain little room and say they want such and such a thread.

5510. Will you explain how they are paid : are they on day-work ?—No ; they are all on piece-work. That book will show you that. The girls have to find their own sewings.

5511. They get so much a garment ?—So much a dozen—say 3s. a dozen.

5512. The girls have to find their own thread and needles ?—That is so. They do not have to find their needles in every shop. A3 give the needles, but some of the shops make them pay ½d. for every needle—some two for 1½d. Unfortunately, where they make them pay more for their needles, they pay less for the making.

5513. With regard to this thread which they buy from the employer, you would not say that the quality was the same as that which they get outside ?—I could not prove that. I have had some of both, and I cannot tell the difference.

5514. But when you have approached the employers upon the matter, and told them that the girls could buy that thread at the shop you speak of for 3½d., when they were charged 5¼d. by the firm, did they say it was not the same quality ?—They said it was false, because they pay 5¼d., and they sell at cost price to the girls.

5515. You do not assert that they can actually buy the same thread for the 3½d. ?—Oh no.

5516. But that they can buy a thread which looks as good to you ?—That is so.

5517. I understand the employers say that it is not the same thread ?—One employer says so.

5518. He says that the thread is not so good ?—I do not know whether they have classified them together, but he tells me that it cannot be as good because they pay 5¼d. per reel wholesale.

5519. It must be either one of two things—either the thread is not so good, and the girls are buying a different quality of thread, or else the employer is not speaking the truth.

By Mr. Maddison.

5520. Or does not buy so well.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5521. That is not quite in the way of business, because any large firm can buy as well as a little shop. It is hardly an alternative for people who know anything about business ?—I was laying stress on the difference between 5¼d. and 3½d., because I was advocating that no deductions should be made for cotton, in which case, if the firm paid, there would be no inducement for the girls to put an inferior article into the goods.

Mr. H. Withey.

14 Nov. 1906.

5522. Your evidence is that either the firm is not speaking the truth in saying that they give this price for the thread, or the employees are making a mistake in supposing that the thread which they buy is as good as the thread the employers supply?—I have a brother in the thread trade. I have quoted to him the price of 5¼d., with the number on the thread——

5523. Is the name on?—Yes, the name is on, with a "XX" or something of that kind. My brother has told me that the thread at 3½d. is as good as the 5¼d.: at least it answers the same purpose.

5524. That is an outside opinion which may not be quite an expert opinion. You know as well as I do that thread has nearly always the name of the maker, and the quality, upon it, X, XX, or XXX, or some other signification?—Yes.

5525. Is the thread which they buy at the shop marked in the same way as the thread which the employer supplies?—That I cannot tell you.

5526. I appreciate your point that there should be no charge for the thread?—That is the point I wanted to lay stress upon.

5527. Only I wanted to know whether your assertion that the thread was as good was really a fact. Now, where do the fines go to?—They go into the firm's pocket. Out of the fines for being late, in ninety-nine cases out of 100, there is a trip provided every year.

5528. Then the fines do not go into their pockets?—Stop a minute. They will perhaps have £300 or £400 of fines in the year, and the trip costs them £110 or £120; the rest does go into their pockets. No fines, no trips. I am not advocating any trip. I do not want them to give us anything at all.

5529. Does that obtain at all the works?—Practically every firm has a trip.

5530. Have Z2?—Yes.

5531. They fine very largely for great numbers of things, and consequently their fines amount to a great sum of money in the year?—Yes.

5532 Do they give them back to the Sick Fund?—You do not get one-quarter back.

5533. They do not say they give it all back?—No; they do not say anything about it.

5534. I am speaking of fines and not deductions?—They do not issue a balance sheet, which they should do, to the workers, because it is the workers' money.

5535. I am speaking of the fines?—So am I.

5536. The fines go into the employers' pocket?—Yes.

5537. With the exception of a small amount?—For trips.

5538. And there is no balance sheet given, and no account taken of them?—That is so, so far as the workers can see. The employers will probably have a balance sheet, but the workers do not see it in any of the factories.

5539. You would draw a wide difference between disciplinary fines and fines for unpreventable things, that is, between anything the work girls can prevent themselves, such as coming late, and dropping things, such as you have spoken of?—That is a deduction for damaged goods if she drops something on the floor.

5540. There are some other fines which are in a different category to that?—Yes.

5541. I understand you really do not object to a small fine for being late?—Not to a small fine, but I do not want them to be fined 3d. an hour when they are only earning 4s. a week.

5542. You think there is no objection to a small fine for an offence which they can easily prevent themselves, such as being late in the morning?—I do not object at all. If they will not come in time, I should inflict a small fine, and if that did not cure them I would clear them off the premises.

5543. What is the objection to raffling a suit of clothes? I suppose the girl got out of it without loss?—Yes, but it is illegal. I have no objection.

5544. She was not hurt at all? She got the value?—Yes; she raffled it at 3d. a time. I have seen the things raffled hundreds of times. They have perhaps twenty at 3d. a time, and some poor person gets hold of a good suit for 3d.

5545. The majority of firms do without fines?—Some firms do not fine at all. The majority of firms do not fine unless they are extremely busy; I am speaking of fining for coming late.

5546. Is there a single firm in Leeds which does not fine for girls coming late?—Yes; L3, F3, and G3.

5547. They do not fine when they are busy and the workers come late?—That is so.

5548. Suppose Z2 are busy, how much per week do the fines amount to in the aggregate?—I could not tell you, because they fluctuate so with the hands.

5549. They have a long list of fines which look very formidable, and what I wish to get at is what the fines amount to, so that we can see what the percentage on the wages is?—I could not answer that.

5550. Could you give us any idea?—No. I will make a note of it and find out for you. I would not like to make a statement about that from memory, because I could not prove it.

5551. You could not say what it was in any firm?—No, I could not.

5552. When these firms are busy, you have no idea what proportion the fines bear to the total wages received?—No. Some seven or eight years ago a female came to me from D3, who had been dismissed. She had been late two or three mornings, and the boss saw he could not make any impression upon her, and he dismissed her. She came to our shop and brought her wage book with her. She had been fined £2 17s. in two years, and wanted to know if she could get it back. I said, Yes. I sent her up to Bruce, the stipendiary magistrate, and she got back that £2 17s. She was only averaging between 8s. and 9s. a week for the two years.

5553. Was that amount for being late, principally?—Yes, £2 17s. in 104 weeks; that is 6d. a week.

5554. That is all I have to ask you, unless you can give me the proportion which fines bear to wages received?—No, I could not give you that. You might track it from the book you have under your hand.

By Mr. Walsh.

5555. Sir Frederick has already put one point which I was going to put to you. Is there any audit at all held on behalf of the workpeople? Do they audit the accounts?—No.

5556. Under the Truck Acts you will probably be aware there is a power given to the workmen to audit the accounts?—Yes, I am aware of that.

5557. No audit ever takes place?—No.

5558. Therefore your promise to Sir Frederick that you will find out for him will probably be a little difficult to carry out? You mean you will do as much as you can, I suppose?—Yes.

5559. I understood you to say there were three firms—L3., F3., and G3.—where no fines at all were inflicted?—Yes; that is for being late in the morning.

5560. It is only for being late that no fines are inflicted?—That is so.

5561. Does suspension or dismissal take the place of fines in those places?—No. They have got some nice hands in, and they find by treating them nicely and quietly they can get them there, and they are all in a nice, steady-going swing.

5562. Is it your opinion that improved discipline has developed a higher standard of conduct on the part of the workers?—Undoubtedly it has.

5563. You have had no complaints from those places of discipline being relaxed or lowered in consequence of no fines having been inflicted?—No.

5564. No complaint, even from the employers?—No, not a word from them.

5565. I suppose in your capacity of secretary you receive from time to time complaints even from the employers?—Yes.

5566. Of relaxed discipline?—Yes, many a time, but not often of the females; it is of the youths generally 5567. In the case of I3. you told us that there were no fines at all ?—That is so.

5568. But there was a deduction of ½d. out of each shilling for power ?—That is so.

5569. But there were no fines at all ?—That is according to that book ; there are no fines down there.

5571. There is a higher state of discipline now, you think ?—Yes.

5572. You said that ½d. in each shilling for power supplied was in your opinion the worst thing of all : how do you mean ?—I object to that, so far as I am concerned, more than the deducting for damaged goods and fining for being late.

5573. Because of the extent of it ?—No. I think it is quite sufficient that we should work for the paltry wages we are getting without at the same time buying the machinery, which we are doing when they knock ½d. off every shilling.

5574. But from the point of view of the worker's necessity to know his or her earnings, is it not better to know distinctly what they are going to have and to know what particular deduction will be made, than to have it liable to the caprice of the foreman ?—Yes.

5575. So that in that sense, although you may feel that the charge is extremely heavy, and is probably a charge which ought not to be made in your opinion—— ? —Yes.

5576. Yet, inasmuch as the worker does possess a certainty, it has a certain advantage ? Have you looked at it in that light ?—Yes. They will know what they are going to draw. If they have earned 12s. they will know they will get 11s. 6d.

5577. And there is no other deduction which the employer will make ?—That is so.

5578. Is it your opinion that in that sense it gives a worker comparative certainty at least ?—That is so.

5579. The Chairman has submitted the matter to you very much on the lines that I was going upon. You think it fair that the right of fine should be maintained by the employer where a worker is late.?—No, I do not say so, but where they will persist in coming in six, seven, or eight minutes late, you are bound to impose a fine, because I would not let them come into my own place late morning after morning. It is not fair to the employers, and it is not fair to the workpeople themselves.

5580. Of course the law of the land might decide that fining was altogether impossible, but it also might decide upon your lines that the employer should have the right to fine where a worker was persistently late : would not that open the door to other abuses ?—Yes, perhaps it would.

5581. In that case the innocent would be punished for the offence of the guilty ?—Yes.

5582. I submit to you this point for your consideration, that where a work person might only be fined 1d. or 2d. for being late, that would hardly act as a deterrent so much as if he felt that for that persistent kind of conduct he would be liable to dismissal ?—I favour the dismissal rather than the fine ; I do, indeed.

5583. Dismissal would probably develop in the workers a greater recognition of discipline and the necessity of conforming to it ?—Yes, it would.

5584. Because, as a matter of fact, it would really be a greater penalty for persistent lateness ?—Yes.

5585. And, inasmuch as the fine will only be a very small one, in many cases they will be prepared for that, will they not ?—Yes, and take no notice of it.

5586. And be indifferent ?—Yes, that is so.

5587. Whereas if dismissal were hanging as a penalty over their head they would probably attain to a higher standard of conduct ?—That is so.

By Mr. Maddison.

Mr. H. Withey.

14 Nov. 1906.

5588. First I will ask you a general question. What is your experience of the operation of the Truck Acts in Leeds. Take the 1896 Act, which says a fine must be fair and reasonable : what is your experience of the operation of that Act ? Do the inspectors often intervene ?—Not unless we put them on, as far as I have seen. I believe he has had one or two cases. There is one clothing firm which was fined £5, but I did not find out what it was for. I do not know who reported them. I did not.

5589. I want a general reply ; would you say that the Acts so far as those deductions are concerned, have been a failure, that they are a dead letter, that is, not put in operation ?—No, I would not say so.

5590 Do you not think that some of the fines which you have mentioned are obviously unreasonable ?—I do. I think this one is a disgrace to any firm in the world.

5591. That is Z2, is it not ?—Yes.

5592. Has the factory inspector ever had his attention called to it ?—I do not know whether he has or not. I should say the factory inspector ought to demand to see it.

5593. That is what I want to know ?—That I cannot tell you.

5594. The Union apparently does not use the inspector very much ?—I have used him a good deal, and he has done very well for me.

5595. Have you many cases ?—Yes ; I have written to him forty or fifty times.

5596. What about, this document of Z2 ?—This has only cropped up this last week. I only got this on Monday night, after telegraphing for it.

5597. Would you say, in your long experience of the clothing trade of Leeds, that fines are increasing or decreasing—that the practice of fining is increasing or decreasing ?—They are decreasing.

5598. At I3 there are no fines at all ?—That is so.

5599. Were there no fines during that rather lax period when the women used to go out to the beer shop ? —No, there could not have been I am not going to say there were not, but there could not have been, or they would not have gone out.

5600. The one place in Leeds where they have no fines is the most lax place you know ?—No, I do not say so. It was some years ago.

5601. Where you are quite sure there were no fines at the time, for the reason you have given ?—Yes.

5602. It is still a little lax ?—Yes, but they are keener.

5603. It would not compare with your firm, for instance ?—No.

5604. So that it does really come to this, that the one firm where there are no fines, is a little more lax than your firm or Z2 ?—Yes. I do not want you to class Z2 with ours. We only fine our girls when we are busy, and working overtime. In the slack season they can come in when they like.

5605. How do you account for the abolition of fines, or the non-existence of fines, in I3 working so badly ? —I can account for it in two ways, but I cannot prove either. In olden times I3 was such an absolutely rotten shop (I am bound to use that expression) that practically the whole of the workers were married women, or the loose women, shall I say, of Leeds. They were the masters of the situation so far that if they wanted to have a day off to booze they had it, and if they wanted to work, they worked. The women would not have tolerated a fine ; they would have walked out in a body.

5606. There were exceptional circumstances in connection with I3 ?—Yes.

5607. May I ask how the wages of I3 compare with those of your people or any of the ordinary firms ?— Z2 is the worst paid shop in the place.

5608. Is I3 good ?—I will not say it is good.

5609. Is it average ?—It is slightly under the average.

5610. I must ask you one question about the L3 ; is that a wholesale works ?—Yes.

[Mr. H. Withey. 14 Nov. 1906.

5611. Have they any fines?—No.

5612. Nor deductions for material or damages?—Very slight. I might almost say 'No' to that. They are very lenient.

5613. What about the discipline?—Good.

5614. What about wages?—Fairly good.

5615. What type of girl?—All right.

5616. A good type of girl?—Yes; I wish they were all like them.

5617. So that you have here a place where there are no fines, a good type of girl, the discipline well maintained, with fairly good wages?—Yes, and shorter hours than any other firm in the town, bar one. They work forty-eight hours.

5618. You would put L3 in the highest flight?—Yes. If anyone asked me for a list, L3 would be among them. They are six.

5619. Now about suspensions, would you include the abolition of suspensions as well as fines?—Not suspensions.

5620. Perhaps I should ask you whether suspensions amongst the girls in the clothing trade of Leeds is at all a prevalent practice—suspending a girl for one day, two days, or three days?—Not unless there is no work.

5621. Suspension in Leeds is practically non-existent as a disciplinary punishment?—That is so.

5622. But suppose we proposed to abolish fines, would you say we ought to include suspensions in that abolition?—They ought to be done without.

5623. You say we ought to include suspensions in the same category as fines, and abolish them both?—Abolish them both. I contend that if they got the proper workmen over these girls, they can get as good discipline out of them without fines as with them, and with no bullying. They have to be firm with them; that is all.

5624. Among low-priced girl-labour, would you view with any apprehension the bare alternative of dismissal for the employer—warning and dismissal? Would not there be a danger of a great many dismissals among those poor girls earning very small money?—I do not think so. If the firms can supply the quantity, you will find that the majority of the females in the clothing trade in Leeds would rather have the common work than the better class work.

5625. My point is this—whether if they were to abolish fines and suspensions, there would be any danger of us having subjected the girls to dismissals of a very frequent character?—I do not think so at all. I do not think it would affect them in the slightest.

5626. You have told us that fines go to the profit of the firm?—Part of them.

5627. You would not say that employers regard fines as a profitable source of income?—No, I do not infer that, but they do not spend the bulk of the fines on the trip which they give to the workpeople. Perhaps some of them do.

5628. So that all that portion goes to their income, and yet you still say that the employer does not regard fines at all as a favourable source of income—that he would rather be without them, in a word?—Yes, I should say so, unless it is that some of them feel that they would like to fine so that they can make themselves look big one day in the year and give the workpeople a trip, and pay for their ticket.

5629. Suppose we were to say that there should be no deduction for material, that the employer should supply cotton and everything else that goes into the garment, would you say that there was any danger of more waste with the firm's material than there is now?—No.

5630. As a general proposition, would you agree that we take more care of our own stuff than we do of other people's?—We may do a little, but still there would not be a farthing waste in a twelvemonth.

5631. I gather from you that although there might be a little danger in that direction, it could all be met by supervision?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

5632. You said that fines were decreasing; is that the effect of the Act of 1896?—I think so. It must be. It is undoubtedly decreasing because three or four of the firms have given up their trips.

5633. You have found a difference between the state of things now and ten years ago before the Act came into force?—We have not.

5634. You would not say there was very much difference?—No, I would not speak on that point.

5635. Because I notice that among the fines you read out, and the deductions, a good many of the specific instances which you gave are obviously offences against the Act as it stands?—Yes, that is so.

5636. For instance, you mentioned the case of H3, a firm which makes its workers take any garment which is damaged, and pay for it?—Yes.

5637. Do you happen to know that that particular firm has been prosecuted by the factory inspectors?—No, it has not been prosecuted. He got up too late and he could not prove it, but I gave him the tip, and he told me that if it occurred again he would prosecute them.

5638. This particular firm has been prosecuted by the factory inspectors for that very offence—making their workers pay for garments which they had damaged?—They have been prosecuted two or three times.

5639. And they were convicted by the stipendiary at Leeds for that thing?—I was not aware of that.

5640. That is the case. So far as that class of cases goes, it is an offence and has been successfully prosecuted as such under the Act as it stands. You say that in I3 ½d. is deducted in every shilling from the workers' wages for power?—Yes.

5641. You say that is excessive?—Yes.

5642. And exceeds the actual cost to the employer?—It exceeds the actual cost of the power, yes.

5643. Have you brought that to the notice of the factory inspector?—No. I knew nothing about this till Monday.

5644. Have you not often had complaints of this during your experience?—We have only nineteen females out of 7,000 in Leeds, who work in clothing factories, in our society.

5645. Are these deductions only made from the wages of the females?—Yes. None of these fines I have spoken of are from the males; it is all female labour I am speaking of, and all piece work.

5646. No males are employed in this class of work?—Only the foremen in the different departments.

5647. Are the women organised at all?—No; there are only nineteen of them in the society.

5648. They have nobody to call the attention of the factory inspector to these cases?—No, unless they call my attention to it, and then I report it. I reported one where they were working till four o'clock in the morning. They pulled up a few months since.

5649. Where the factory inspector has intervened, he has intervened successfully?—Yes. I have nothing to complain of with regard to Mr. Hine.

5650. The present state of things is rather due to the fact that these matters have gone on unnoticed?—The girls will not complain.

5651. It is not the fault of the Act of 1896 in itself?—Now you mention it, I believe Mr. Hine's attention was called to that ½d. in the shilling, and I think—I would not be positive—that he wrote to tell me it was all right, because the employer had notices stuck up in the shop to that effect, or something which covered the Truck Act.

5652. The Truck Act also provides that the price charged must not exceed the cost to the employer. What I am trying to get at is this; how far the Act of 1896 is defective, and is not sufficient to put a stop to these abuses, or how far they are due to the fact that the inspectors have not had time to cover the whole of the country yet, or to the fact that they have not been brought to their notice?—There are not enough factory inspectors. We have not enough in Leeds, at any rate.

5653. I want to clear my mind about this case of Z2. What class of girls do they employ ?. Are they better or worse ?—Better. They have the best class of girls.

5654. And yet they pay them the worst wages ?—Yes.

5655. How do they manage to get the best class of girls when they pay the worst wages ?—I do not say they are the best workers. You may find the commonest girls are the best workers in the clothing trade. I mean that their parents are a little better off and they send them to Z2 because it is a respectable shop ; they make them go well dressed, and all that sort of thing.

5656. What do you mean by a respectable shop ?—They do not allow them to rove about the streets in the dinner hour ; they do not allow them to run out without their hats on, but they must dress themselves up. A girl is fined if she goes outside that place with her hat off, and she is fined if she stands outside the door a minute before she goes in. She must go straight in.

5657. What I do not quite understand is how Z2 can get the best class of girls ?—I do not say they are the best workers.

5659. Do they work as hard ?—They work as many hours, but they do not work so hard because they do not get the work to do. Still, they are compelled to go there, and if they go there in the morning they are not allowed to go out before night except for meals. There is no such thing as saying, " I have no more work for you to-day ; you can go home." That is a great hardship, because some of these girls could go home and help their mothers.

5660. You say you have found great difficulty in finding out what the list of fines was in the different shops ?—Yes.

5661. Supposing these things continued to exist, would you favour a placard posted up in the shop in preference to a contract with the individual worker ; the Truck Act of 1896 gives the alternative ?—I favour its being sent to the Home Office here, not allowing these employers to fix anything they like. When they are making the new rules, they should be submitted here to some Committee. There are not two alike.

5662. You mean the Home Office should have the task of settling these things ?—Certainly, for each firm. I do not say you should tie every firm down to word for word, but see that they are not contravening the Act, which this set of Z2's is.

5663. That would be a very large task for any Government Department to undertake ?—You could put an official on.

5664. You realise that if no fines or deductions are allowed there is a possibility that a firm may resort instead to one of several alternatives. They may, for example, reduce wages ?—If they reduced the price of garments, that would be far better than deductions. I favour that rather than deductions.

5665. Suppose deductions for damaged goods were made illegal, would there be anything to prevent an employer saying to a girl, " The next piece of work which you do like this I shall reduce your price for it, as the result of the damage done " ?—He cannot. The price lists are hung up in the room, stating what they are to receive. He cannot say, " I shall reduce you so much because you have damaged so much previously."

5666. To what extent is he bound by the price list ?—The girls would absolutely refuse to work for less. As soon as there is a new garment, the price is put down. Our price list is in the shop and it is hung up on the pillars in each department.

5667. Are the prices fixed for all time, or are they subject to alteration ?—They are subject to alteration from time to time, provided there is a little bit less work or a little bit more work necessary for the garments.

5668. You said that the girls complain not only of deductions from their wages, but also of reductions of prices ?—That is so.

5669. If that is so at present, there is nothing to prevent the employer using the same power, and instead of deducting from wages, reducing the price for an article ?—There is nothing to prevent him.

5670. You do not get rid of deductions by saying there shall be no deductions ?—This is a reduction, not a deduction.

5671. It is the same thing under a different name ?—Yes, but I would rather have that than the other. They would hail with delight the putting an end to deduction, throughout the town, and it is not a big thing to stop all these deductions.

5672. As regards suspensions, that is another possibility. You told Mr. Maddison that you knew of no such thing as suspension as a punishment for an offence ?—No, I have not.

5673. I see in one of these lists which you have handed in this rule : " Weekly and time hands must mark their own time. Anyone marking for another person will be suspended for one day for each offence ? "—That is with regard to males. There is not one female in a hundred on time in the wholesale clothing trade.

5674. This only applies to male workers ?—No, it applies to females also, but there is not a female worker working on time.

5675. This would equally apply to piece work ?—I think not.

5676. " Weekly and time hands," it refers to, I see. I was reading that as an instance of suspension as a means of punishment. That only applies to time hands ?—Yes, and males in ninety-nine cases out of 100.

5677. Is that often enforced ?—No. Forty-seven were suspended for three weeks recently.

5678. Do you think that rule is a dead letter ?—Yes ; I have never heard of anyone being suspended except when there is slack trade.

5679. It is obviously a weapon which the employer possesses and which he could exercise if you took away his power of fining ?—Yes.

5680. Mr. Maddison asked you whether you would be in favour of prohibiting suspensions as well as fines, and you said " Yes ? "—Because suspension is a dead letter.

5681. If you took away the power of the employer to fine, he might say, " I will suspend you for a day.' You would be in favour of preventing him doing that ?—Yes. You are putting it in another light. They only suspend them when they are working short time. If he cannot fine a person 6d. for touching the electric light, because fines are prohibited, you mean he might suspend her for a day ?

5682. Yes ?—I should put my foot down on it very keenly. I would not allow that.

5683. May I ask how you would propose to prevent an employer suspending his workers ?—You cannot, because he could always turn round and say, " I have nothing for you to do."

5684. It would hardly be practicable to prevent an employer suspending if he wanted to ?—No. He always holds the whip hand, because he can say, " I have nothing whatever for you to do."

5685. Does that modify your view at all that all fines and deductions should be prohibited ?—I would prohibit every one of them barring for coming late in the morning ; I would have a small fine there.

5686. Would suspension be a worse punishment for a girl than a fine ?—It would make her suffer, and would probably make her family suffer in some instances. I do not want a girl to suffer.

5687. You mentioned out-workers casually at the outset of your evidence, but I do not think that your evidence referred to out-workers in detail at all ?—No. It is the Jewish Union. Of course out-working is the curse of the trade. It is done at home under the worst conditions of labour that one could imagine.

Mr. H. Withey.

5688. There is an immense amount of out-work in the clothing trade ?—Yes, and it is terrible to see.

5689. Are fines and deductions applied to these out-workers in the same way as to in-workers ?—Not to women out-workers. I do not know what the Jewish Union does. But with regard to the women who fetch the trousers out to sew the buttons on and so on, there are no fines and deductions.

5690. Suppose the out-worker damages the work ?—I suppose he would have to pay for it.

5691. Then he would be subject to the system of deduction ?—Yes.

5692. Could we get any evidence as to the out-workers in Leeds ?—Yes ; I could get you some information. I will do my utmost ; I cannot do more.

5693. The Jewish Union would know more than anyone else about Jewish employees ?—Yes.

5694. The Jewish employees form the bulk of the out-workers ?—Yes.

5695. One question about the charges for mess rooms : you are opposed to any charges being made for mess rooms or cooking ?—I am.

5696. It is the case that the provision of a mess room is entirely voluntary on the part of the employer ?—No, I think not.

5697. I think there is nothing in the Factory Act which requires the provision of a mess room : there is no compulsion on the employer to provide facilities for cooking ?—There is a provision made that the workers shall not remain on the premises, but that the workshops must be closed at a certain hour. I think you are wrong this time. I believe that a place must be provided where they can have meals away from their workshops. The workshops must be locked up, and thoroughly ventilated one hour at dinner time. I do not know what it is, but there is something to that effect.

5698. The provision which I think you are referring to is the provision in the Factory Act which says that during the meal times women and young persons shall not remain in the rooms in which any manufacturing process is carried on. But there is no obligation on the part of an employer to provide a room in which the workers shall take their meals. The employer can turn them out of the factory during the dinner hour and leave them to get their meal outside. Is not the provision of a mess room convenient to the workers ?—Oh yes, and it is a convenience to the bosses too. If the girls had to go home to their dinner, they would take an hour or an hour and a quarter, and they would soon tire of it when they are busy—it pays the employer as well.

5699. Still, it is a voluntary provision on the part of the employer ?—Yes.

5700. And it is also a convenience to the girls ?—Yes.

5701. Do you see any objection in principle to the girls paying something for that convenience ?—No, if they only charged those people who get their dinners there, but if they make every person pay whether he goes there or not I object.

5702. I agree. Supposing it was provided that only those girls paid who used the mess room or the facilities for cooking, and so on, and the charge made to the girl did not exceed the cost to the employer, but was a fair charge, you would not then object to deductions being made for such convenience ?—No ; they are getting something for the deduction there.

5703. Quite so ; the girls are getting something for which they pay ?—Yes.

5704. You said in one case a girl on dismissal recovered fines imposed over a period of two years ?—Yes, £2 17s.

5705. Can you tell me under what section she recovered ?—No.

5706. Or what the nature of the proceedings was ?—No ; it is eight or nine years since.

5707. You have no particulars ?—No. I could try and get them. It was £2 17s., I know, because it was cut out of the paper and stuck on the wall by one of the chaps who was a little antagonistic to the firm at the time.

By the Chairman.

5708. In the first place, can you tell me the average wage of the women workers indoors—not out-workers ?—All the year round ?

5709. One case with another, on an average, how many shillings a week will they earn ?—Can I look at my book for a moment ?

5710. Yes. Take into account the time they are in work and when they are off work ?—9s.

5712. You have told us that there are only nineteen women in your Union as yet ?—Yes.

5713. Is the condition of those nineteen women a fair sample of the condition of those who are not yet in the Union ?—Yes ; they are not all in one shop.

5714. Do you think if these women had a strong Trades Union that some of those things which you have given us such good evidence about might be rectified by their united protest against the system ?—It is a fact, sir. All those deductions would have been stopped years since if they had been strong enough. That is what we tell them every time they come to us.

5715. With that class of worker the formation of such a Union would be attended with some difficulty ?—Yes.

5716. You have said that 9s. a week is the average wage : is that the average wage for full employment ?—I am taking a twelvemonth, short time, full time, and overtime. This does not include the girls who have just started.

5717. Apart from short time on the one hand and overtime on the other, would the average steady wage for full employment be about 9s. ?—Yes, as near as you could get it.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Thursday, November 22nd, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thos. Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman)

Sir Frederick Cawley, Bart., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
S. Walsh, Esq., M.P.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary.)

Miss GERTRUDE TUCKWELL was recalled; and further Examined.

Miss G. Tuckwell.
22 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

5718. You have something you wish to put in, I think?—Yes, I will put in the name of the firm and of the Paper Mills. (M.3.) I will also put in two sets of budgets (Exhibit No. 1. of Appendix VIII. B.) making up 15s. per week. One has a few comments upon it. The girls put in their own remarks, and I did not like to stop them. One says "Burial by the Workhouse." I did not know whether you would object to that sort of graphic comment. If so, I will put in another instead. But I did not interfere with what they had done for me.

5719. I see here the amounts for food range from 6s. 6d. to 8s. a week. That is relatively large. I understand from you these are actual returns?—Yes, one from a tea packer and the other from a girl in the clothing trade.

5720. Are they from girls who live at home, as members of the family?—One says, "Pay to Mother." I only gave you two lists out of ten and it may not be one of them.

5721. There is nothing of that sort here?—Well, I have that. I can put it in if you like.

5722. I notice the rent of a room is given in one case the room being kept clean by herself?—Yes.

5723. In another case the rent is 4s., and in a further case 5s. 9d.?—Yes.

5724. Can you help us as to whether this would be a fair statement of the sum necessary to keep life going on reasonable terms in the case of a girl who is a member of her father and mother's household?—I am so sorry to answer apparently indirectly, but the fact is when you are a member of a household you pay as much as you can afford. As a matter of fact, a lot of our girls who are living at home pay everything they receive, except about twopence, to the home, so that it is very difficult to arrive at. They pay all they possibly can.

5725. Let me put the question to you in another way. Suppose you have two or three girls in this station of life who are members of their parents' household, and their father is a worker: what would be the rent of a house of that kind, to accommodate, say, five or six all told—the father and mother and four children?—I cannot tell you the rent of the house, but I can send it to you. The rent of a single room in the cases I put in comes to 4s. 6d. and 5s.

5726. I am speaking of a three-roomed house, the father being in employment and two children in employment; am I right in saying the rent of that would be about £20 a year?—I would not like to answer at random. I do not know. I must look it up.

5727. At all events, it would come to this, that those figures which you have given us might be subject to deduction in the case of family life, such as I have alluded to?—They would be subject to deduction, because it might be that the parents could not get more out of the girl. I consider that their food estimate is understated. I do not consider a girl can really feed herself on the amount she has given you there.

5728. Are there any other documents you wish to put in?—Yes I wish to put in copies of the tickets (See Exhibit No. 2. of Appendix VIII. B.) I mentioned last time and showed you—tickets collected at the door of a factory which we chose at random. It was a biscuit factory (N.3.) You were interested in hearing that in each case there were deductions, and in one case the wage of 3s. 7d. came down to 3s. 2d. for a full grown girl. I have brought four of those.

5729. Before you pass them that, a certain question arises in my mind when I see those documents?—This was typed the moment before I left, and I have not looked at it; I hope it is all right. Then I wanted to put in the list of fines and deductions of Z. 2 (See Exhibit No. 3. of Appendix VIII. B.). That is particularly interesting, because that is a model factory. They say that no girl can be employed who is not moral, and everyone must be very respectable; it is, in fact, a factory to which the mothers say well-conducted girls go. I wanted to put in that list, because it shows you the sort of fines and deductions which obtain among the so-called good employers with regard to the lower class of workers, that is, the lowest paid. The girls are very neat. He makes a point of that. Then I wanted to put in this list (Exhibit No. 4. (A.) of Appendix VIII. B.), because it applies to the textile factories of Belfast. You will remember that I said that if a girl was fined all possible fines and deductions they would amount to over £1 per week, her set wage being 6s. per week. This list (Exhibit No. 4. (B.) of Appendix VIII. B.) is from O.3. It governs a considerable number of textile factories in Belfast. Then you thought it would be interesting to have the wage sheets taken from the girls at Z.2. (Exhibit No. 5. A. of Appendix VIII. B.) and A. 2. (Exhibit No. 5. B. of Appendix VIII. B.), showing fines for cooks, benevolence, fines, and sewings. I will hand them in. I think I have now put in all you asked for.

5730. I should like to ask you about your statement that the Truck Act 1896 had broken down; on what do you base that?—On the Home Office figures.

5731. Do they prove that the Truck Act has broken down?—Surely. I did not mean to bring the papers with me which I had last time, and I find I have not that with me, but I think you will find from both the tables in the women inspectors' reports and the percentage taken in the men's, that the percentage of successful prosecutions is extraordinarily small. I remember I calculated that under the Truck Act in one year you lose one-fifth of your cases, as against one-fiftieth of the cases taken under the Factory and Workshops Act.

5732. Are not the prosecutions under the Factory Act very much simpler than those under the Truck Act?—I should say so, certainly. I should be very sorry to prosecute under the present Truck Act.

5734. It may be on account of the difficulty in the subject matter?—Oh, no. I beg your pardon for contradicting, but put to yourself the number of things which you have to do, the extraordinary number of points which you have to meet if you take proceedings under the Truck Act. It seems to me that although you have got the most admirable inspectors, for whom I have profound admiration, their work is getting more difficult. A lady writing on behalf of the Freedom and Labour Defence the other day to the "Tribune" explained that really you are getting practically no prosecutions at all under the Truck Act, and used that as an argument to show that there were no fines and deductions.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

22 Nov. 1906.

5735. I should say that that was a complete mistake?—She took your own figures—the Government figures.

5738–9. Well, when a case of deductions to cover a certifying surgeon's fees was brought to our notice, the Home Office took the view that it was covered by the Act of 1896, and instructed the inspector at once to say that it must not go on, and it was dropped. I do not remember any other cases where a deduction for the certifying surgeon's fee has been made which have been brought to our notice?—It was because it was one of a series of cases of that description, in which we had deductions for the little books in which particulars were furnished and appeared to me to be very comparable to the cases which I hope the Committee is bearing in mind—which it was promised should be borne in mind—of deductions for compensation, that I wrote to the Home Office; I was anxious to get a test case upon it in order to see whether the Truck Act covered it.

5740. You mean the case of the fee of the certifying surgeon?—Yes, all those cases which come under the words "any other thing to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman," which are so wide that I think you could take action.

5742. As regards the fees of the certifying surgeon, do you say that the case which you brought to our notice was one of a long series?—I say it was one of a long series of that kind. I was very anxious that we should take that case, because if we had won it we should again have raised the question of compensation, and again raised the question with regard to the book of particulars. I do not say that now there is the same need to do it, because this Committee is sitting, but my impression was that we should then have shown how ridiculous the thing was, when people were being mulcted simply for paying the doctor and things of that sort, we should have shown either that the Act was no good, or else we should have shown that it did cover those cases.

5743. In that particular case the thing was stopped as soon as it was brought to our notice. So far as I can see, it does not show that the Act of 1896 has broken down?—That is one of my strongest points. I am sorry if we do not agree about it. I have papers showing the numbers of cases which the women inspectors have lost, and which have been discussed. I can put in the numbers, which show they are tremendous. It is to the women inspectors we send these cases. We have come to the conclusion that the small number which are now being taken simply means that the Factory Department in its wisdom, seeing they cannot carry these points, are proceeding by warning. It is nothing to us that you should go to a firm and say, "Do not do that thing," or "Re-fund the fines and deductions," because there would be no principle involved; the thing would go on just the same in other places. In point of fact, it goes on worse.

5744. Do you advocate a prosecution in every case in which a fine or deduction is discovered which does not appear to be reasonable?—Certainly not, but I most strongly advocate prosecution in cases where you can get a test case covering a great many cases.

5745. Certainly where there is any principle involved I think you will find we have?—No, excuse me. How can you say that when you burked the prosecution which would have covered this case of the fee of the certifying surgeon, which would have covered the whole question of the meaning of the words "anything to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman"? When you did not take a prosecution on a case like that, of which we have sent you several, but merely proceeded by warning, how can you say you have taken a test case? Please understand that I am not finding fault with the department. I do not believe anybody has a greater admiration than I have for the way they do their work. What I am saying is that you have got a thing which no one can work. If I were a factory inspector, I should be sorry to take proceedings under a thing so impossible as this.

5746. Two hundred and forty-three convictions out of 319 cases does not suggest to my mind that the Act is altogether unworkable?—It suggests a comparison with the Factory and Workshops Act prosecutions, which is very serious. My point is further emphasised by the cases of our poor girls which we send to the women inspectors.

5747. Are you of opinion that practically no good has been done by the Act of 1896—that things are very much the same now as they were ten years ago?—Yes, I am not sure that they are not worse.

5748. I should like to refer you to a passage from the annual report made by Miss Squire in 1901 in which she says, "The Truck Act of 1896 has now been in force five years, and in my experience it has by degrees produced in that time, in spite of limitations, a most marked effect upon fines and deductions in all parts of the country to the advantage of the work people." That is the beginning of a long paragraph. You do not agree with that?—I think there is this to be said, that if you send extraordinarily able people (and you have got extraordinarily able people), who will bluff, and will make more than really exists out of the Act, will use it for all it is worth, and point to a great deal which they have not the power to enforce, then you may produce a great deal of effect. I admit the ingenuity and capacity of the inspectors has been great, and they have done all they can, but it is far more due to the staff you have got than to the Act itself that anything has been done. I consider, from watching it, and from seeing the way in which these fines and deductions continue to crop up, that this Act has absolutely broken down.

5749. You are aware, of course, that before 1896 fines and deductions were very prevalent?—They are very prevalent.

5750. And they were before 1896?—Yes.

5751. They covered the whole of the country?—Yes.

5752. And before 1896 they were absolutely under no control whatsoever—I mean they did not come under the Truck Acts?—I wonder! I think they did.

5753. Fines were definitely ruled outside the Truck Act by the case of Redgrave v. Kelly?—I do not want to get into an argument on legal points, of course, but, as you know, there is now a case which again supports the contention which made Lancashire ask to be excepted from the Act, which shows that the original contention that it was laid down that all wages should be paid in the coin of the realm was according to law the right one. I remember Miss Abraham once taking a prosecution under this Act.

5754. I suppose you are referring to the recent House of Lords decision?—Yes.

5755. That does not touch the condition of things before 1896. The Home Office prosecuted in the case of Redgrave v. Kelly and it was carried to the High Court and the Home Office lost; it was ruled that fines were outside the Act?—Yes.

5756. And that was the unquestioned state of the law till 1896?—Yes.

5757. That the Home Office had no power over fines and deductions before 1896 ?—Yes.

5758. In 1896, this Act was passed, and the Home Office had to attack the whole system of fines and deductions throughout the country; is it surprising that in less than ten years unreasonable fines and deductions should not have been altogether abolished ?—Of course if I were to agree with you that the position is that fines and deductions have not been "altogether" abolished, I might be able to say it was not surprising, but when I say to you, as I firmly believe, that fines and deductions are as bad as they ever were; when I tell you that I cannot send people round to inquire about the extension of particulars to a certain class of home work without finding numbers of fines and deductions; when I put in the documentary evidence which I did the other day, which does not represent anything like as much as I could have put in (I knew you could not find room for more in the Appendix); and when I know, when I come across these things, that they have gone on sometimes for a very considerable time, you will see I cannot agree with you. And, after all, I am connected with 100,000 women directly—I am only connected with others incidentally—and I do not come across one-thousandth part of the fines and deductions which exist.

5759. Home workers are rather outside the question, because to a very large extent they have been ruled outside the Act and the Home Office has no power to deal with them ?—Not as regards fines and deductions ?

5760. No ?—Not when they are directly employed ?

5761. Except in so far as there is a contract to do the work personally ?—It is a great mistake to suppose that our home workers are employed by sub-contractors.

5762. That is not the point, I think. The High Court ruled that unless the out-worker is bound by his contract to do the work himself, and not to pass it on to anybody else, he (or she) does not come within the Truck Act ?—You will find, I think, that your inspectors take up any case in which the work is given out directly. I know they do. The number of cases in which the work is sub-contracted to anybody else, or in which other people are employed, is very small. The number of persons who take out the work and do it directly, and say they are going to do it directly, are very large.

5763. I do not suppose for a moment that the number of cases in which the out-workers do the work themselves is small, but there must be a contract to do the work personally. That was the reason we failed in Donegal, and why we failed recently in Nottingham ?—Incidentally you are giving one of the most crushing reasons why the Truck Act, 1896, is no good.

5764. Because it does not deal sufficiently with out-workers ? However, I am going outside the point ?—I do not mean to limit it to out-workers. But it is curious when you are making any sort of inquiry to come across fines and deductions in the way you do. I tried to point out to the Committee last time that if I stand at the door of any factory or workshop or whatever it may be, and take the girls' wage bills as they go away, the chances are there will be deductions on them. I am referring to girls employed in the lowest paid work. I ruled out shop assistants and textile workers, not because they do not suffer, but because I do not want to bring them in. Among factory and workshop workers or home workers you will always find fines and deductions.

5765. You are of opinion that no good has been done by the Truck Act, 1896 ?—Practically. I think Lancashire was right to say they would prefer to be under the law which, although the decision of Redgrave v. Kelly had gone against us, might yet be set right. I think Lancashire was right to say they would prefer coming under a law which they said virtually regulates the whole thing.

5766–9. That does not answer my question. Are you or are you not of opinion that the Truck Act, 1896, has produced no effect ?—Practically, yes.

5770. Then you made another statement: you said inspectors were afraid to take cases ?—Yes; I have said so just now 5771. What is your authority for that ?—My own experience. We send in cases, and you proceed by warning, as you did in the case of the certifying surgeon. You go to the employer and ask him to withdraw it. That is always happening. The man who is employing girls at such low wages and mulcting them of part of their money by fines ought not to be cajoled. He has to be because you have this law, but if the law were worth anything you could show him up.

5772. I do not think it is correct to say the Home Office do that. Their instructions are that if the inspectors find a case, unless it is specially bad, they are to tell the employer that unless he puts the thing right at once he will be prosecuted. Is that an unreasonable method of procedure. Take the case of the certifying surgeon. That was an isolated case as far as I know. We had had no such case brought to our notice before. When it was brought to our notice, instructions were sent that the inspector must see the employer. The employer stopped when he was told that it was illegal. Do you call that cajoling the employer ?—This is what would have happened if it had been under the Factory and Workshops Act: you would have done as you did in the case of the flower shop the other day; you would have prosecuted. You have these girls paying for their particulars books and paying the certifying surgeon, and the men paying workmen's compensation. You do not take a test case because you know the chances are you will lose it. You have not a law behind you which is strong enough to go upon, and I think you are right. When I say "cajoled" do not think that I am saying anything disrespectful to the factory inspectors. What I say is you are thrown back upon that when you have a law like this to deal with.

5773–6. I am afraid I cannot agree with you about the motives which actuate the Home Office. I should like to ask you for some further details on your list of cases ?—I thought I gave you the details.

5777. Well, I should like to ask you for some further details about the case of the jam factory you referred to (K. 1). 2s. 6d. was charged for broken glasses out of a wage of 10s. or 11s. a week ?—Yes.

5778–9. Is that a fixed deduction, or is it in proportion to the actual damage done ?—I gave you an instance in which 2s. 6d. had been taken from a girl's wages for breaking a glass. If you want to know if it is on the list which is stuck up I will find out for you, I do not know. I only put it in as a case where a girl had been fined. It was a complaint which went to the inspector.

5780. Can you give the Committee any information as to what the damage represented ? It may have been reasonable, or it may have been quite unreasonable ?—Does not the evidence go on to say anything about it ? I thought I said the foreman stated it did not represent the damage, but it was necessary to do it for disciplinary purposes. I know that is mentioned somewhere, but it may be somewhere else. It was with regard to K. 2 certainly.

5781. I do not think we need pursue it. Will you tell the Committee what period these fines and deductions cover: are they quite recent cases ?—They cover some period of time. I took them after 1896. I took them from the time when the Act might fairly be considered to be in operation. The greater number of those I gave you were quite recent—within the last two years, 1905 and 1906, but they date back till immediately after the Act came into operation.

By the Chairman.

5782. If you look at Question 5292 you will find Miss Tuckwell is right. The question I put was: "The ostensible object may be damage but the true object is discipline; may I put it so ?" and the answer was, "If you like to put it in that kind way." That was your attitude—that it was due to discipline ?—I said, if you liked to put it in that kind way. I did not put it in that way. I call it another way of putting money into the pockets of the employers.

By Mr. Delevingne.

5783. I suppose you would agree that any fine in respect of damaged work which exceeds the damage to the employer, and which is put on as a matter of discipline, is quite illegal under the Act of 1896 ? The Act is quite clear that the deduction must not exceed the damage, and so far as it is imposed as a matter of discipline and the deduction is out of proportion to the damage, it is illegal ?—You do not need me to remind you of the case of the Bristol tailors ?

Miss G. Tuckwell.

22 Nov. 1906.

5784. Perhaps you will give the Committee the details ?—I think I have it here, but I know it has been put in evidence so I was not going to put it in. A girl was paid 6½d. per pair for making trousers. Amounts were deducted from this wage until the total amount of a spoilt pair (viz., £2 5s.) was paid off. This took two years. It was held that the deductions were fair and reasonable.

5785. That was a case where the girl had to buy damaged trousers ?—Yes.

5786-7. You are aware the Home Office has taken prosecutions since where almost exactly the same point was raised, and in which convictions were obtained ?—You can obtain convictions now and then. My point is you cannot be sure of getting them under this Act. You can never be sure that you will not get a magistrate who will say, perfectly justly under this Act, that the amount deducted represented the loss to the firm.

5788. As you have mentioned that, I should like to take it at once. The Bristol case was a very important case, of course, but the Home Office was not satisfied that compelling workers to take damaged goods and pay their value in full was legal under the Truck Act. Cases have been taken since then with the express object of raising the point, both in London and Leeds, and in each case since convictions have followed, and the employers have not so far ventured to take the case to a higher court. We should have been pleased if they had done so, so that we could have had an authoritative decision from the High Court. But that Bristol decision has not been followed elsewhere, and, so far, the fact that the practice is illegal is not questioned ?—Really ! Do you know the Brandauer case at Birmingham ?

5789. That was not a case of compelling the worker to buy damaged goods ?—The decision was that on the question as to whether the deductions were "fair and reasonable" three things must be considered : (1) the nature of the work ; (2) the loss to the employer ; (3) the actual wages after deductions were made. I think the same point exactly arises, and my strong view is it will go on arising. A great many of the cases which I brought were cases in which this point might have arisen. It does not seem to me that while you have a law which allows you to deduct for the possible loss to the employer you will do much good. I have followed your cases very carefully, and am glad to know they are as many as you say. You may get one or two magistrates to hold that the deductions were not fair, but I do not think under the present law, which brings in questions like the total loss to the employer that you can possibly be sure of getting a better result than in the case of Squire v. Brandauer.

5790. I admit the cases are difficult for the Home Office to establish as to what the loss is to the employer, but I am confining myself for the moment to the question of compelling workers to buy damaged goods, such as compelling the woman worker to take the pair of trousers and pay their value to the employer, and compelling the seamstress to take a shirt and pay the whole value to the employer. That was the point in the Bristol case, if I remember rightly, and it is a point which has been raised since in two cases, if not in three—two in Leeds and one in London, or two in London and one in Leeds—in which the decision has been given exactly the other way, in favour of the contention of the Home Office. I have mentioned it because many of the deductions which you mention were cases in which the girl was compelled to take the damaged goods, which the Home Office holds to be entirely illegal under the Act of 1896 ?—Of course, I can only say what I said before, that it is not a bit of good for the Home Office to hold a thing illegal while such questions as "the loss to the employer" are considered by the courts. You remember our great case in which the girls danced to a harp in the dinner hour, and it was held that the deduction made was reasonable because they raised dust. So long as you have a law like this, you will have such cases.

5791. Coming to the instances of fines proper, disciplinary fines as distinguished from deductions, I notice that the great bulk were fines for unpunctuality. May I ask whether in those cases the fine is usually assessed in this way, that if the worker is, say, perhaps five or ten minutes late she is shut out for the whole of the morning ?—In some cases that is so. I should say that to be shut out for the whole of the morning is comparatively rare, but she may be shut out till breakfast time, or perhaps for half-an-hour. In some cases there is no shutting out ; they would be admitted.

5792. In cases where they are shut out, how far is the fine which is imposed equivalent to the amount of wages not earned during the period for which they are shut out ?—I am afraid I should have to work that out from each of the individual cases. My own conclusion, as I said to the Chairman when he asked the question, is that it bears no relation at all to the amount which would be earned.

5793. You say that the fine is in excess of the amount the girl would have earned in that amount of time ?—Extraordinarily in excess. If we could introduce a system of payment on a scale equivalent to that of the fines, the Women's Trade Union League would have done its work ; I think we might feel that we could almost retire from the field.

5794. Supposing fines were abolished entirely, would you think it possible to prevent the employer shutting out his girls till breakfast or dinner time, as the case might be ? There would still be that loophole ? The employer would still be at liberty to close his factory gates till breakfast or dinner time ?—Yes.

5795. Fines would still exist, therefore, though in a different way : it would be a system by which the girl would be prevented from working for a certain period as a punishment for unpunctuality ?—Yes, I presume that would be so.

5796. You do not see your way to deal with that ?—That is a point I have not thought of. I have thought a great deal about the question of suspension and so on as a punishment. It seems to me in cases in which the admission of girls late would disorganise the work, a girl who chose to come after the proper time would have to bear the penalty of not getting to work until breakfast time ; but then she should have no other penalty.

5797. You do not see anything objectionable in that ?—I have not thought about it. On the face of it it appears to me a thing which must be.

5798. Just one word with regard to the case which you mentioned in which a whole gang was fined because the damage could not be traced to any particular girl ; was that case brought to the notice of the factory inspectors ?—All our cases are received from the workers, or from the organisers and others working among them. They are registered, and the complaints sent in on the forms suggested by Miss Anderson to the women inspector's office. If it is the case of a boy or man, it would go to Dr. Whitelegge, but the women inspectors' cases all go automatically on.

5799. You cannot say what was done there ?—We are under this difficulty that unless there is a prosecution, such as there was at Briggs's factory, we do not know what happens in the cases we send on.

5800. It seems to me to be quite illegal to fine a gang for damage which was done by some individual worker who could not be traced. You state in many cases the contracts are not posted up in conspicuous places ?—Yes.

5801. That is a very easy breach to prosecute an employer for ?—It appears now to be the only resource left to the factory inspectors to prosecute on a formal point like that. It is clear you must stick a list up or have a contract signed in writing. They can prosecute on that, but that appears to be the only resource left to them.

5802. Is it your evidence that you find a great many cases at the present time in which the notice is not posted up ?—We do get complaints about that still.

5803. Frequent complaints ?—No, I do not think they are very frequent, but we do get complaints. And as I have said, we do get fairly numerous complaints that they are put somewhere where they cannot be seen—behind a desk or somewhere out of sight.

5804. That of course is also illegal, is it not ?—Yes.

5805. It must be in a conspicuous place ?—Yes. All these complaints are immediately forwarded to Miss Anderson or to Dr. Whitelegge.

5806. If there are still a great number of cases in which that state of things exists, though it is such an easy thing both to prove and to secure a conviction for, it rather points to some other cause for the continuance of fines and deductions than to a breakdown of the Act itself ?—In the case which you took in the Potteries, where the girls were made to pay for damaging the machines, the only reason you got a conviction was that some formality, such as the announcement that the deduction was going to be made, was not complied with.

5808. Do you suggest that in that case and in other cases the employer makes a profit for himself out of these deductions for the hospital ?—Not in all. I suppose when K. 2. deduct 2s. 6d. from the girls to give them a picnic in the summer, they have the picnic in the summer, but I think these are a great many cases in which it adds to the profits of the employer.

5809. In your opinion that is so ?—In my opinion there are a very large number of cases in which the money does not go to any object which benefits the employees.

5810. It is a very serious matter for employers to deduct money from their employees' wages for hospitals, dispensaries, and so on, which they do not pass on to the hospitals and dispensaries ?—Yes. I am taking the whole of the cases—I am not only taking hospitals and dispensaries. I say in a very large number of cases I believe the deductions which are made for those purposes do not represent the sum which is paid. I would go further and say that in a great many cases the deductions which are made are not spent on the object for which they are ostensibly deducted. For instance, there is the case where all the girls had twopence deducted to pay the cook, their payments working out at over £3, while the cook received 8s. Where does it go ? There was no treat. The girls come eagerly to tell you if anything is done for them.

5811. It would be very interesting to know if that custom of making deductions from wages for hospitals and dispensaries, which go into the employer's pocket, exists to any extent ?—I do not confine myself to hospitals and dispensaries. I think it is one case out of all cases, where you cannot say that the money deducted goes to the purpose for which it is deducted. There are a good many cases. The people who fine and deduct on every pretext are not the best kind of employers, and they are not very particular where the money which they get goes to in a good many cases.

5812. You do not see the advantage, even under certain restrictions which do not exist at present, in regard to deductions for hospitals, of allowing an employer to arrange in that way for his employees to contribute to some sick fund, or for them to provide themselves with medical attendance in the case of sickness ? —It seems to me where an employer employs workers, their illness and the suffering which is entailed on them during their work is his business and not theirs. I think that sort of subscription ought to be paid, not by the workers, but by the employer himself.

5813. You mean for sickness arising out of their employment ? Or do you mean any sickness, from whatever cause arising ?—How are you to make a distinction ? I am thinking now of the case of the girls who paid a halfpenny a week, £52 being paid to the dispensary. In that case, bronze was used, and lead was used, and the work entailed a great deal of standing. There were some cases in which you would have distinctly said there was suffering from lead poisoning—mild, mind you—and other cases in which you would say that the sickness and general ill health came from bronzing. There were also a good many cases where the girls were anæmic. When you get 8s. a week to live upon you are not going to keep yourself in such a state of health as to prevent you being bowled over by colds and every sort of ailment. I consider that nothing ought to be taken from those wages for the benefit of the employee ; the employer ought to do it.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

22 Nov. 1906.

5814. With regard to mess rooms, there is no obligation upon the employer to provide a mess room except under special rules ?—That is so.

5815. Is it a convenience to workers to have a mess room provided ?—It all depends. In some instances it is a great convenience where they live far from their work and where there is nowhere to go.

5816. Would you be against an employer making a small charge where he provides that convenience for his employees ?—Yes ; I should prefer very much, if his employees have to go a long distance, that he should provide them with a room. There is very often a room which can be set aside Directly you begin to make deductions you get them taken from people who do not use the room in order to get a uniform rate ; it is easier to do. You charge every girl, although a lot go home. I have had case after case in which the girls have complained that they are made to pay for tea or hot water although they go home because they happen to live near.

5817. Supposing the practice was brought under regulation so that only those girls who made use of the convenience should pay for it, and that it was entirely a voluntary matter between the employers and employees, what would you say ?—I do not like it. There is the same objection as I have to all these things. If you do away with the whole thing, you do away with the possibility of illegality. If you allow no fines and deductions, you make the inspectors' work comparatively easy and you stop an enormous opportunity of breaking the law. If you are going to do it at all, it ought to be done by a club of the workers themselves ; they ought to manage it and run it. It ought not to be done by the employer.

5818. But the employer finds the room ?—Do you not think he might do that when he only pays 8s. to the girls ?

5819. I am looking at the matter not from my personal point of view, but of what the employers may say. Now just one or two words upon the alternatives. Supposing fines and deductions were abolished, you said you were not in favour of employers having the power of suspending ?—Yes.

5820. Have you any idea of how that could be enforced in practice ?—Only what I said—from my experience in other directions and by watching how it works and seeing how much better the discipline is where you have a capable foreman and there is no punishment. I am judging from individual experience.

5821. I was thinking of it from the administrative point of view. Say suspension for disciplinary reasons is prohibited—and that the prohibition has to be enforced by the factory inspector : will not that be very difficult to do ?—I do not see why. I do feel most strongly on the point. I can only tell you my own experience with children, and I think there is a close likeness between the two cases. You do not get good order by punishing. You get good order by capacity in managing people, and the great captains of industry ought to be more and more careful, and are becoming so, to choose the right people to manage their employees. The only way you are going to do it in the case of the employers I have been describing is by forcing them. When they find it is dismissal or nothing, they will begin to find the right people to manage their employees, and you will not get the scandal which there is now with regard to foremen and even forewomen—people absolutely incompetent to manage anybody.

22 Nov. 1906.

5822. You hold that discipline can be maintained without punishment?—Better. Any person who has taught, or had anything to do with, large bodies of people, knows that, given the power of removing a person altogether if he is impossible, he can manage better with that sort of power than with any other.

5823. You gave us a case in which a firm dismissed for very trivial offences?—Yes.

5824. Do you apprehend that practice will grow if you do away with fines?—No. They do it now.

5825. Is it the practice for many employers to dismiss?—The firm to which you refer is an exceptional one, in this respect, that they are one of the worst employers I know, but, apart from that, I do not know that their case is exceptional; employers make use of their power of dismissal now, frequently.

5826. For trivial offences?—If they want to.

5827. If there is no power of suspension or fining, the practice of dismissing for trivial offences may prove a very great hardship for the workers?—I do not think so. If you warn the workers, and say, "If you do not do this, if you cannot conform to the rules, you go," and if they understand that you have that firm rule and understand they will have to go, I believe you will not want any other resource. I am not advocating that you shall have the people all over the place and have no discipline at all.

5828. Does a girl who is dismissed in circumstances like that find it more difficult to get work at another place?—It entirely depends. I have one case now in which a girl has been black-listed and can get no work anywhere. The employer spited her and she cannot get work anywhere. Then on our Indemnity Fund we have several people who have given evidence to the factory inspectors, for whom we have some difficulty in getting work. But very often the employer does not take the trouble to bother about it.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5829. You admit, I think, that a large part of the fines is for coming late in the morning?—I did not quite admit that, I think. Mr. Delevingne said that most of the disciplinary fines which I had put in were for unpunctuality; and I said, "Yes?" because I have not my evidence before me which I gave on the last occasion and I took that from him. I should say that we get lots of fines for laughing, and for talking, and for all sorts of things.

5830. You are against any sort of fine, however small, for unpunctuality?—I am against any sort of fining for any sort of thing.

5831. The alternative to that is suspension, which is a more severe punishment than a small fine?—Suspension is fining.

5832. I am rather differentiating. One firm may fine 2d. for being late or 3d., and another firm may say, "We will not fine you, but we will not allow you to start till breakfast time." Therefore I put it to you that suspension is a more severe penalty than fining. I do not class them together; I am differentiating. Do you admit that suspension is a more severe punishment?—It is a differentation which the employers do not make, because they both fine and suspend. The girl is both fined and shut out.

5833. That surely does not happen in every case although it may in some cases. Most factories, I take it, have a rule that a certain fine shall be imposed for being late. Another firm may say, "We will not do anything of that sort, but we will suspend you; we will not allow you to start till a certain time." ?—In the cases I have put in I think you will find that you nearly always get fining and suspension together. It has never occurred to me, except when you get it in an exaggerated form, that the two things were the same. Suppose you take a case like that of E. 2, where a girl may be suspended for a fortnight simply by the will of the foreman, who says, "You can go and play" because he is angry with her; there you get a thing which is intended to be a punishment, and it is a most terrible punishment; it equals a fine of 16s. But in many factories it is very inconvenient to have people dribbling in, and the gate is shut till breakfast time. It had never occurred to me to look upon a case where a factory closes its gates at a certain hour and then opens them again at breakfast time as a punishment to the girls; that appeared to me to be part of the business of the factory.

5834. Is not that disciplinary? It tells the girls, "If you cannot be here at a certain time we will not allow you to start till another time"?—Yes. But you have treated that as a fine, have you not? I want to distinguish between punishment and order in the factory!

5835. No; I wish to differentiate between the two. That is suspension?—Yes.

5836. Do I understand that you are in favour of altering the law, and saying that an employer shall not be able to say, "If you do not start at 7 o'clock, you shall not start till eight"?—That I could not say. It is for the Committee, which appears to be capable of drafting anything, to say how they are going to do it. But it appears to me you have to differentiate between shutting out a girl for half a day, and for an hour where it is simply a question of disturbing the order of the factory.

5837. Do you not think it would be difficult to make a law to prevent an employer saying, "I cannot allow you to work till a certain hour"? My point is really this, that suspension is a more severe punishment than saying, "We fine you 2d. for being five minutes late"?—No.

5838. You do not think it is?—No.

5839. You do not think suspension is a more severe punishment?—No, I certainly do not. Our women are paid at the rate of perhaps 1d. or 1½d. an hour. You fine at a very much greater rate than that. The things are not comparable.

5840. You do not say that to fine and suspend as well is the custom at many factories; it is only in a few of the worst?—No.

5842. That particular firm may be, but your evidence, of course, is of the worst of firms. You have not generalised; you have particularised, and you have particularised the very worst people you could think of or lay your hands on?—No; I have put in the complaints just as they came in to us. I would not say I had taken the worst people I could lay my hands on. I have taken the lowest class of work, in factories and worshops, and at the home, amongst the lowest grades of labour. Barring that, I would say I had given you some typical instances, and some bad instances, but I should be sorry to say that other employers at the present time, except one or two whom the Chairman asked me about, do not deal with this system, do not have fines and deductions, because, so far as I can make out, nearly all firms have fines and deductions.

5843. But you have only complaints of a very few, and naturally they are the bad ones?—But I can give you lots more. I gave you as many as I thought you could stand.

5844. Do you admit that those people who fine or suspend unjustly—when I say unjustly, I mean where the ratio of fines to the wages received is so great—are only a few amongst the bulk of employers?—What I do admit is this, that I have given you some of the worst cases because I wanted you to see, so long as you have fines and deductions at all, the sort of things which will happen. So I have given you some of the worst cases as well as some of the ordinary ones in order to show that. You, as a good employer, employing a very different kind of people, perhaps cannot understand factories managed on the principle on which they shut out and fine for unpunctuality.

5845. What I understand is that fines and suspensions in your opinion can be made use of, and are made use of, by employers in a way which ought to be put a stop to, but fines and deductions are not used unjustly by the vast number of employers?—Fines and deductions are essentially unjust.

5846. But you have no complaints from people who work in good employment?—Excuse me. When I came here I ruled out the better class of factories because I thought that Mr. Shackleton would speak about them.

To a large extent they deal with fines and deductions by their trade organisation. He has often said to me, "Our union would not tolerate this for a moment" when I told him of a particularly bad case. I ruled them out, not because they do not exist even in the cotton trade, but simply because I thought the Chairman wished me to give evidence with regard to the poor girls.

5847. You are instancing cases in which fines and deductions are harsh ?—I could not instance a case where they did not act harshly, in my view.

5848. Of course you are against all fines and deductions ?—Yes.

5849. The way I put it is this, that suspension is generally rather a more severe punishment than fines. Fines are small, but dismissal, which is an ultimate punishment, is a more severe punishment still ?—Yes.

5850. Would you be an advocate for an employer, instead of fining a person who was late a small sum, saying that the girl must be dismissed ?—Yes. In the first instance, it should be an understood rule of the factory that if a person continued to be unpunctual he or she must go, and there should be no other rule at all. My experience and my impression is that you would find that would lead to greater punctuality, and also it would prevent this dreadful cutting down of wages which are already too low.

5851. Do you not think that your argument is the same as to say that there must be no punishment at all for crime or for anything else ? Why do we have any fine or punishment in any walk of life if it is not a deterrent ?—What more can you want than dismissal ?

5852. In that case, you go at once to the ultimate punishment. I take it you are hardly in favour of a very heavy punishment for a very small offence. I am speaking now of other things than factory management because I wish to get at your logical conclusion. The logical conclusion is that you must have the most severe punishment for the smallest offence ?—You can devise some other punishment if you can think of it. All I say is, do not touch the wages. That is the one thing which should not be touched. As far as dismissal goes, you must remember that they have got it already, and that where there is a great deal of labour it is very largely used. You have girls taken on and taken off and put on to work again at a moment's notice. Look at the girls standing in rows outside P. 3. You get that, and you get it in addition to fines and deductions. All I say is, take those away and fall back upon what the good employers are trying to do. The factory inspectors will tell you that fines and deductions have been abandoned with success in a good many cases. For instance there is E. 10; and one knows of Q. 3, a firm which one is not anxious to praise in many particulars, but who have found that they do better without fines. Then there is Cadbury's where it is known that no girl will stay who is not going to be punctual and good.

5853. You advocate no punishment except the maximum punishment ?—If you like to put it in that way.

5854. Is not that the proper way of putting it ? Is not that the logical outcome of your evidence, that there must be no punishment for any breach of discipline except maximum punishment ?—If you like to call it the maximum punishment. To my mind it is not. What happens now is that girls are dismissed in a great many factories and workshops of this kind for the most paltry reasons.

5855. I quite understand that ?—I will tell you what will happen. If it is worth your while to keep a girl on you keep her on. What happens now is this: one does not dismiss a girl if one thinks she is worth keeping; she has fines and deductions from her wages because she is too good to lose. I say if she is too good to lose do not fine her.

5856. If a girl is a valuable servant there would be no punishment that one could use except dismissal, and if she came late every morning in the week there would be no means of checking her as long as one wanted to keep her in his employ ?—I think it would be more in the girl's interest. Of course it might be more in the employer's interest also.

5857. I take it we are not altogether dealing with one interest, simply; we want to arrive at what is just ?—That is a very great object to set before ourselves, certainly.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

22 Nov. 1906.

5858. Your theory of management, I take it, is to abolish all fines, abolish all suspensions, have no punishment except dismissal, and that any business can be managed by capacity without any punishment being held over the employees ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

5859. That states your evidence very fairly, I think ?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

5860. Have you ever thought how difficult it is to get these capable people ?—I think, like everything else, supply always comes when there is a demand. At present, nobody cares.

5861. Is that your experience of life, that you do come across many capable people who would always be able to exact obedience without punishment ?—My experience of life is this, that if you want a certain class of engine or a certain class of worker you get it by the demand and you get it by training. I do not say that if you were to abolish fines and deductions you would be able to get all the foremen you want at a moment's notice, but I say that if it is essential for employers to work their business without fines and deductions, they will loyally meet the requirements of the law and will gradually get the kind of people they want.

5862. Do you not think it is difficult for an employer to get these capable people, and to judge who is the capable man when several people present themselves for situations as foremen ?—It seems to me that the man who can run any big industry or any big concern successfully, is the man who can choose the right men and women. Surely it ought not to present itself to you as a difficulty which is likely to occur in good firms.

5864. I will not pursue that further. You suggested that certain firms deduct money for a charitable object, and do not send all that money to the object for which the money is deducted; is that what I understood ?—Yes.

5866. Do you not think it would be rather a hardship to charitable institutions all over the country if you were to prohibit the employers asking their workpeople to subscribe so much a week, towards some charitable object, and, by the employees' consent, taking it out of their wages every week ?—The workers do not consent. The employer pretends they do. He says that it is done voluntarily. It used to be compulsory but now, after the factory inspectors' intervention, it is still done, and it is said it is done voluntarily. I put in a case like that. That simply means that the girl thinks to herself, "Of course the boss wants me to pay this, and if I do not pay it, it will mean he will find somebody else to do my work," so she pays it. But nobody wants to pay to the hospital.

5867. You do not suggest that that sort of thing goes on generally, or that it goes on even among the small minority of the firms of this country, that they actually coerce their employees to subscribe to the hospitals ?—Wherever there are deductions for a hospital, it is coercion.

Miss G. Tuckwell.

22 Nov. 1906.

In cases where it is said it is done voluntarily, I say it is not done voluntarily. Except in the case of an employer who really has made it understood by his workpeople that he means that he leaves the question of whether they will subscribe to their own decision—that type of employer being very rare—the workpeople go on paying the subscription because they think the employer wants it. By the sheets which I have put in evidence you will see that a girl ought to spend 15s. a week, and out of that there is nothing to spare for a hospital ; and I am talking of girls whose wages average 8s. 10d.

5868. I am not much concerned with regard to the point whether they ought or ought not to subscribe, but what I want to know is your opinion on this ; supposing an employer has a meeting in the works and the employees generally consent to subscribe so much a week to the hospital, and after that one of them, or a number of them, went to the cashier and said they could not afford to subscribe, do you suggest there are many employers who would say that if they did not like to subscribe to the hospital they would cease to be in his employ ?—No, I do not suggest that. What I suggest is this, that the workers would not refuse to subscribe because they would say to themselves that the employer or the manager wished them to subscribe ; they would think, "If we do not do so, for some reason or other he will not want us as much as he did." You do not know the class of people I am talking about.

5869. That is rather the point I want to get at. You are talking of an extremely low class of employer, and you are suggesting that the law should be made for the worst employers, and ignore the better ones ?—No. It seems libellous to keep on dragging in his name, but I am talking of Z.2., the virtuous man.

5870. He may be a hypocrite, I know nothing about him ; but after all he is only one ?—My point is this. I am talking about a class of employer who employs girl labour, women labour. That is what I came to give evidence upon. What I am saying applies, I think, very generally to the whole. These dangers and these difficulties which I have been putting before you arise whenever you get this low paid women labour.

5871. With regard to always prosecuting, and never telling an employer that he is doing wrong ?—I did not say that.

5872. I rather fancied you suggested that ?—No, not for a moment.

5873. I rather thought you suggested that that should be the course adopted ?—No ; what I said was that where we had, as I thought we had, one or two cases (which were in the mind of Mr. Delevingne) which could be brought as test cases, I was very anxious that the Home Office should take action. The Home Office's usual plan of warning in the first instance, and not taking the step of prosecuting until that warning has been neglected, commends itself to me, and, I should think, commends itself to everybody. What I was speaking of there was test cases.

5874. When the Home Office thinks that the case in point is a test case, even if the employer is breaking the law unknowingly you think he should not be told that he is breaking the law and asked to improve his method and come within the regulation of the law, but should be prosecuted immediately ?—I am afraid you do not understand. What has happened has been this. The directions of the Truck Act as well as of the Factory Act have been sent in abstract to the employer and he has been fully informed as to what the law is, and what he has to do. I am not proposing for a moment that he should be taken unawares and suddenly prosecuted. Of course he knows what he ought to do.

5875. It rather seemed to me that your evidence in regard to the management of a place was that there should be no fines or deductions, and that that was rather antagonistic to your evidence with regard to prosecuting an employer immediately without any warning or anything else if it were for the public good ?—If I were to feel, as you seem to feel, that it is possible for employers to know nothing about the law, instead of having (as they do) a deluge of papers from the Home Office, I should think it unfair, but I do not think they can possibly avoid knowing what the law is.

5876. Sometimes a deluge of papers are read rather less than if they were fewer in number.

By the Chairman.

5877. You used an expression with regard to the Home Office burking prosecution. I gather from your evidence that the Home Office, like yourself, is, in your opinion, conscious that there are great difficulties under the existing law in securing conviction in the case of a factory for offences under the Truck Act ?—I am not in a position, being an outsider, to say what the Home Office is conscious of, but from the statements made by the late Home Secretary and by what one sees in the Chief Factory Inspector's reports, I should have thought that was the case—that they are conscious that they labour under great difficulties.

5878. That being so, it may be the case that they refrain from prosecution, not because they do not think that there might be a deterrent effect if it were successful, but because in the present state of the law, they think that they might not be successful at all, owing to the defects of the existing statutory provisions ?—That has been my impression certainly—that was the reason why they warned.

5879. When you used language of that kind as to burking a prosecution, what you really meant was that they do not in fact prosecute. You do not suggest that the public Department is consciously failing to put into operation what in its opinion would be effective ?—It would be quite impossible for me to suggest anything which in any way reflected upon the Factory Department of the Home Office ; I have the greatest respect for it.

5880. In consequence of some questions which have been put to you in cross-examination upon this matter, may I put this to you. You explained to us in the early portion of your evidence that you represented a certain type of worker ?—Yes.

5881. It has been no part of your evidence to refer to the condition of other classes of workers except those whose condition you personally know ? I mean, you are not giving us the condition of labour in Great Britain as a whole ?—I have refrained from dealing with any class except this, because I did not know that anybody else was going to put it before you. I should like to say that I think Mr. Shackleton will bear me out in saying that as far as women are concerned, highly skilled women would be exactly in the same position if it were not for their trade organisation. Miss Squire has said that in a good many cases, in spite of their trade organisation, there are heavy fines and deductions. They are able to deal with it by their own voluntary methods, but that does not seem to me to touch the question.

5882. You have given evidence with regard to that class of women worker with which you are particularly acquainted. Do you happen to be aware of any association of women workers in the kingdom which favours the continuance of fines ?—Barring the Freedom of Labour Defence I know of no organisation which would do so. I wish it to be understood that I have concentrated upon this class because I felt that others were going to deal with other types, and not because I could not have brought you overwhelming evidence, with a little trouble, to show that others also wanted the abolition of fines and deductions, and that it was very necessary for them.

Mr. MOSES SCLAIRE, was called ; and Examined.

Mr. M. Sclaire.

22 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

5883. Will you tell us the society you represent ?—The society I represent is the Amalgamated Jewish Tailors, Machinists, and Pressers Trade Union, Leeds.

5884. Is that confined to Jews ?—There is no rule preventing a Gentile from becoming a member of our society ; in fact they are welcome. There are a few.

5885. Are you yourself a Jew ?—Yes.

5886. Will you tell me the number of the membership of your society ?—At the present time it has something about 1,100.

5887. And where are they located ?—In Leeds. It is a local society.

5888. What is the line of business of these men ?—The majority of the members are working in the wholesale clothing industry—about 75 per cent. About 25 per cent. are working in what we term the bespoke trade.

5889. Do these operatives work in workshops or factories, or in their own homes ?—Our members always work for employers. As soon as one of our members becomes even a small employer, he usually drops out of the union.

5890. Do they do their work in factories belonging to the employers, or do they take the work home and do it there ?—It will be necessary for me to explain. There is what we term a master tailor, who is a sub-contractor of the manufacturer. Very often the work is done inside the factory, but in the busy seasons the work is done by our members, I understand more cheaply. The master tailor takes a workshop paying about 5s. to £1 a week for it, and our members are employed in those workshops. There are cases where a worker wishes to become a master tailor; he is occupying a house for which he pays 5s. or 6s., and he takes a house say for 8s. a week; instead of having two bedrooms he has four, one or two of which he employs as a workshop. Those master tailors are not our members, but our members work for them.

5891. In those manufactories to which you have referred is there a system of fines and deductions ?—The system of broken time, or discipline as you would term it, is unknown yet. If a man or girl is late, say five minutes, it depends on the temper of the master tailor; he either shuts the door in their face and keeps them out an hour, or sometimes he gives them a warning and keeps them on.

5892. Are they time workers or piece workers ?—Where the greatest evil comes in is here, that in the same workshop we have time workers and piece workers. The piece worker being always anxious to do as much as he can comes in a little earlier; in fact, instead of coming in at the usual time, eight o'clock, he will come in at six in the busy season. The piece worker, being anxious to do as much work as he can, will work five or ten minutes later, after the time for stopping for meals, and he works overtime, besides coming in sooner. The time worker is expected to do the same; the master looks at him sideways if he does not. No proper time is observed in such workshops.

5893. Is the piece worker paid so much for the garment on which he is engaged ?—No; in the wholesale clothing trade work is divided and sub-divided again. We have in the shop a fitter who gets the work in from the warehouse, cut, and he fits the different parts to it. Then some parts go straight to the machinist, the lining goes to men specially employed in making linings; there is a one who makes sleeves, there is an under-presser and a presser and a tailor—at least we call him a baster. In a shop there might be six basters employed—those who work with a needle. They might be termed tailors. But out of six, and sometimes eight, you will only find one man who is a proper tailor. He is not employed in making a garment by himself; also one is employed in cutting the shapes.

5894. I may take it that this series of operations is largely conducted by minute division of labour ?—Yes.

5895. Speaking generally, can you tell me the average wage received by that type of worker ?—Say there are twenty employees in a workshop, one will be machinist or sleeve sewer; he sews in the sleeves with a machine. It is usually a man. If he is of average speed, he gets from 7s. to 7s. 6d. a day. The wages vary so much that it is impossible to give an average for the whole of the workers, but I must take each kind of worker by himself. The average earnings of a sleeve sewer, getting 7s. 6d. a day, are about 29s. a week during the year, providing he has a shop all the year round. He is in the shop whether they are slack or busy.

5896. It works out at 29s. a week during the time he is employed ? Yes. Those are the best workers.

5897. And that goes down ?—Yes. We have another process called piecing up. They piece up the coat. The piecer up earns on an average about 19s. per week. Then we have another process, the lining making of the coat, and sleeve making; those workers get about the same wage, from about 2s. 9d. or 3s. up to 4s. 6d. a day; their average earnings are 16s. a week.

5898. Is that the lowest type of worker ?—That is for men, but there are women employed as well.

5899. Now tell me about the women ?—There is division of labour again among the women; they do not all do the same kind of work. We find that finishers earn from 5s. up to, on rare occasions, 11s. 6d. per week. The average will be 7s. 6d. per week. We have some in the trousers department who are earning less; their average will be about 6s. 6d. per week.

5900. Are those women of the Jewish faith also ?—I might say that you find in the shops Gentile and Jewish girls together. In the majority of the shops you will find two or three English girls working.

5901. Are these wages gross wages, and are they subject to deductions ?—They are net wages, so far as I have calculated. Of course they get more, and sometimes they are subject to deductions. We find, as I explained, that the work is divided, and the greatest sufferer from this is bound to be the presser, that is the one who does nothing else but pressing. We have an under-presser. He usually starts the first day. He does the pressing of the inside of the coat, not the lining, but the opening up of the seams; that is the under-presser's work.

5902. Is there any general feeling among the class of worker that you represent as to fines and deductions from wages ?—Yes. First, I wanted to explain about the pressers. They use hot irons and sometimes they singe the cloth, and that is considered a damage. If the material can be replaced they usually pay what it costs. Sometimes the employer pays half and the worker has to pay half.

5903. Of the value ?—Of the damage. Supposing a coat is spoilt, and the customer will not take it, the whole suit is sent in, although in that department only the coats are made. To give you one case, the work was done by R.3, who was a master tailor working for a firm in Leeds S.2. They made the suit, and the under-presser happened to burn the back of the coat. It was only the coats they got in that department. They were told that they could not get any more of that cloth, and consequently they sent the whole suit back to R.2, and the presser who was responsible for the under-presser was made to pay for the whole suit, 21s. He sold the suit for 5s. 6d. making a loss of 15s. 6d.

5904. Is that a case actually within your knowledge ?—Yes.

5905. That was a deduction for damaged goods ?—Yes.

5906. Was there a rule to that effect ?—I might say that where the greatest difficulty comes in when I have had to deal with employers or master tailors is that there are no rules; in fact very few of them keep wages books, the majority of them being illiterate. Very few of them can sign their name. We find that is a great disadvantage to the workers.

5907. Are there any printed regulations up telling the workers ?—No. I have been in a good many workshops and have not seen them.

5908. Who fixes the amount of these deductions or what is to be done ?—If the cloth can be got, of course the bill is sent in from the warehouse, but otherwise he fixes whatever he thinks proper.

5909. That is one set of deductions for damaged goods. Are there any other deductions ? Are there any deductions in your experience made for power ?—Yes.

5910. What kind of deductions are made for that ?—I find there is a tendency now amongst the master tailors to introduce power for driving the machines. There are four shops to my knowledge in Leeds which have introduced power; I think in two cases it is electricity.

5911. By the machines you mean sewing machines ?—Yes. In two cases gas engines are the motive power. We find deductions are made. In one shop, T. 3, 4d. in the £ is deducted for power. If a girl or a man earns £1, 4d. is deducted. There is another shop, U. 3. I did not get exactly the system of how the deductions are made, but as far as I can gather it is 1s. in the £ for power.

5912. Are there any deductions for lighting ?—No.

Mr. M. Sclaire.

22 Nov. 1906.

5913. Or cleaning?—No. There is another firm, V. 3, which deducts 6d. in the £.

5914. Are there any deductions for materials supplied?—So far as the Jewish master tailors are concerned there are only one or two places where they supply cotton, and the hands have to pay for it.

5915. In all the other works that is all part of the general expense of conducting the business?—Yes, in works conducted by the master tailors. I would refer to W. 3, a master tailor. I have been complaining to the factory inspector about this master tailor not putting up a price list for piece work. When the factory inspector was there he looked up one of the books in which the work is booked and found that one of the girls, a lining maker, had had 3s. 2½d. deducted for cotton and power.

5916. Off how much?—I had not an opportunity of seeing her book, or rather I only discovered it on Wednesday and I had not time to see her. But they are not working full weeks now. Say they are working about four days a week, or three and a half days, she could not have earned more than 15s., and off that would come the 3s. 2½d. W. 3. deducts ½d. from the shilling for power until he gets up to £1, when he takes off a full shilling.

5917. We are now on the head of deductions for material supplied?—I am told the workers can get the cotton supplied by him from outside for 2s. 9d. a dozen bobbins.

5918. And what are they charged?—Up to a fortnight ago we had a dispute with this firm and the workpeople were out for a week. He charged them 3s. 6d., but after the dispute he came down to 3s. per dozen bobbins.

5919. Then the next head is as to deductions for alterations?—Yes. This is in the bespoke trade. I will give you a type. There is X. 3 who is in the bespoke trade and works for a very reputable firm in the city, I mean a first class firm doing the best class of work in Leeds, and I understand he gets the best prices for the work. He is an out-worker. The firm employs hands inside and also gives work to this man. An overcoat was made by one of our members who works daily in X. 3's shop. The master tailor times them without telling them; he does not say he will give them twelve hours for an overcoat, but he marks it down and does not tell them. He pays that man 5s. 6d. a day, working eleven hours a day. This overcoat was made by one of our members, and, so far as I can gather, he had twelve hours for it. That would mean he got somewhere about 6s. for it. The man does everything by himself, machining and pressing included; he is a proper tailor; and this was a first class made coat. When the coat is put together and the collar put on, it is the duty of the master tailor to see whether that coat is right, especially the shape of the collar. It came out that after the coat was finished and sent to the shop, either the cutter there or the customer himself (I do not know which) noticed that one side of it was a little bit wider than the other. The coat was sent back for alteration. The man had to do it in his own time; he got no pay for it. It was altered and the coat was sent back again. The customer thought the lining was a little bit tight. The coat was sent back again and the man had to alter it and put the lining right; he had to rip it right round the bottom and sew it round again. The coat was sent back to the shop, and either the cutter or the customer—sometimes people are very particular, it was an overcoat with a fly, that is, the buttons were covered over—fancied the lining inside the fly was tight and wanted it altered. X. 3 had to take it back again, and the same man again had to rip it up and put in a new lining. At last the coat was finished. The man was deducted eleven hours for alterations. That was not during the same week, but it came back on three different occasions. I am not sure whether it was three weeks or only a fortnight, but it certainly was more than one week. The man had eleven hours deducted from his wages at 5d. per hour.

5920. The next evidence you give is as to reduction from piece work prices?—Yes; that is the greatest difficulty. As an official of the union I find a master tailor offers a certain price for the work, and usually, when it comes to the end of the week, there are so many different classes of work that he mixes up one class with another, the better class with the cheaper, and reduces the price. If a man has earned say £2 5s. this week the master tailor will think, "The workman had a good week; the prices were too good," and he tries to take off a penny here and a penny there, and sometimes it comes to 2s. or 3s.

5921. Under what pretence does he take off a penny here and a penny there?—He simply says to the worker, "You had a good week and a shilling or two will not hurt you." I have a book here from an outside firm, from which you will see how advantage is taken of the worker; 3s. 1d. per dozen is paid for the tailoring. When it comes to one garment, 3d. is paid. I find in this book that during the week the worker had four single coats and they are all paid at 3d. and there is no allowance made for the extra penny. This the workers lose. There are other cases where 2s. 7d. a dozen is paid. Fractions of that sort are always taken advantage of. It is thought the worker can afford to lose it, and he has to do so, and not the employer. They do not allow them a farthing; the advantage of the fraction is always taken the other way about.

5922. Do the members of your society get work from the clothing manufacturers such as Z. 2?—No.

5923. They only work for a middleman?—Yes.

5924. Who works for Z. 2 and who farms out the work to the members of your society?—The middleman who works for Z. 2 is not as a rule a member of our society.

5925. He has your operatives in his employment?—Yes.

5926. Has your association any particular view with regard to whether these deductions which you have narrated under these different heads should be abolished by law or not?—We would certainly be in favour of these deductions being done away with altogether if possible. We would have agreed prices, at least.

5929. Supposing the deductions for damaged goods were abolished, do you think there would be a greater amount of goods damaged than at present?—I do not think so. I do not think it is wilfully done. It is a pure accident. I should explain this. You will think it strange, but after a coat has been divided into so many different parts of production, each part is often under a sub-contractor. In the case of pressing there is a sub-contractor for that work alone, and if he works in a large shop he will employ two or three hands under him, pay them daily, while he gets paid by the piece. In such cases a man would naturally look for cheap hands. He would get in a man who has no knowledge of ironing, simply because he would work for 1s. 9d. or 2s. a day to learn the pressing. It is usually such a man who does the damage, not because he wants to do it, but simply from want of experience, want of knowledge of how to handle the iron or how to distinguish between when the iron is too hot, or just sufficiently hot to be used.

5930. Do you think, if there were no fines or deductions, but just the fear of dismissal only, that there would be greater care taken in the selection of competent workmen?—If it was possible to abolish this system of sub-contracting in the shops so that we should have one employer, there would not be so many accidents, because the employer himself would be more particular in getting proper men.

5931. Have you any opinion with regard to deduction for power? Should that in your judgment be part of the general expenses of conducting a business?—If one man is satisfied with 4d. in the £, why should another man charge 1s.? It speaks for itself that it should be abolished. V. 3 has four machines, a new kind of machine called "five-needle" machines. It has five needles in it and it is used for making linings quilted. He employs four girls daily, and the profits he makes are sufficient to cover the expense of driving power, and I do not see why he should charge his workers for the power when their wages are so low. In that particular shop the work is of a low grade and the best of hands do not earn more than 25s. on an average during the year.

5932. Do you think that the materials supplied should also be part of the general charge of the work ?—Yes, as it is only where piece work prevails that deductions for materials are made, not with day workers.

5933. I want your opinion, do you approve of it, or do you not ?—I do not approve of it simply because there is no limit to what they may charge. Then of course when a girl or man goes into a shop, as a rule there is no price list put up as to what they are going to get for their work, but the employer tells them they will get 1s. 6d. or 1s. 9d. for a dozen linings. Naturally, the worker will think it is all right; he calculates he will make so many dozens a week and will get so much. At the end of the week he finds so much is deducted for power. Some of our members think that if that were abolished the employer would reduce the prices. Personally, I do not think they would, because the prices are so low that really it is hardly possible. It would simply prevent unscrupulous masters from making deductions to make the wages of the employees smaller when they are already so small.

5934. On the whole I gather your opinion is against the system of deductions ?—Certainly.

5936. That part of the statute is a dead letter ?—So far as the Jewish workers in Leeds are concerned it is. If they were put up it would help the officials of the union greatly. The majority of our members are not able to read. If there was a dispute with an employer I should be able to make up a book for them and see they got their wages in accordance with prices promised by the master tailor.

5937. The alternative is that a contract should be in writing, signed by the workman. That is not the case with your own workmen ?—No. I do not think employers themselves are aware that it is necessary for them to do so.

5938. The next point I wish to ask you with regard to the Act of 1896 is this. You say there is no contract put up or signed by the workman, but the statute says: "The contract must specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed, the amount of the fine, or the particulars from which is is ascertained." In such a case as you have been describing, who fixes what is to be fined for and the amount of the fine ?—The employer, the master tailor. The worker is never consulted in that, nor are the officials of the union consulted in that. They simply do it themselves, as they like.

5939. And do they fix the sum which is to be taken off ?—Yes.

5940. You have no voice as to whether the amount of the fine is fair and reasonable ?—In some cases I see an honest endeavour to make them as easy as possible for the workers, but those cases are rather the exception than the rule; the rule is to get as much from the worker as they possibly can. In the particular case which I mentioned of the bespoke trade, it is known to the workers that the master tailor himself gets paid for alterations, but does not pay his hands. He charges the shop for alterations 9d. an hour, while the hands would be paid 5d. or 6d.—if paid at all.

5942. And there is a provision that the deduction or payment shall not exceed the actual or estimated damage. There is nothing of the kind ?—I explained how the workers are charged. It solely depends upon the people in the warehouse when they send in the bill. I do not think the middleman has power to fix what the value of the damage is. He has to pay what he is asked to pay. In cases where they work machines, oil is used, and if a drop of oil gets on to the coat or lining of course it is a damage, and the worker has to pay for it according to the price fixed in the warehouse.

Mr. M. Sclaire. 22 Nov. 1906.

5943. I gather from your evidence that the statute of 1896, from which I have been quoting, is now substantially a dead letter ?—That is so, so far as the outworkers are concerned.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5944. Is your evidence principally with regard to outworkers, or with regard to what you call the master tailors, the middlemen ?—What we term the outworkers are the men who work for the middlemen.

5945. In the middleman's own house or shop ?—Yes.

5946. And your evidence does not relate at all to people who take the work home to their own houses and work there ?—No.

5947. It is entirely confined to the people who work——? In workshops for the middleman.

By the Chairman.

5948. In bedrooms and places like that.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5949. Are these places under the Factory Act?—The factory inspector explained to me that they should all have the Act posted up in the workshop, The bedroom master seldom or never complies with the Factory Act. In our opinion that is the greatest difficulty we have to contend with. The bedroom master is the greatest cause of bringing down the prices paid by the Warehouse men and the wages of the workers, because they usually work in families. It may be the father of a family working with two or three children, either boys or girls, and sometimes the wife assisting. He only takes in an occasional assistant—a presser to press the work. That is generally done as overtime. The presser will work somewhere else, and he will go on Thursday or Friday night and finish the work for the bedroom employer. If a law could be passed to abolish dwelling-house work, it would be a great benefit to the workers in general. We are entirely opposed to such work.

5950. You are entirely opposed to outwork ?—No, not so long as the work is carried on in a workshop. We are agreeable to that, but we are opposed to its being done in a dwelling-house. We find outwork is the best method, but not if it is carried on in a bedroom. I might say that the warehouse man, the manufacturers, have created those bedroom masters. It is to their advantage. They always threaten a large sub-contractor who employs from fifteen to sixty hands that if he does not do the work at a cheaper price they will get a bedroom master and they will do the work even cheaper—1d. or 2d. the garment as the case may be. The warehouse man always keeps a staff of those bedroom master tailors as a threat over the larger sub-contractor. As a union, I may acknowledge that we are powerless to deal with them at all, because they can do a good deal of the work themselves, and if we strike against them the only result is that they do less.

By the Chairman.

5951. The Committee are agreed that we are not engaged in a general inquiry, but only on the subject of fines and deductions from wages so far as your evidence is concerned.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

5952. You spoke of a warehouse: you mean a warehouse or factory such as A. 3 ?—Yes.

5953. You say they threaten their employees that if they do not take a certain wage they will have the work done out by a middleman ?—No. As a rule, a place such a A. 3 or Z. 2 employ girls on the premises, but there is as certain amount of work which it seems the girls are not capable of doing at all times—they cannot turn out as much work as is required—and A. 3 or whoever it is gives out the work to master tailors. There are some who do the work direct themselves, and employ our members.

5954. With regard to fining for singeing or burning which you spoke about, the factory gives the work out to the middleman, and the middleman gives it out to the presser, who employs one or two hands, often inexperienced; they singe the cloth through lack of knowledge, perhaps. Does the presser charge the inexperienced man for doing it? Does the man who works for the presser pay it, or does the presser pay it himself?—Both the presser himself and the under presser who works for him usually suffer for it. They have to pay; not the master tailor for whom they work.

5955. You say the man who works for the presser does not pay as a rule?—The presser is held responsible. He is the sub-contractor and is responsible to the master tailor, and he is held responsible. But we find that it is divided between the two: the presser has to suffer partially for it and the under presser has to suffer partially for it; they have both to suffer.

5956. In that case the abolition of deductions for this burning would not make any difference, because these inexperienced men do it by reason of their inexperience?—Yes.

5957. And no punishment will affect them at all?—The punishment would not affect them. Sometimes even it is done by an experienced presser. But so far as we can ascertain it is never done intentionally; it is always an accident.

5958. The employer employs a presser who employs two or three inexperienced men; you would not suggest that the employer should not be paid by the presser for the damage done by the inexperienced man, would you? You would not suggest that it is any hardship that the employer insists upon the presser paying for the damage done by the inexperienced man?—I suggest it is a hardship, because if he was willing to pay proper wages and get proper men he would not have to put that hardship upon those who are inexperienced. The master tailor gets the benefit of that already; the men are cheap; he does not pay them proper wages; but the poorer men have to pay for the damage caused by employing cheaper hands. Accidents are rare—there may be one a month or one in two months—while the advantage he gets from employing the cheap hands is daily.

5959. Having got cheaper hands you think he ought to bear the loss caused by employing those cheaper hands?—Yes.

5960. And you think that insisting upon this deduction is getting it both ways; he is getting cheap labour and is getting paid for the damage done by that cheap labour?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

5961. I was going to ask you upon the point which Sir Frederick has asked you about. You seem to think that the presser is paid already in a sense, inasmuch as he employs inexperienced men at very low wages: is that it?—No, I did not suggest that. What I suggested was that the master tailor is already paid, because if he allows a man to sub-contract and allows him to employ his own hands, it is simply because he gets it done at a cheaper rate, and the master tailor is, in a sense, recompensed by having cheaper hands. Then again, with regard to the master tailor, it depends how he is paid by the warehouse. In my opinion the people who give out the work should be held responsible for the damage.

5962. I wish to find out exactly upon whom that burden really falls. You spoke of a case where a whole suit of clothes was returned?—Yes.

5963. 21s. was deducted and the suit was sold ultimately for 5s. 6d.?—Yes.

5964. Who got the 5s. 6d.? The presser?—Yes.

5965. Was it the presser who sustained the loss of 15s. 6d.?—In this case both the presser and under presser were members of the union and they came before our committee. The loss being 15s. 6d. we decided, I think, that the presser should pay 10s. and that the balance shold be paid by the under presser.

5966. Putting out of sight for the moment the fact that they were members of the union, and assuming they were not, upon whom would that loss have fallen? Would it have fallen upon the presser himself? Would the presser himself have had to bear the loss?—So far as my experience goes it would have been divided, perhaps equally, between the presser and under presser. The presser has the power to keep back part of the wages, because he pays the under presser.

5967. That is the point I wanted to find out. He really can please himself as to whether he increases or lowers the wages of the men working under him?—Yes. The wages are not paid direct by one master, which is a thing we desire very much, but it is paid to different sub-contractors. There are sometimes as many as four to one place. Then the sub-contractor pays again to the men working under him, and he has the power to pay them in the way he likes.

5968. Inasmuch as he has already got these men working for him at very low wages, the chances are the loss would have fallen upon him, because I put it to you he could have reduced their wages very little more?—Very little more reduction could be made.

5969. And therefore whatever loss would have to be sustained would ultimately fall upon the presser: is that it?—Yes. But I do not want you to understand that the presser is a person who can afford to lose it. Although he is a sub-contractor he cannot afford it.

5970. I am not pressing that point. I only wanted to find out upon whom that loss would ultimately fall. You have given the Committee to understand that the presser generally employs people at very low wages?—Yes.

5971. Who can really bear no further reduction?—That is so.

5972. And therefore if any loss is sustained, inasmuch as the master tailor will not bear it, it must fall upon that middleman?—Yes, upon the sub-contractor.

5973. The presser?—Yes. Ultimately a good share of it falls on the lowest paid men. I may say in all cases where there are losses, they are paid by deductions from the wages of the inexperienced men, the lower grade men, the men who cannot pay.

5974. I am trying to carry it to that point?—We find that the poor and inexperienced machinists, girls who are working at from 2s. 6d. a day and are doing a man's work, have to suffer for the deductions for spoilt goods.

5975. The chances are these inexperienced men are working for very low wages because of their inexperience?—Yes.

5976. And to enable them to acquire experience?—Yes.

5977. And gradually, over a course of time, they acquire an experience which they would not otherwise obtain?—Yes.

5978. Is it your opinion that that lowers the general standard of wages—that that system brings down the general wage of the workers?—That is so.

5979. You told the Chairman that no list was fixed in these shops?—That is so.

5980. Does that apply to those shops which are real workshops?—Yes; it applies to the shops generally.

5981. There is no list fixed?—There is no list fixed.

5982. In no single case?—There are exceptions. I been in warehouses where a lot of our members are working and there is a price list there on the table, but otherwise amongst the Jewish middlemen there is no price fixed in any of them, not to my knowledge.

5983. I wish to point out to you that the list to which I am referring is the list of offences which may happen in a workshop and for which fines or deductions of a particular amount may be made—not special lists of wages, but a list of fines for particular offences which may be committed?—With the exception of a notice both in English and Yiddish, that a week's notice is to be given on either side, I find no regulations in the workshops. As I mentioned before, even the Truck Acts are avoided by the bedroom masters; you do not find that they have a copy of the Truck Acts put up.

5984. Just at the moment I am speaking of the workshops. Is it left entirely to the caprice of officials? Are you ever called in yourself to regulate these fines?—No.

5985. I mean to regulate the fine with the employer ?—No; no one would ask us.

5986. With regard to the power for driving machines, you told us that there were four or five charges—4d. in the £., 10d. in the £. and 1s. in the £.; is this known to the people upon their appointment, when they are taken into the service of the master tailor ?—Generally it is not known; they only find out at the end of the week, after having worked a week. People usually get work in places in the busy season and if a girl earns £1 and 1s. is deducted, she does not take notice the first week; she thinks it is all right. But as the work goes down and she only earns 10s. 6d., and then 6d. is taken off, that is the time they begin to grumble and complain about it.

5987. That is to say when they find that the lessened payment is continuous, is continued week after week then they feel the hardship ?—Yes. In the particular case I referred to, the factory inspector asked whether there was a notice put up about deductions for power or cotton, and as far as I was told, he could not find it in any of the workshops.

5988. It is not definitely known at the time of appointment either that the power for driving machines or the materials supplied will be charged for and deducted from their wages ?—No, it is not generally known.

By Mr. Delevingne:

5989. With regard to Mr. Walsh's last question, you say deductions for power and materials are not usually known beforehand to the worker ?—They are not known

5990. You are aware of the order made by the Home Office requiring particulars to be given in the wholesale tailoring trade to all workers, both in-workers and out-workers ?—Do you mean, am I personally aware of it ?

5991. Do you know the Section in the Factory Act called the Particulars Section ?—No.

5992. You do not know that in the wholesale tailoring trade an employer who gives out work to be done by the piece is required to furnish to the worker particulars of the work to be done and particulars of the wages ?—No.

5993. Just one word about the middleman; is he of a superior grade to the workers he employs, or is he very much of the same class and same financial position ?—Do you mean only financially.

5994. Financially and socially is he very much above the workers he employs ?—I should say financially he is a good deal above the employee, but otherwise they are of the same class of people; a worker of to-day may become a master tailor to-morrow.

5995. If the middleman is prohibited from making deductions for damage from the workers he employs, will he be able to throw that charge back on the wholesale house for which he works, or will he have to pay it himself to the wholesale house ?—In a good many cases, so far as I know, he will be able to get that from the wholesale house; he will not have to suffer it himself.

5996. The wholesale house would bear the loss ?—The wholesale house would bear the loss if the middleman was prohibited from making deductions for damages from his workers, because it is very small to them, whereas to the worker it means a good deal. When it comes off wages of 10s. or 12s. a week, or even £1, then 2s. or 3s. is a big loss.

5997. Do you see any reason for making it impossible for the wholesale house to make deductions from the middleman ? The middleman contracts to do the work, and if he sends it back damaged, would you prohibit the wholesale house from making any deduction for damage from what they pay him ?—Yes, certainly, and I will give you my reason. My reason is that it tends to reduce the wages. I will mention the firm of Z. 2. The middleman has to buy the silk for button holes from the firm at a much higher price than that for which it can be bought outside. On one occasion a middleman bought silk somewhere else, of course at a cheaper price and button-holed some coats. The firm found this out, recognising it was not their silk. The coats were sent back, the holes had to be ripped out and new ones put in with their silk, with no recompense whatever for that. The middleman being compelled to do it, he naturally cannot pay anything like a decent wage to any worker who works for him.

5998. The middleman was at fault in that case, was he not ?—It was a fault, but it was rather an excusable one. Say he was making at 1s. 9d. per jacket, or as low as 1s. 2d., he could not make very much profit on it, and he tried to make a few pence more by buying cheaper silk. When it was found out that he got the silk outside he had to rip out the holes and put in new ones with silk bought from the firm. Certainly if there were no deductions made from the middleman, the deductions from the workers would be less. In fact, we think that by organisation we would be able to command a better wage for the workers, because the work is so cheaply done now that if an attempt was made to make the price lower it would be absolutely impossible for any person engaged on ordinary work—I do not say a good worker, but for the majority—to make a living. I find the average earnings of our members, taking all with very few exceptions, is about 15s. on the average throughout the year, and there is not room for any deductions or fines for materials or for anything. The exceptions to which I referred would certainly not be 25 per cent.—there would be, say, about 15 per cent., who earn more.

5999. In that case of the overcoat which was sent back four times for alterations, I gathered from what you said that those alterations were not due to any fault of the man who made the coat, but rather to the caprice, possibly, of the customer ?—It might be both. I would not say it was not the fault of the worker, the man who made the coat. But it was the duty of the middleman, who does not have anything else to do, to look after the work he gets and see that it is right, and if he had looked after that properly perhaps it would not have happened. But the burden fell on the worker entirely in that case. We very often find that in such cases the middleman gets paid for alterations by the warehouse, but does not pay the worker. We have positive proof of that. X. 3 gave notice to one of our members that his services would not be required. I was instructed to see X. 3 to get him to keep on our member. He then got to know the union I represent was taking up the interests of the workers and he stopped the majority of the fines. That proves that it is possible to do away with those fines. And it is not simply a question of fines, but of men being made to work for nothing.

By the Chairman.

6000. Have you ever worked in Glasgow ?—Yes; I come from Glasgow, but I have been connected with this union for the last nine months.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

Tuesday, 27th November, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

WILLIAM HENRY DREW, of Bradford, was called; and Examined.

Mr. W. H. Drew
27 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6001. What is your official position in your trade?—I hold three or four different positions in the Trade Union world. I am the Secretary of the Bradford Trades Council, President of the Weavers' and Textile Workers' Association, and a Trustee of the Wool-combers' Association.

6002. All in Bradford?—Yes.

6003. What is the membership of the largest association with which you are connected?— The membership of the unions in the Bradford Trades Council is about 26,000.

6004. In what class of business are members employed?—In various trades, ranging from engineering to spinning. The Trades Council is composed of about eighty societies, representing the entire trade of the city. The Council comprises, for instance, the whole of the engineering trades, the building trades, and the textile trades. The latter predominate.

6005. During the course of your official work in connection with these various unions and societies, have you had to consider the question of fines and deductions from wages?—I scarcely understand what you mean by "consider." My experience has brought me much into contact with fines and deductions of all kinds from the spinner up to the shop assistant.

6006. What is the business to which you were yourself trained?—Weaving.

6007. I now wish to ask you what is your experience with regard to fines and deductions?—I have been on the Executive of the Bradford Trades Council since 1888 and its official for about ten years. The Trades Council undertakes legal work and various work of a social character for the whole of the trades concerned. Therefore, without egotism I might say my experience has been such that I might almost speak for the whole of the trades of the city. We have got now what is almost a poor man's lawyer connected with the Trades Council. We have had considerable experience in the matter of fines.

6008. Before you go into details, let me ask you this, do you remember the passing of the Statute of 1896?—I do, quite well.

6009. Have you any contrast in your mind between the period before the passing of that Act and the subsequent period. I mean do you think that the Act has made a difference?—I think the Act of 1896 was a gross mistake. It legalised fines, and they are now easier to impose than was the case anterior to that Act.

6010. Will you explain that in more detail?—In the old days, although there was no schedule published, an employer was very chary of inflicting fines, because of the ease with which bother could be made about it, but now the employer hides himself behind a schedule—that is what I mean.

6011. To take an instance, doubtless you know of cases where there are long schedules of possible deductions and fines?—I do.

6012–13. Such schedules, we understand, are issued mostly by shops?—I am not prepared to say it is mostly by shops. For instance the case of certain mills near Bradford Y 3 might be mentioned. I have no desire or intention to cast any personal reflections in quoting in such a case. At these mills the system of fines is complicated; there is an extensive schedule for every department, and there may be twenty or thirty departments.

6014. Do you know the schedules used?—Yes.

6015. Were there not similar schedules prior to the Act of 1896?—I think not; not in my experience.

6016. You think that the Act of 1896 has, as it were, shown employers a way in which to fine as a system under cover of the law?—That is my view; indeed, I think it may be said that I foreshadowed such a result. Many of my friends differed from me, but I always thought it would work out so. Prior to 1896 we contended that it was illegal to fine; but now employers impose exactions which bear no just proportion at all to the damage done or to the discipline sought to be enforced.

6017. That is a general question to which we will return when we want your opinion as to the remedies. But we can first go into some details with regard to the existing system. In the first place, with regard to fines in relation to the worsted trade, is there a system of what you would call disciplinary fines?—Yes, there is; a system of fining which is used for the purposes of discipline.

6018. Can you give us some instances of the heads of discipline?—I assume you have no desire to go into the whole of the disciplinary fines connected with the worsted industry from the wool combing upwards.

6019. We will take the evidence in the way you think best and most useful; giving as far as necessary the details to which you alluded?—Well, take the question of time-keeping in ordinary shops—and by that I mean outside the worsted industry—the system of clock registration has grown considerably of late years; but in a large mill, except for skilled artizans of the adult class, clocks cannot be employed. Therefore the system which prevails is that if a woman or young girl comes late, yet within five minutes of the proper time, she is permitted to enter, but there is deducted from her wages either 1d. or 2d. according to the schedule set up. This bears no just proportion to the wages of the persons concerned.

6020. What class of business does that refer to?—To spinning and weaving in all its branches. Spinning departments are divided into various heads.

6021. Is that piece work?—It is day work. Spinning is day work, but weaving is piece work.

6022. What is the average wage earned by a woman?—The average wage of the half timer is 3s. 6d. per week. A woman spinner would probably average 8s. 6d.

6024. I understood you to say that many of the fines imposed are out of all just proportion to the wages?—That is so. Take the case of the half-timer fined 1d. for being five minutes late at a wage of 3s. 6d. per week. If you apply that to a woman earning 10s. per week as a three-side minder even then it is out of all proportion to the wages paid. It is at the rate of 1s. an hour and in some cases the penalty is at the rate of 2s. an hour.

6025. You don't leave out of view, do you, that a workman or workwoman coming late may necessitate a machine standing idle for a certain time ?—I grant that. We see it, and we know that it does sometimes necessitate a machine standing, but on the other hand the habitual late-comer can be best punished by being sent to find other employment. In our opinion fines for the purpose of discipline of that character are wrong because they are not really the corrective desired. An employer always has his remedy in discharging a woman or child who is late, and that alternative is to be preferred.

6026. Of course in the cases you are indicating the idea may not be only the maintenance of discipline but also to reimburse the employer for the loss which the absence of a workwoman or the standing idle of a machine would involve ?—I also grant that, but I should contend, and I think it can be borne out, that even under such considerations the amount deducted is often excessive. I don't suppose any employer in the world would argue that the profit from a spinner was 1s. per hour or in the case of a 2d. fine was 2s. an hour.

6027. But even supposing there was a certain amount of loss, your view, as I understand, would be that for both workpeople and employers, and also for the sake of the work, it would be a better system to rely upon discipline in the ordinary sense with dismissal in incorrigible cases ?—Yes, without any question. No workman or workwoman, not even a wastrel, desires to be late. They dislike the indignity of having to creep through the late gate, and that in itself is often a sufficient corrective.

6028. Doubtless you would recommend if the fines were abolished that records should be kept and good supervision exercised with regard to all these workers ?—I should have no objection to that.

6029. That would be a part of the information upon which employers could proceed if they wanted to dismiss or to warn workpeople ?—That is so.

6030. Do you think with regard to both workpeople and employers that discipline in the proper sense, apart from fines, would secure as good work?—Yes, without question.

6031. Do you know any works where fines have been abolished ?—There are several places where there are no fines.

6032. With what result ?—With the best of results.

6033. Such as ?—Regular attendance, and much more content all about the place.

6034. Can you give us any instances of that ?—Yes, Y. 10.

6035. What business is that ?—He is one of the largest spinners in Bradford, and there is the firm of Z. 10. and the firm of A. 11.

6036. What are they ?—Spinners.

6037. You have given us evidence with regard to disciplinary fines. Now are there any fines for damages on account of spoilt goods ?—Whilst upon that point may I say that only last week I learned of a case in two branches of the Woolcombers' Syndicate where a system of fining, and an excessive system, is being applied to men, for more than 33 per cent. is taken off the wages of the men for being late, and in these instances no loss occurs to the employers because the workers who are on the premises share the work and the machine is kept running. I am told with regard to the two places I have in my mind that if a man comes late he is locked out. He may go in at breakfast time, but he has lost two hours for which three hours are charged, although meantime the machine has been kept running by the other workers inside, so that there is a fine which amounts to 33 per cent. with no loss to the employer. I only discovered that case about a week since, but I am told that the practice is growing.

6038. Do you know whether that is done under the provision as to posting up notices ?—No. I am told that there is no schedule at all in these instances. Perhaps I ought to add in defence of the local factory inspector that these cases had not been reported to him as soon as was possible and no doubt he will look into the matter; but I am told that there is no schedule of fines published. I may also say that one of the greatest difficulties we have is in recovering from the employers receipts for deductions made. I know that to refuse them is a breach of the law, but the fact remains that these deductions are made and no receipts given.

Mr. W. H. Drew.

27 Nov. 1906.

6039. Is there any other point or case you wish to mention, dealing with the matter in your own way ?—Quite recently in the case of a syndicate firm fines have been inflicted on warp dyers. I had a case reported to me in Bradford by an official of the National Society of Dyers and Finishers, commonly known as the Warp Dyers' Association, and although the case occurred in Lancashire, yet it has reference to the trade which is also carried on in Bradford. The case is that of a man who was fined the whole cost of a warp, namely about £3, because of an accident which no one in the world could have foreseen. The warp broke entirely in two, it became matted, but the place where the men work is so filled with steam that it is almost impossible to see what is going on. All at once the machine stopped and it was found that the warp had broken and the workman had to pay its value at so much per week.

6040. How much was the amount ?—I think about £3.

6041. Can you give the name of that firm ?—Yes, I believe so.

6042. Have you any doubt of the authenticity of the case ?—None whatever. The firm is in Pendleton (Z 3). I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the information given me was bona fide. I have not the name of the firm at hand this moment, but I will supply it if necessary.

6043. We shall be glad if you will be kind enough to supply it, and now you can go on to any other point ?—I don't know that I can say much more upon that matter; but there is one point I would like to raise. Here I am prepared to give the name of the firm although it is exceedingly difficult to prove one's statements. There is the gravest possible suspicion that in the case of a firm (A 4) who employ a number of children taken direct from the workhouse; the wages of these children are detained for their keep, which is a very serious deduction, and has, I think, an important bearing on the Truck Act.

6044. For their keep where ?—The firm has a matron or matrons, or should I say a mother in charge who looks after the children.

6045. On the premises ?—Not on the mill premises, but in the houses about the village, and the whole of their wages, I am told, is kept back and retained for the food and clothing of these children. That is a matter your Committee might well enquire into, but it is difficult for us to get details from the children concerned. My information, however, seems so well grounded in honesty of purpose that I feel compelled to mention the matter.

6046. Now there is one subject of deduction that I want you to give us more details about, namely, deductions for damaged goods. You have told us of the case of a broken warp. Can you give us any other cases of deductions under the head of loss and damage ?—Endless cases in their application to weaving.

6047. You might give us some instances of the kind of deduction ?—I have in my mind a case at Keighley where a weaver working on short time was fined 4s. 6d.

6048. Out of a wage of ?—The wages earned that week were 3s. 6d. The extra shilling was taken from the second week's wages.

6049. What was the fine for ?—What is termed "broken picks." She was fined 6d. per pick; the piece contained nine broken picks.

6050. Will you explain that to me ?—You know the operation of weaving. The shuttle passes through and leaves in its wake a thread of weft. In this case the weaver was made responsible for the weft breaking. Sometimes the weft, in passing through, will break in the middle. The end which is hanging on to the shuttle catches as the warp closes, and then it keeps on pulling. There may be a place left where the weft has not filled up; that is called a broken pick.

6051. There were nine instances at 6d. each ?—That is so. The price of the piece was 3s. 6d. to her. She had 3s. 6d. for weaving it, so that she was really fined 1s. in excess of the wages she received for her piece wage.

6052. Have you any instances of fine in the way of damage ?—A weaver is made responsible for every defect, for bad weft, for bad warp, for bad overlooking and for bad tools, considering pickers, picking sticks and picking strap as tools.

6053. Suppose fines were abolished or made impossible, do you think the tendency would be, not only to a better supervision over the trade, but to better raw material with which to work?—I scarcely catch the drift of your question.

6054. The drift of my question is this. Some of your instances which you have given have been with regard to the breakage of raw material, the weft for instance?—In weaving that is generally the case; in fact, wholly the case.

6055. Now follow my question. If fines in respect of occurrences like that were abolished, do you think the tendency would be not only towards greater supervision of the workers themselves, but towards a better raw material being supplied to them to avoid such occurrences?—I am afraid it would have no effect on the supply of material; that it would bring more excellent supervision we have no doubt, none whatever.

6056. In the cases which you have given, such as the breaking of the weft, is that necessarily due to carelessness, or is it possibly unavoidable?—The breaking of weft and warp is in the main the result of bad material. The weft is too softly spun; the warp has perhaps not taken colour well, and has been re-dyed, and the result is that the chemicals, acting upon the cotton and the worsted, have made it rotten.

6057. Have you any other instances of damages being extracted by way of fine or deduction?—A weaver is fined for broken ends, or ends down. I am bound to say that weavers are no more angelic than anybody else, and sometimes are careless, and probably could catch their ends before they are woven down so far, but even when that takes place the sum exacted bears no due proportion to the wages paid. For instance, I have known girls to be fined a shilling for an end which has been woven down a foot; on the other hand, I have known them fined 2d. for the same thing. Neither of the fines bears any proportion to the wages paid, because a burler would soon sew in a foot of end, and a burler's wage at best is not above 12s. a week.

6058. In all those cases have the precautions prescribed by the Act of 1896 been taken with regard to the publication of the list of deductions?—In weaving, yes. Our only difficulty is the enforcement of the receipt for the money taken, and as I say, that is honoured in the breach considerably more than in the observance. But so far as weaving is concerned, where deductions are made, I know of no case where I should like to say that the schedule is not put up.

6059. So that these are not cases of individual caprice, but systematic cases according to the schedule posted up in the works?—That applies to weaving all through. There is a systematic practice, and it is rarely a matter of caprice at all.

6060. Have you any of those schedules in your possession?—No. It is utterly impossible to get at them.

6061. Why?—Well, they will not supply them to us; there is no question about that; and the weaver who is bold enough to copy one would find herself in Queer Street. We know of their existence, but as to their exact details we have absolutely no knowledge. So far as the West Riding of Yorkshire is concerned, I do not think you will find that in any case to have been supplied to any weaver officially.

6062. I understand there is another branch of evidence which you are willing to tender, namely as to the ready-made clothing trade?—Yes. My knowledge of the ready-made clothing trade, so far as men's clothing is concerned, comes from an intimate knowledge of the men in an attempt to organise the Jewish workers of the city. From Halifax to Skipton the system of out-working in connection with the Jewish clothing trade is growing, and in Bradford it is growing very rapidly. The fines which are inflicted upon men cannot be said to be very great, but the deductions that are taken from them in many instances are very heavy indeed.

6063. That is still left in the air: I would like some instances in order to make your evidence more vivid?—May I turn back to spinning for a moment, because I want here to give two instances of deductions. There has grown up within the last few years a system of compelling spinners to pay for breakages. A child breaks a bobbin—I will leave out the why and the wherefore; sometimes they are silly enough to throw the bobbins at each other; I will confess that at once—and as much as 4d. has been deducted from a spinner for a single bobbin. The price of bobbins ranges from 3s. to 3s. 6d. per gross. In burling, which is mainly done on commission——

6064. What do you mean by that?—An employer finds himself overburdened with a number of pieces which require mending, and he sends them out to a fogger, a middleman, or a woman (in many instances women are commission burlers) who take on the work at so much per hundred pieces. These women compel the purchase of needles from themselves, and we have known girls pay as high as 4d. per needle for needles which could be bought at 1½d. per dozen.

6065. Since you have mentioned those instances, is it your opinion that those charges for needles and bobbins should be part of the general expenses of the business?—That is so. The supply of bobbins is a fixed charge upon any manufacturer.

6066. And in the case of the wilful destruction of bobbins or anything else, that would be a case for discipline to be visited with punishment, such as dismissal?—Yes; with every desire to be lenient, if I were an employer I should have no hesitation in discharging a girl or boy who threw a bobbin about the spinning room, the danger is so great. But in the main, that is how the bobbins find themselves on the floor. A bobbin is thrown across the room from one to the other, and if the person at whom it is thrown does not pick it up to throw it back again, it is stupidly allowed to remain there, it is broken, and the child is fined.

6067. Now we will come to the ready-made clothing trade, if you please?—Whatever fines exist in the Jewish trade—I am not speaking now from experience—depend upon the caprice of the manager. For instance, I have heard the men state that so high as a shilling has been deducted for a badly made button-hole, or a badly pressed seam, and I have heard of the same thing being done and the man let off with 2d.

6068. When you say that that is imposed by caprice, do you mean there is no schedule?—There is no schedule.

6069. Nor any precautions such as those which the Act of 1896 prescribes?—None whatever. And I am not sure whether we can enforce the publication of a schedule because they are not protected persons.

6070. You mean because they are out-workers?—They are adult men.

6071. Where do these people who have to suffer these deductions work?—I am now not speaking of men who work in the workshops connected with firms.

6072. That is the tailoring; have you any other instances?—With regard to women, the fines for bad work do occur, but not with any great degree of frequency. What we want to complain most of is of the deductions which are made. The system of a man employing say six or eight or ten girls, or three or four girls in a house, has led to this, that deductions are made weekly for gas and preparation of food all the year round, that is, food-warming, which in the main is the boiling of water. These deductions are made all the year round, 1d. per week for gas, 1d. per week for the warming of food.

6073. Are these out-workers?—No; these are girls who work in part of the ordinary cottage of the man who takes work from a firm. The back door of my house was opposite the front door of a Jewish sweater I have no hesitation in using the term. Generally, he had six girls at work. There were three rooms, one downstairs and two upstairs. The girls were deducted 1d. for gas all the year round, the gas always being used in the summer for heating pressing irons, and 1d. for food-warming, and in winter they were expected to pay 1d. towards heating the rooms, the fires in the meantime being made to serve the purpose of heating their iron. We could never understand why a girl was not made to pay for heating irons; but as a matter of fact, what takes place is, that 1d. per week is deducted for gas, and 1d. for hot water all the year round, and 1d. for fires in the winter.

6075. Then you have information about skirt and blouse making ?—Yes. Here the fines are an abomination.

6076. Are men or women employed ?—Women. Whatever damages are done, if damages they may be called, are easily rectified. The girls can spoil nothing of themselves because it is so mechanical, and if the stitching has to be pulled out and re-done, they do it in their own time. Yet the girls are fined as much as 6d. per garment for garments which they do not get 2d. each for making. But there is a more serious charge which we want to make, and I say this in all seriousness—it is the deductions which are made for illicit refreshments, that is for beer supplied to them whilst working during the day, and when e gaged on overtime. That is a statement which has been challenged, but it is as correct to say it as it is to say anything in this world. The matter has been discussed in the public Press, and I believe that everybody who has two-penny-worth of respect for the city of Bradford will acknowledge that up to the time (quite recently) that the public discussion took place, beer was supplied to women on the premises and deductions were made for it.

6077. From the wages ?—From the wages.

6078. Have you any notion of the amounts ?—It is an exceedingly difficult thing to say what amount was taken. We sent a girl to one of these places where we knew beer was supplied. Unfortunately, she was too long-tongued or too warm-hearted, I do not know which, and before she had been there many days, I am afraid she gave herself away, and although the beer was supplied in her presence we never found the amount of money that was taken for it.

6079. How do you mean "she gave herself away" ?—They knew she was there for the purpose.

6080. Of spying ?—Yes. Although the beer was supplied to the girls, this girl had nothing taken from her wages for what was supplied.

6081. You are quite sure the beer was not given gratuitously ?—Well, the character of the persons concerned would preclude that. The Christian Social Union is making inquiries into the extent of the practice, but that it exists is beyond doubt.

6082. Now with regard to these deductions for all that class of stuff, beer included, are these, in that business, made into a schedule, or is there just a charge made without any written contract ?—I think the fines for damaged goods are scheduled. Necessarily, the others are not.

6083. Now there is a branch of evidence which you want to give as to deductions other than fines. Take the ready-made clothing trade; there is a charge made for fire for heating irons, is there not ?—No. Deductions are made for gas—that is, other than fines—and for the boiling of water, and for fire during winter.

6084. And for materials supplied ?—Yes.

6085. And for gas ?—Yes. In the Jewish trade it has been reported to us that as high as 4d., per dozen is charged for machine needles.

6086. What is the price of these ?—I should say 1½d.

6087. The next is with regard to the ready-made blouse and skirt trade; there are deductions there for materials spoilt ?—That is so.

6088. And at a higher rate, sometimes ?—As I have already pointed out they are considerably in excess of the prices paid.

6089. Also for thread and needles and for the beer which you have referred to. With regard to the whole of this system, may I ask you what is your opinion, founded upon your experience of fines and deductions ?—For disciplinary purposes dismissal is the remedy. For bad work, the employer has his remedy in the Courts, just as he applies his remedy to a girl who leaves. For instance, a fortnight ago, one of our members left at the end of her contract to better her condition. She had finished her contract and on the books of her employer there was 5s. 1d. due to herself. When she asked for her 5s. 1d. the employer immediately set up a counter claim for 16s., that being, he said, the loss he had sustained based upon the wages she had earned whilst in his employ. We should probably have got her 5s. 1d., but because he had put up a notice compelling even piece workers to give a week's notice prior to leaving, he would have got his 16s. Now our contention is that if a girl wilfully damages goods the employer should recover from her as he compels us to recover from him. Otherwise it is unfair.

6090. I see your point about fines. Now with regard to deductions what does your experience point to ? Do you think these deductions should be made from wages ?—I do not.

6091. Would you leave that again to the course of proper discipline ?—I cannot for the life of me see why a person should be made to pay part of the fixed charges of an employer, and therefore it seems to me that that is a matter which so far as we are concerned is beyond dispute, and we have no remedy for it.

6092. Would you give the same answer with regard to deductions for spoilt goods ?—Yes.

6093. The result of your evidence, I gather, is that you think it is an unsound principle to permit fines, or deductions either ?—That is so.

6094. Would the class you represent favour the total abolition of these by law ?—Yes, we favour the total abolition of fines by law.

6095. And deductions ?—And deductions. If a person wilfully spoils material, so far as we are concerned as an association, I should say we should have no objection to the person concerned being taken into Court and being made to pay, leaving it of course to the Court to determine whether the damage was wilfully done or not.

6096. The next thing I want to ask you is this: in giving your evidence in favour of the abolition by law of fines and deductions, do you think you represent the prevailing opinion of the classes composing the union to which you refer ?—I am sure of it.

6097. Now with regard to the result, do you think that the result would be injurious to the particular trade concerned ?—I do not.

6098. Or do you think it would be injurious to proper discipline ?—I do not. I think it would be to the advantage of the trade inasmuch as necessity would compel more excellent supervision.

By Mrs. Tennant.

6099. I want to ask you one or two questions upon matters of detail before I reach the question of principle. You gave us several instances of fines which are now illegal, and you place them in the present; what action do you take when a fine is reported to you such as the fine of 4s. 6d. for a damaged piece upon which the wages earned amounted only to 3s. 6d. ?—What action can we take.

6100. You report that to the factory inspector ?—That is so.

6101. Are you made aware of the result of his action if it does not happen to appear in the papers ?—No.

6102. As a matter of fact, is that an occurrence which happened recently ? Has it recently been reported to the factory inspector ? I am referring to the 4s. 6d. case ?—No; that is an old standing one. I gave that as the worst in my experience.

6103. You referred to charges for needles made by commission burlers, and said they were something like 4d. or 4½d. for a needle which was worth very much less; is that a modern occurrence ?—Yes. Within the last five years. Commission burling has grown; it has grown considerably since your leaving your official work.

Mr. W. H. Drew.

6104. Do you know what action it has been possible to take on that ?—So far as we are concerned whenever it applies to our girls we generally get the matter remedied through a letter. But the girl on the other hand finds herself in the street. We generally write and say that such a thing has taken place and it is illegal, and we expect the fine to be returned. It generally is returned, but on the other hand, the girls find herself in the street.

6105. You also, I understand, take the course of referring matters to the inspector of factories ?—That is so.

6106. I suppose sometimes you see the result of his action in the Press in the form of a prosecution ?—I cannot call to mind a single case where a prosecution has taken place for deductions or fines. I tried all last week to find some evidence of prosecutions for that, and could not.

6107. Is it within your knowledge that you have received complaints either from a weaving shed or a workshop of certain fines; that you have complained to the factory inspector; and that the practice has been stopped without a prosecution ?—Oh yes, that is so. We have compelled the publication of a schedule in scores of instances, of ourselves. We have written to say, "We have no desire to make a bother, but you are fining. On a given date you took from a certain young person a given sum. That is illegal. No receipt was given. No schedule of fines is up. The law says you must do so-and-so." After this rebuke or reminder it is done. I have every reason to suppose that the factory inspector has taken the same action, and schedules have been published.

6108. But in addition to the publication of the schedule, has he secured the cessation of certain practices which you have reported to him ?—I do not see that I can speak authoriatively on that point. What is sure is this, that we have so much confidence in our local factory inspector to believe that when cases are reported to him he takes action thereon, and then it necessarily follows, it seems to us, that the thing is put legally right. Although I am not prepared to say whether fines do or do not cease, my own opinion leads me to suppose they still go on.

6109. At any rate you have had no repetition of a complaint after the first complaint has been referred to the factory inspector ?—That is so.

6110. Although the Trades Council and the different Unions in the Trades Council dislike the Act of 1896, you have tried to do your best with it ?—Yes. Much as we were opposed to it, we have tried to make it as effective as possible always, realising that a schedule was to be preferred to the capricious conduct of a taker-in or an overlooker of any character. Method is always better than chaos at any rate.

6111. You gave the Committee several instances of firms who conduct their business without the aid of fining ? —Yes.

6112. And you have told us they have good discipline. Do you know what steps they take to secure that discipline ?—I do not know that they take any other steps than to put the matter straight if it is reported to them, and if the matter is too gross the offender is sent about his business.

6113. They rely upon the excellence of their supervision ?—That is so. For instance, Y 10 would no more submit to an illegal exaction being inflcted upon any of his child workers than he would attempt to fly, that I am sure of.

6114. Have you heard any complaints from people employed in those firms as to the hardship of being dismissed rather than fined ?—I am afraid I am bound to say that dismissal is a thing which the operatives themselves shrink from. When I say that I am expressing the opinion of members of our society, I have not the slightest doubt in saying that they only accept that theory because they are told, and I believe have been educated up to believe, that it is best for them. I mean the girls, left to themselves, would submit to the fines. The difficulty, or perhaps the dislike, of finding new work makes them put up with a great many things.

6115. A dislike to what ?—To finding fresh employment.

6116. I suppose for that very reason partly you advocate dismissal rather than fining because it is a more powerful deterrent ?—Yes; in that way it acts as a most powerful deterrent. The girls' dislike to finding new work or new employment is very great indeed, and if they know they will have to go, it keeps them very much straighter than they would otherwise be.

6117. Do you know how those firms who have done without fining manage to secure efficient work and manage to deal with their damaged work ? Have you ever known a case brought into court by the employers ?—I do not know that I should like to say that I can recall a case where an employer has brought someone into court for damaged work.

6118. As far as you know, they have secured efficiency by the aid of good supervision ?—That is so. And beyond that, good supervision brings another effect; it collects to the place the very best of operatives, it brings to the mill the very best of operatives. There are no finer set of spinners in the world than at A. 11 and Y. 10, where I should say ill-treatment is absolutely unknown.

6119. You said you did not think that the abolition of fines would secure the provision of better raw material; do you think it is not possible to improve the raw material in the worsted trade ?—With the craze for cheapness, no. It is the root of many of the evils which exist in the sweating trade and which exist all the way round with regard to bad work; this insane desire for cheaper things to-morrow than to-day is at the root of the whole evil.

6120. On the other hand, if the power of recouping himself by fines were withdrawn from the employer, do you not think it would make him search for some other method of recouping himself ? Might it not pay him to improve his material if the particular power which he now has were withdrawn ?—I doubt very much whether it is possible for anything to compel an employer to give better material in the sense that you mean. I doubt whether it is possible. I mean that the unlimited competition which exists compels an employer to spin as cheaply as ever he can, to spin with the lowest possible priced stuff that he can. Even with regard to anthrax it is admitted the low priced wools contain the greatest quantity of germs, and yet the rage to get hold of this class of stuff is exceedingly great.

6121. Would you say he does not suffer much injury now when his work is damaged—that the class of work is of a low grade and therefore a high standard is not expected ?—I do not think he suffers any injury.

6122. There is no real necessity for him to recoup himself ?—No. The cloth mills up so quickly, it fills up, and where a broken pick has taken place, it is quite easy to pull out the broken portion and let the other mill up. And the same can be said of end sewing in. It is a bad practice, I admit, but it is quite common for a weaver to pull out the extra end and then scratch it up. No one detects it. Of course it weakens the cloth to the extent that the end is scarce, but it is done.

6123. You advocate the abolition of fines as a form of punishment, do you include in that the abolition of suspension ? Do you consider that to be another form of fining ?—I should prefer suspension as a preliminary—it is what we call "stooling"—and if that does not act, then of course, discharge.

6124. You would like to limit the power of the employer to one suspension, as a cautionary measure ?—No, I think that would be a matter which the employer's own experience would teach him. I do not think the law ought to step in and say that he shall or shall not suspend. I think that is a matter which will right itself.

6125. You see no difficulty in allowing the alternative. You do not anticipate, for example, any difficulty with an employer to whom you say, "You cannot fine this girl 6d. for having been late, but you can stop her working in the morning"?—I see no difficulty in an employer saying to a girl who habitually comes late, "Now go home for a week; you have played for your own pleasure or your own carelessness; now go home for mine. Go home for a week." I see no difficulty in that, and I think it would be an excellent remedy as against fining. Then of course if the carelessness goes on there is the other alternative of discharge.

6126. You have given an extreme case in naming a week. There are a great many employers to whom it might not be convenient to stop a worker for a week, but it might be convenient to stop her for the morning ?—And therefore experience would determine what he would do. That is exactly what I meant when I spoke of that. It is a matter upon which his own experience will teach him what is best. If a day would serve his purpose, he would not send her home for a week, and if a week would serve his purpose, well and good. But in some parts of the worsted trade there would be danger in that. We are hoping to prevent it, but a practice is growing up of compelling the girls who are present to do the work of the absentee. For instance, it is quite common in the wool combing sheds for two men, or two women sometimes, to do the work of the absent third. At one time, they used to be paid for doing it; they used to divide the wages between them; but now the girls have to do it for nothing. I quite see that suspension would multiply that practice, but after all I think that that would find its corrective.

6127. You are anxious of course to improve the position of the worker; do you consider the worker's position would be improved, if instead of losing 2d. for being five minutes late, she lost perhaps 6d. or more through being stopped for the whole morning ?—I think it would be a preferable way, because it would tend to put the girl into such a position of shame that she would not go through the process more than she could help. The question of suspension as against deductions is a point which we have never considered, and therefore I am giving my own opinion in that matter.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

6128. In cases of lateness in the morning you give it as your opinion that it is preferable to have a system of suspension rather than of fines ?—Personally, I should say yes—suspension in preference to discharge.

6129. You do admit that for coming in late in the morning habitually some punishment is allowable ?—I do not admit it.

6130. Is that your opinion ?—My opinion is that the remedy for carelessness is discharge, but in preference to that suspension might be tried with advantage.

6131. I am dealing now with the question of coming late in the morning ?—I am speaking of the same thing.

6132. You do not think that dismissal ought to be resorted to in all cases ?—In the case of an habitual late comer, I would unhesitatingly say that if I were an employer of labour, I would take that course, and I am speaking from experience.

6133. And that course is taken when fines and suspensions do not have the required effect ?—I should hardly say that.

6134. Are you distinctly of opinion that no sort of minor punishment for being late is required ?—I say that no system of punishment is justifiable.

6135. Do you consider that no system of minor punishment for being late in the morning is required ?—I am afraid I do not catch the true inwardness of your question.

6136. There is no inwardness. I am not trying to catch you ?—Oh no; I do not desire to insinuate that.

6137. You rather favour doing away with everything except dismissal, which you cannot interfere with ?—That is my position.

6138. Your position is that you do not want any disciplinary measures to be in existence in a factory at all. You cannot interfere with dismissal ?—I am afraid you are putting my case too strongly. Discipline must necessarily take place in a factory. Without it the place would be topsy turvey. But I say that the best discipline is dismissal, because it is the greatest punishment which can be inflicted.

6139. Is not that rather what I am trying to get at—your opinion is that no minor disciplinary measures whatever need be taken in a factory, and that dismissal should be the only punishment for any offence in a factory ?—I say that dismissal is far to be preferred.

6140. I only want to get at what you really think. You are against all fines ?—I am, and against all deductions.

6141. Therefore I want to know what measures you think a master could take ?—An habitual wrongdoer should be discharged.

6142. It comes to what I say, does it not, that you are of opinion that nothing in the shape of minor disciplinary measures should be taken ?—No.

Mr. W. H. Drew.

27 Nov. 1906.

6143. And the only resource to the employer should be dismissal ? Is not that the net result of your evidence?—Possibly that is the exact position, but I want to differentiate between those who are habitual wrongdoers and those who are not habitually such.

6144. I think you will admit that in most cases the question of coming late in the morning is at the will of the operative ?—Oh no.

6145. They can be early if they like ?—Oh no; I do not admit it. Take a child-bearing woman who has a young family. I know what I speak of from my own knowledge. My wife went to the mill when she had four children, and took three out every morning.

6146. Is not that rather an extreme case ?—Oh no, it is not by any means.

6148. Do they not in most cases have a knocker-up ?—Well, knockers-up are nearly knocked out, if I may put it in that crude way. There was a time when we used to have any amount of knocker-ups, but I am afraid they do not prevail now. People rely more upon alarm clocks now, but you get used to them. The knocker-up was the most effective method of wakening people, I am bound to say, but it was so poorly paid an occupation that they do not take it on now. I am firmly of opinion that ninety-nine per cent. of the cases of late coming arise from circumstances over which the workers have no control. Everything points to it. A girl or a man or a woman cannot afford to have their wages docked, they are so small.

6149. But has it not come within your experience that those people who live nearest the factory, and have no excuse for being late, are often the very worst ?—I do not admit it. It is against my experience.

6150. You spoke of a man being locked out in the wool combers' trade for two hours ?—Yes.

6151. That means he was suspended for two hours ?—He was locked out, and three hours were taken off his wages.

6152. I suppose that is an exceptional case, that three hours should be taken for two: have you ever known another case ?—Oh yes, it is quite common to take time and a quarter off, even in skilled occupations.

6153. This is a case of suspension—he was suspended two hours. Would you consider it a grievance for a man who habitually came late to be stopped two hours, provided nothing was taken off except the two hours ?—I should say the two hours was sufficient punishment.

6154. You do not think that would be any great hardship upon him ?—I should not like to say that of a man who has to stop out two hours from his work.

6155. That is not the point. Supposing he is habitually late, and one day the manager says, "You have been habitually late and I will stop you two hours this morning; you can come again after breakfast," would you consider that a hardship, or would you consider he ought to be dismissed instead ?—I think he ought to be dismissed.

6156. Do you not think it would be rather hard on that man and that it would be difficult for him to get another situation with the stigma against him that he could not be punctual ?—Men are made better and steadier because they suffer.

6157. Is not that rather against your theory of no punishment ?—You are speaking of isolated punishments and I am speaking of general.

6158. Is not your last remark against your theory that no punishment in a factory other than dismissal should be allowed ?—I do not think so. At any rate it is not intended to be, and I do not think it is.

Mr. W. H. Drew.

27 Nov. 1906.

6159. In this case where you say the man was locked out, how much grace was allowed? Five minutes, or three minutes?—None.

6160. He was locked out for two hours and charged three hours because he was not there exactly to time?—That is so.

6161. Can you give us the name of the factory?—B 4. It is a branch of the wool combing.

6162. You mentioned a case where they were fined the whole cost of the warp through breakage; I suppose you have never heard of anything similar to that? This was in the warp dyeing?—No; I think I said that is the only case I know of, but it is common in weaving. It is quite common for the whole piece wage to be taken from a girl. In some cases the piece is handed to the weaver with the remark: "Here it is; it is finished now; you can make the best of it."

6163. In the case of weaving, you said it is generally the fault of the bad material and not the fault of the bad work: is that your opinion?—Yes.

6164 What does the bad material consist of?—Bad weft bad warp, bad dressing. A weaver has to patch up all the faults of those who have gone before her. The dresser may have dressed the warp badly, and the weaver has to patch up all these bad faults. If a slack end comes up and runs in and she does not see it, she may go on weaving for hours.

6165. Are not these yarns inspected before they are given to the weavers? As I understand, the master weaver, the manufacturer, buys them from the spinner?—Yes, but sometimes he makes it himself.

6166. He does not take these yarns if they are wrong. Does he not inspect them when they come in from the spinner?—The warp itself is brought on to the premises of the manufacturers, and his own men dress it. It is brought in in a great hank; it may contain 8,000 ends and it is split up into single ends.

6167. The manufacturer dresses his own yarns?—Yes; he divides the warp which is in a great big coil and spreads it over sixty or seventy inches. That is the work of the dresser. If there is what is called a slack end and it runs in, sometimes the weaver does not see it. The warp dresser may find a slack end himself and cross it, and then it weaves badly all along for the weaver, and she is blamed for it.

6168. How would you suggest that we could distinguish between whether it was the fault of the bad yarn or whether it was the fault of the weaver?—It is quite easy for the employer to determine, only the unfortunate part of the business is that he determines that the weaver must make the damage good. It is quite easy for him to determine where the fault lies.

6169. Do you mean that the employer gets over the fact that it is bad yarn, which perhaps is bought cheaper, by making the weaver pay?—I am afraid that is my opinion, and come to after years of experience.

6170. You gave Y. 10, Z. 10, and A. 11 as firms which have abolished fines for being late; do they suspend?—I think not.

6171. Do you assert that these three firms which you have given have no sort of penalty for late-coming in the morning?—To my knowledge, no,

6172. To your knowledge, they have no penalty at all?—No. I might have asked the head of Z.-10 yesterday—it never occurred to me—whether they had such things as disciplinary fines for late comers. When the gates are closed a late-comer is outside and she does not get paid; she does not get in till breakfast tme.

6173. Is not that suspension?—We do not consider it suspension. What we mean by suspension is when a girl is deliberately sent home.

6174. But is not the effect the same of being locked out and kept in the street or being sent home?—I am not wishing you to conceive that I would say that an employer must open his gates at any hour of the day to let a person in. By no means. I say if six o'clock is the time stated then the girl ought to be there at six. If, perchance, she misses it, I do not think she ought to be fined because she is not there.

6175. I quite understand the position now. If a girl is late, you consider it is quite fair to shut her out till breakfast time?—Without any doubt.

6176. I should rather call that suspending her till breakfast time. It is merely a matter of terms. You spoke about bad ends in the weaving, and said that a girl ought not to be mulcted in a fine because of her bad work, because by scratching the thing up the fault could be concealed: is that it?—No.

6177. That is how I took it. I should like your explanation?—I said that in low classed goods, when finished, damages were not easy to detect, and I instanced a case where the girls themselves in order to get out of the difficulty that they would find themselves in by having an end out took out the other end. I do not justify that by any means, but I say it is done. I said that it is bound to weaken the character of the cloth.

6178. I want to know what inference you wish to draw from that, because after all it is concealing a fault? Do you draw the inference that if it is her fault she ought not to be blamed, because when the piece has gone through further processes it is not easily detected?—I do not admit that the first end down was her fault, but I do say that taking out the second is her fault, and it is her shame. I only instance that to show how difficult it would be to determine in the finished piece the defects to which I have referred.

6179. Is not the piece examined after she has done with it, before it is finished?—Yes, of course it is examined, and it is easy to see then. The piece is examined by a piece-looker in its half-finished state.

6180. Ought she to be blamed for that?—If she takes out a second end, yes, without any doubt.

6181. I wish to know what bearing the fact that it can be easily concealed has upon the matter?—I only showed how easy it is to conceal defects in low-class cloths.

6182. I quite understand, but I do not quite know the bearing that part of your evidence has, that these matters can be easily concealed?—The question under discussion was what relation these defects had to the value of the cloth. My answer was that when the cloth is of a low character, such as is made from poor material, when the goods are finished the defects themselves are not so easily discernible as in a high-class cloth, and I instanced how easy it was to hide defects in the case to which you refer.

6183. But still you admit that with the defects there the stuff is not so good as it otherwise would be?—I admit that there is a defect and the character of the cloth is weakened, but the weakness is so infinitesimally small as to have no effect whatever. If it was done in a countless number of instances all through the piece, of course it would destroy the piece.

6184. The pieces would be imperfect, whether they could be more or less concealed or not. But anyhow, I will not go on with that. You say that the remedy is in the courts: I do not quite understand how you think they could get a remedy in the courts?—Let me give you an instance. A girl can wilfully make what is called a trap. It is an exceedingly rare occurrence, indeed I should say I have never known it take place. But I can conceive that a weaver could deliberately make a trap by putting two shuttles in a loom; they meet in the middle of a piece and out comes a whole bunch of ends.

6185. Would it not be possible for an employer, if he could only enforce his fines by the court, to say to a girl, "Now, this is your fault, and if you do not pay, I shall take it into court"?—I have no objection to his doing it if you are going to have fines.

6186. Would it not come to the same thing? Would not the threat of taking it into court have the same effect as what they do now?—If you mean that an employer should have the right of taking all cases of fines into court, I am with you.

6187. I rather gathered that that was your remedy?—What we want to prevent is an employer being his own judge, jury, and assessor.

6188. My point is that the threat of taking it into court would really have the same effect if the girl was afraid of dismissal?—I say again, so far as we are concerned, if an employer desires to take a case into court by all means let him do it. If you must have deductions, we say that is the best way, so far as weavers are concerned, to have deductions made.

6189. On the question of the supply of beer, you have no evidence on that ? I understand that you did send a spy into the workshop, but it was not effective ?—That is so. There is only the evidence of the statements made.

6190. And you really have no evidence which will bear examination ?—No, and I make the statement here in the hope that examination may be made. I have no desire to lay that down as a dictum from me, but I do make the statement just as I make the statement with regard to colour work.

6191. It is pure hearsay ?—Hearsay direct from the girls concerned.

6192. The instance which you have given us are the worst you can find, of course ?—Not by any means. I have given you the worst, and I have given you the least worst.—I was going to say the best, but there is no best.

6193. In the case of spoilt work, and other instances which you have given us, they are amongst the worst cases which you have ?—No ; I have tried to be fair. I have stated that the case of the 4s. 6d. fine was the worst I have known.

6194. You gave us a case with regard to the warp—£3 for dyeing—that is unique. You know of no other case ? —That is so.

6195. That and the other case you have given us are bad cases, I suppose ?—Not necessarily bad from your standpoint ; bad from mine, but ordinary cases.

6196. Bad from the worker's point of view ?—Bad from the worker's point of view.

6197. All these cases which you have given us extend over a series of years ?—Yes.

6198. They are not every day cases ?—They are of every day occurrence, if that is what you mean.

6199. Two of them you have given as unique ?—I have simply cited examples.

6200. Two you have specifically stated are unique cases—the case of the 4s. 6d. ?—That is an unique one.

6201. And the case of £3 for dyeing is unique ?—Yes, that is unique. The other is as common as it is possible to be.

6202. Which one ?—Fining for broken pieces is as common as anything.

6203. You gave us one case in which 4s. 6d. was charged for a piece for the work on which the girl only got 3s. 6d. : that was unique ?—Unique in its extent, not otherwise. Unique because it was in excess of the piece wage. It is rare for a girl to be fined the whole of the piece wage.

6204. They are the worst you have ever known ?—Yes, that is so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

6206. You said you saw no objection to an employer taking the question of deductions and fines into court and having them settled there ?—That is so.

6207. Have you considered the possibility of having them determined by some body jointly representing both the employer and the employed as an alternative to taking matters of that kind into court ?—No, I have not.

6208. In some trades we are told a board or joint committee exists which determines any question of damage to any piece of work, as to what the actual loss is and what the worker ought to pay, if anything ?—I am speaking now for myself ; my own opinion is that we should attempt to resist any legislation of that character because we hold that no operative wilfully does damage, and unless an operative does damage wilfully, he ought not to be held responsible for it.

6209. That applies equally to what you said about taking fines and deductions into court ?—Yes. You will remember I said that that was my own opinion, but I think it is shared by some others besides myself. The reason for the statement is this—the employer would have taken from him the power to become his own assessor to begin with.

6210. That would happen under this alternative ?—I grant that, but the difficulty of taking it into court and the odium which would rest upon an employer who took it into court would prevent cases going there.

6211. Yours is merely a nominal protection then for the employer ?—That is so. I do not desire it at all. I say an employer is protected by his power to dismiss.

6212. Supposing that all deductions for damaged work were abolished as such, and employers could devise a method by which different prices would be fixed for different qualities of work, what would you say to that ? For example, a piece of cloth which was brought in with a great many broken ends would be assessed and paid for at a different price under the contract ?—That is already done in the schedule.

6213. That is a deduction for actual damage, but supposing that it were made illegal to have a schedule of deductions for damage, would it be possible for employers to grade the work and to fix different prices beforehand with the worker by contract for different grades of work ? —Of course it would be possible, but it is admitting the principle of the right to fine, which we do not admit.

6214. I grant it is the same thing in effect, but it is in quite a different form ?—It would be possible, of course. I cannot conceive anything to be beyond the wit of man.

6215. You said that in many cases the mistakes made by the workers resulting in damage were quite easy to rectify, and were in fact often rectified by girls in their own time ?—Yes.

6216. Does that apply to piece-workers ?—Yes.

6217. It does not apply to time-workers ?—No.

6218. You gave us some evidence about out-workers in the clothing trade in Bradford ?—Yes, in the West Riding District from Halifax to Skipton.

6219. Would that include Leeds ?—No ; I know very little about Leeds.

6220. Do you know the Particulars Section of the Factory Act has been extended to the wholesale tailoring trade and the clothing trade ?—The Particulars Clause only applies to the furnishing of particulars.

6221. I only wanted to ask you if you knew whether it was observed by the Jewish employers and Jewish sub-contractors ?—I am afraid it is not.

6222. Can you say definitely, Yes or No ?—I think I can say definitely so far as Bradford is concerned that it is not applied, that is to say, the particulars clause of the Factory Act is not applied to the out-workers of Bradford.

6223. It is applied by an Order of the Secretary of State ?—It is not carried out.

6224. You mentioned one or two cases where the whole cost of a damaged piece of cloth was deducted, and the piece of cloth handed to the worker ?—Yes.

6225. That is illegal under the present Act ?—Yes.

6226. Are you aware of any cases where that point has been successfully taken in Bradford ?—No. I do not know that the girls rebel, as a matter of fact. It sometimes pays a girl to take the piece of cloth. She gets it at what we call "fent" prices, and sells it. It may be illegal. The fact of deducting rent from wages is illegal, but it does not prevent the employer from doing it.

6227. I only wanted to know if cases had been taken on that point by the factory inspector ?—I do not know of any.

6228. Do you know whether it has been brought to his knowledge ?—I do not know that it has. It is possible I may have reported to Mr. Shinner or Mr. Seal, but I do not call that to mind.

6229. In some other places successful proceedings have been taken against employers for that. You said in reply to Mrs. Tennant that you had brought a number of cases to the notice of the factory inspector ?—Yes.

Mr. W H. Drew.

27 Nov. 1906.

6230. And so far as you knew and believe he always dealt with them and the practice was stopped ?—In my opinion we have one of the most conscientious factory inspectors it is possible to have. He does his work whenever a case is reported to him. Sometimes I am afraid I put a lot of unnecessary work upon him, but if a case is reported to Mr. Seal he makes a point of inquiring into it. Sometimes the facts reported to us are found not to exist when the matter is examined. I only want to show his conscientiousness.

6231. I gather from your evidence that a very extensive practice of fining and making deductions prevails at the present time ?—That is so, an exceedingly extensive one.

6233. May I ask how ?—If you were confronted with two evils, each of them requiring particular attention, you would take the greater. That is just our position.

6234. The inspector has not sufficient time ?—By no means. As a matter of fact we hold that we could keep two lady inspectors going for Yorkshire in addition to other two male inspectors.

6235. For the West Riding ?—Yes.

6236. You said that the details of these schedules of fines and deductions were not known to you ?—That is so.

6237. And that a weaver would not often be bold enough to make a copy of them ?—That is so.

6239. That is what I want to get from you. That is the law, but it is not observed ?—Oh no ; that part of the law, I should say, has never been observed. I have never known the attention of a girl being drawn even to the schedule. The schedule is there, but I have never known the attention of a new girl being drawn to it.

6240. Much less a copy given to her ?—Much less a copy given to her.

6241. Has any attempt been made to enforce the law ? —I am bound to say I did not know we had such powers.

6242. Perhaps you might look at Section 6 ?—I will.

6243. With regard to the instance you gave of the employers boarding children out in the village, and keeping all their wages in return for board and lodging, I should like some further information ?—The statement made to me is that they occupy cottages, and employ two or three matrons—or they may only employ one—to look after the children. The wages are kept for the keep of the children just as a mother would take the wages from her own child, only the operative does not touch the wage at all.

6244. That strikes me as being illegal. Are you going to bring it to the notice of the factory inspector ?—I am not so sure that that has not been done. Our difficulty is to tell what has followed. It has been raised so often publicly that I am almost afraid that the attention of the Home Office has been drawn to it.

6245. To this particular case ?—Yes. It is the only case I know of up that valley. The same thing is said to take place in Halifax, and up there.

6246. It is quite new to me, and it is rather an interesting case. It seems to me to be illegal ?—I mention it in the hope that some attention may be drawn to it, and that it may either be found to be correct, and stopped, or that it may be found incorrect and therefore we shall not need to repeat the statement.

6247. Is it a long-standing case or a recent one ?—To my knowledge, the allegation has been made for two years.

6248. You said before the Act of 1896 all fines were illegal ; may I ask exactly what you meant by that ?—I do not think I can make it plainer.

6249. You are aware that in the case of Redgrave v. Kelly the High Court decided that fines were not an infringement of the earlier Truck Acts and that it was to remedy that that the Act of 1896 was brought in, and to bring them under some sort of control ?—What was the date of the case ?

6250. 1889 ?—I have never heard it quoted before.

By the Chairman.

6252. There are one or two questions of detail and of principle I wish to ask you. The question of detail is this. You gave your evidence of the breakage of threads of weft ; did I gather from you that in the making up of the web ultimately that broken thread may not be detected either by the maker up or by the purchaser ?—I will try and explain.

6253. In the milling, I mean ?—The broken thread runs in this way (demonstrating). This is empty. If these two pieces are taken out each side there is an empty space. When it goes through the process of finishing it merges up. The pattern may be broken, but the pattern in low-class goods is a very immaterial thing. It mills up, if you like ; it shrinks, and therefore it is not detectable.

6254. Is there any appreciable loss at all on the purchase price of the article ?—None whatever.

6255. The fine is exacted as a matter of discipline ?—That is so.

6256. Then, coming to the general questions, in the first place, you have been asked about giving hearsay evidence ; of course we cannot have all these hundreds or thousands of operatives here, but so far as your evidence has been given, is it to the best of your knowledge an accurate representation of facts, and do you yourself thoroughly believe that evidence ?—I thoroughly believe every statement that I have made, and the statements which I have made have been given on the statements made to us by people in whom we have perfect trust.

6257. So that we may accept it as authentic in that sense ?—That is so.

6258. My last question is also a general one : I gather you adopt the system of making reports to the inspector when you think it needful ?—That is so.

6259. Supposing the inspector prosecutes, that is a public fact of which you are aware ?—Not always, unless it is reported in the Press. I am afraid a large percentage of Factory Act cases are not reported.

6260. Suppose he does not prosecute, have you any official means of obtaining information as to what has been the upshot of your complaint ?—No.

6261. Would it be an advantage to the operatives if you could gain that information ?—A very great advantage. We have asked for it for years.

6262. If the law could be amended in that particular, you think it would be good all round ?—That is so. If the Home Office could see its way to supply us with details of prosecutions, or details of cases which have come to us, if only for the purpose of assisting, it would be of great advantage to us.

6263. I will put this to you, that you complain on a specific point and you never know what happens with regard to it ?—That is so.

6264. But suppose you knew that your complaint on that point had been followed by a communication from the inspector to the employer, and that the practice had been stopped, you could use that in your organisation as a useful precedent, and as a lever with other employers ?—Without any question.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, November 28th, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.

28 Nov. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6265. Will you please state your position as a witness coming before this Committee—the organisations you represent, their numbers, and so on?—The organisation I represent is known by the name of the Northern Counties Amalgamated Weavers' Association, and it has a membership of about 100,000. There may be 500 or 600 more, but that is about the figure. Inside that organisation there are thirty-five separate societies ranging in numbers from 100 members up to as high as 14,000 members, but the total number in the amalgamation is, as I have said, 100,000.

6266. In giving your evidence to-day do you represent substantially the judgment of all these organisations?—Yes. I will tell you how we arrive at their decision. The separate organisations have each a committee of management. I may explain that each society has its own system of working. They are not amalgamated for any purpose which controls them except in regard to certain benefits with reference to strikes. Everything else in their management and their rules and regulations are all of their own making, and they are separately governed. Each society has a committee ranging from ten in the smaller bodies to as high as twenty-four in the larger bodies. These committees are composed exclusively of persons now working inside cotton mills as weavers. They are almost all of them fathers of families having their families working in the mills, and they represent therefore in the most direct way possible the operatives employed.

6267. Does the organisation represent any classes of female labour?—Yes, the same persons represent the women workers. About 65 per cent. will be female labour, and in two districts we have female members of the committees, but in all cases the committees represent the whole mass of the organised workpeople. We asked these people to take this matter into consideration twelve months ago, and the matter was adjourned for three months in order to give them full opportunity of consulting their members, which they did in many cases at members' meetings. The whole case was placed before them and then a council meeting of the whole of the representatives of these workpeople was held. The representatives numbered ninety-six from the thirty-five districts, and the reports we received from each district were such as to lead to the unanimous resolution we came to approving of the policy of the total abolition of fines in factories.

6268. Have you conveniently at hand any writing to show the form in which the question was submitted to these bodies?—I have nothing in writing here, but the form would be this. A resolution was passed by our council which numbers ninety-six members stating the actual position of the matter which we wanted them to discuss. That resolution would be sent to the members, or brought before meetings of members, and the subject would be discussed in that way.

6269. Was there a skeleton resolution submitted in favour of abolition of fines?—Simply a statement in regard to it, but eventually at the council meeting a resolution was adopted unanimously in favour of the principle of the total abolition of fines. We don't need to give our members detailed statements in consulting them because they all understand the subject quite as well as I do from the point of view of the individual worker.

6270. The point is, did you give them a lead on the subject or simply submit both sides of the question to them?—We could not give our people much lead because they know the subject quite as well as we do, and if we gave them any lead that they did not agree with they would soon tell us. They have practical knowledge of the subject. They have weekly contact with it through their various committees.

6271. Then the result was actual unanimity?—Yes, in our branch.

6272. Unanimity in favour of the total abolition of fines and deductions?—Yes, that is so.

6273. Of course you know the Act of 1896?—Yes.

6274. Under the earlier sections of that Act fines and deductions are permitted under certain stipulated conditions about giving full specification in detail and about the amounts being fair and reasonable, and so on. Were the weavers represented by your association exempted from that Act?—Yes.

6275. Would you explain to the Committee how that occurred?—At the time we had the Bill before us we felt, judging from the contents of the measure, that it would be a retrograde step so far as we were concerned. Our policy then and now is, in our opinion, much better than the system of posting up fines, because if you have a fine posted, say, to the amount of 6d. for some particular fault we feared we should lose the right which we had always claimed of examining whether the fault was that of the weaver or not. The man's representative or perhaps the secretary of the district went down and looked at the fault and if it was found that the weaver was not to blame we should refuse to admit the liability. We felt that if a system began in our district by which a schedule of fines was placed in the warehouse or office or weaving shed the fact that we worked under them might be regarded as an implied contract under which we might lose our right to insist that every fine might be made a question of examination and proof.

6276. You have stated the attitude you took up prior to that legislation, and now I call your attention to Section 9 of the Act which authorises the Secretary of State to grant exemptions from its provisions?—Yes.

6277. Did the Secretary of State, following the opinion of your societies, make an exemption order?—Yes. I believe I may say that we were the cause of that clause being put in the Bill. It was inserted at our suggestion or at least we had some influence in the matter.

6278. You claimed exemption upon grounds which you hold are as valid to-day as an argument for the total abolition of fines?—Yes. We say that our present system, which is the same as we had then, is far preferable to a schedule list of fines.

6279. It is fair I should put this to you; we have had a considerable body of evidence from inspectors and from people engaged in various industries on the subject of fines and deductions. Some of that evidence favours total abolition. Now, so far as your own opinion and experience go, would you favour total abolition?—Yes, certainly in our trade, but I would not like to express an opinion as to any trade about which I have not full knowledge. We are supported in our view by the fact that in the next preceding process to ours, namely, that of spinning, the workers are entirely exempt from fines by force of organisation.

6280. I think we should all like you to explain that more fully?—I only mention it as a matter of fact without pledging myself as to how it was brought about. The facts are that in the spinning trade the union does not allow any such deductions. My colleague, Mr. Gill, who is connected with that department, recently told me that the operatives know that if they are not doing their duty they are subject to dismissal. I am speaking of the practice generally although there may be some isolated exceptions.

6281. I understood you to say that that is by reason of organisation among the workpeople and the result is that employers concede the non-imposition of fines?—Yes. It is made a condition by the union that if any of the men are fined it may cause a dispute which may lead to a stoppage of the mill.

6282. Does the case you mention cover a large number of operatives?—There are about 20,300 full spinners in the trade, and there are 41,000 piercers and creelers receiving less wages.

6283. I gather then that with the 100,000 represented by yourself and the 61,300 spinners your total works up to about 160,000 or 160,000 persons engaged in the textile industry?—That is in only two branches.

6284. Does that number represent the absence of fines and deductions?—No. Fines are not absent amongst us weavers now, but the spinners have exemption from them.

6285. Then the situation I gather from you with regard to the weaving business is that you favoured total abolition before this Act was passed, and that you got the Secretary of State's exemption in order to facilitate abolition, but that you have not yet secured it entirely?—Our point is that we prefer our present system to the scheduling of fines under the Act. If we have got to choose between total abolition and the Act, we should prefer total abolition, and we prefer it to our present system.

6286. It is your present system I want to get at. How does it work in fact? What is your experience? Although you are exempted from the Truck Act and although you object to fines and deductions on principle and would prefer total abolition, how are you, as a trade, in fact, affected by the system?—Fines are deducted by certain employers for alleged faults.

6287. Then there are fines?—Yes, in our work more or less but not very great, but the operative has the choice of coming to us about it and in such cases we go to the mill. All of us are practical weavers and we know as much about the cloth as the employer or the weaver. After examining the cloth and hearing the evidence we decide who is to blame.

6288. Can you give us a concrete example?—Yes, take a piece of cloth which the employer says shows a fault; it may be a few ends woven down longer than he thinks reasonable. I should carefully examine the cloth and should ask the weaver as to the reason for these ends. If she satisfies me that the material supplied was faulty and caused the odd threads I might come to the conclusion that the weaver had done her level best and that whilst the cloth was not perfect the fact that the material was faulty would be an excuse for her as she had to make a good job as possible out of the materials supplied. In such a case I might say that I thought she was not liable and should resist the fine. The employer might then offer a compromise and might say, "I will let her off for 2d. instead of 6d." If it was a case where the girl was not responsible I might say that we were prepared to fight it, and would go into court for a judge to decide whether the fine was reasonable.

6289. Would you excuse me putting a difficulty which arises in my mind about that? I quite understand how such a thing occurred under the Act of 1896, because you could cite a clause that the fine was not fair or reasonable, but what is your datum or standard when, being exempted, you go to court to make a complaint of these deductions?—First of all it has been held in court by decisions in our district that fines for disciplinary purposes are not illegal. If we resist a fine the employer often puts in a claim for damages which he alleges to have been caused by the weaver and we have to prove that the damage is not due to the worker's negligence. The employer pays the money into court sometimes and then claims a set-off.

6290. You will excuse me going off the line of your evidence but you will see the reason for it afterwards. Under Section 1 of the Act of 1896, Sub-section (c), what has got to be established even under the statute from which you are exempted, is that the fine is in respect some act or omission likely to cause damage or loss interruption or hindrance to business, and that the amount of the fine is fair and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. Now, so far as I understand your narrative that is substantially the very thing that you have to contend with the masters in the cases you have instanced. You have to maintain the same battle as would be maintained even under the Statute of 1896, namely that there is no loss or damage, or that it is owing to bad material or that the fine is not fair and reasonable in amount, being out of proportion to the wages earned, so that you are left, even although excluded from the Act of 1896, in the same embarrassing position as people under that Statute, namely having to establish certain things—is not that so?—To some extent it is so, but we believe the fact of employers knowing that we can take action in every case is preferable to having the list of fines facing the operatives every time they come into the place. Every case is decided on its merits. In the case of scheduled fines the employers' federation might try to make them uniform.

6291. In fact you look on the Statute as a statutory facility for the imposition of fines?—Yes, that is our view.

6292. Fines and deductions made easy by Statute?—Yes. As treasurer of the Women's Trades Union League I have from time to time had reports given to me, which I cannot personally vouch for, because I am there entirely dependent on what others have told me, that there prevails in their trades in this respect conditions which would never be allowed in our trades either under a schedule of fines or otherwise as we should have the mill stopped rather than pay some of the excessive fines.

6293. Perhaps on the broad question of abolition, which you favour, you would now give the Committee briefly your reasons for your view?—Under our present system we know that there is quite a number of petty fines and some of the persons who inflict these fines have admitted that they are expected to produce a certain return in fines during the week. When such a person can show a good list of fines it is no detriment to him in the eyes of his employer, but it leads to much petty fining. Take the case of a cloth-looker who examines the cloth that we produce. The work people are rather apt to tremble when a new man of that sort comes on and is anxious to show his power by an excessive number of petty fines. There are some mills now where fines are dispensed with without any complaint. If a dismissal takes place the operative in question often admits the fault. It is only in rare instances that we have complaints about discharges on account of bad work. Some of the places where fines are not imposed are amongst the best mills in the trade where really good work is demanded.

6294. Can you name any?—I would not like to give names, but there are two in my town where fines are not imposed, and I have never had any complaints from these two mills on account of discharges arising from bad work.

6295. Your evidence has referred more particularly to petty fines which are really disciplinary, but there is another class of fines in respect to damaged work. Having these in view, would you still advocate total abolition of fines?—Yes. On this ground, that if the weavers knew that if they wilfully spoil work it would mean discharge, that would make them more careful, especially the younger people, some of whom may have 3d. stopped out of their pay without telling their parents about it at the end of the week. It is perhaps only in cases where parents are working in the same mill that such fines become known to the parents. I have no fear of the result so far as total abolition is concerned. It has never led to wholesale discharges in the spinning trade or in those mills in our own trade where fines are not imposed.

6296. Now take these things in their order: first petty or purely disciplinary fines. What is your opinion with regard to the maintenance of discipline if fines were totally abolished?—I assume you mean by disciplinary fines cases where a worker is fined 2d. for being three minutes late or 4d. for being ten minutes late, and so on. In my opinion if a notice was put up that workers who came late three times within a certain specified period would be discharged that would have more effect than a 2d. or 3d. fine. There is often a dispute as to whether the workers were late or not, which suggests what is known to us as the system of time cribbing. There is sometimes serious grumbling because the engines happen to be on early, perhaps five minutes before the time, and the weaver who comes punctually is therefore assumed to be late. I have myself worked at a mill where in this way I put in forty minutes a day overtime. I was always supposed to be late if I turned up anything near the time, and have had only fifty minutes instead of an hour for dinner. I am glad to say such cases are getting fewer in proportion to the number of mills, and that is perhaps due to the increased number of fines in the police courts for time cribbing. It is very obnoxious to men to be fined for being late when they are not late, and I think no employer would attempt to discharge any workman who really came in time.

6297. You think that the abolition of fines would lead to a juster administration even of discipline?—Yes, I do.

6298. In such a case as you suggest of dismissal upon the third offence within such a given period as perhaps a month, the system might be considered to have a subsidiary advantage in that for the first and second offence you have threats held over the workman which may terminate in dismissal. Do you think on the whole that that system would be a better mode of discipline?—I do. It exists in the spinning mills, where no fines are inflicted.

6299. Do you think amongst the large class of operatives that such a system would in practice be preferred?—I do.

6300. Do you think that both employers and workpeople would, on the whole, benefit by it?—I don't think any employers would lose by it from a disciplinary point of view.

6301. With regard to the second head of your evidence as to fines for spoilt work, of course the question of fines for damaged work is also a branch of discipline?—Yes, it is discipline in a sense, and there may be real damage. In every mill there are some faults.

6302. Do you favour abolition there?—Exactly.

6303. What would be the effect upon the work? Do you think on the whole the worker would learn to be more careful?—Yes.

6304. And the output upon the whole would be better?—I do not think it makes any difference to the output. It does not, so far as my experience goes.

6305. There is a third class of fines which I must put to you, or rather deductions—deductions made in respect of power supplied?—We have not any.

6306. In respect of light?—No.

6307. In respect of heat?—No.

6308. In respect of needles?—No.

6309. In respect of overalls?—No. The only deduction we have, which is by arrangement, is this. We have what is known as gold thread. It is rather a valuable material, and you can quite see that if there were no charge made for it there might be waste. So we have an arrangement by which the weaver pays 3d. for each bobbin of gold thread, or 6d., according to the value, and then for each foot put into the cloth, the weaver has an addition to the price; so we balance it. There are fifty yards on a bobbin, and we have so much per foot; I think it is ·02d. per foot put on to the weaver's wages for every foot he puts in the piece where the bobbins are 3d. each. It is only a reduction in form. The wages are no less as a result; they get it back. It is only done to present waste, and we agree to that.

Mr. D. J. Shackleton, M.P.

6310. That is done by arrangement between the union on the one hand and the employers on the other?—Yes.

6311. Is that the only instance of deduction for material which you know of?—We have another kind of deduction which we have contested, and recently I put it before the employers and they passed a resolution recommending their people not to continue it. There was an old-standing deduction for closet cleaning. We have protested against that, and have said that the employers ought to see the closets are kept clean without deducting for it.

6312. You think that should be part of the charge of the factory?—I think so. In 88 per cent. of the mills in Darwen, where I happen to be secretary of their organisation, as well as being President of the Amalgamated Society, they either deduct so much per month or collect it from the operatives. We have sought to have that stopped altogether; at least, we have said we will not have it deducted, and the employers have agreed to recommend their people not to deduct. We have another class of deductions which has also been recommend d to be stopped, namely, deductions for hot water for breakfast and dinner purposes. The employers boil the water and the weavers fetch it, or send their assistants for it, and 1d. per week is charged, and in some cases they deduct it from the wages. The employers have agreed not to do that, but the weavers pay for it. On the Saturday morning when they get their wages they pay 1d. to the person who attends to the boiler. They are the only cases of deduction, and we have had them stopped.

6313. There is one point I should like to have your opinion on. Under the Act of 1896 you are aware that the greatest difficulty is put in the way of establishing affirmatively a contravention of the Statute?—Yes.

6314. And in your own trade, which is exempted, I gather that there are difficulties of a similar kind?—They are not so numerous as you might think, because a test case on the question of a fine settles hundreds which might follow. If we have a test case on a particular issue between a firm and ourselves, as the union representing the operatives, that test case settles whether it is a reasonable thing or not, and that same employer would not try the same thing on afterwards if it were found not reasonable, and the employers in the district, knowing the result of the case in court, and getting to know the facts, being themselves in an organisation, will not try the same thing on. So that there are not so many court cases as you would think; there are very few.

6315. Both parties are on the watch, so to speak?—Yes.

6316. And that is one thing which in practice you think the law should make an end of?—Yes, I may say that the fines with us are not very numerous. We have had complaints from the weavers with regard to fines, and I have gone to the mills to enquire myself. It is only in the last three months that an unauthorised strike took place on account of fines; that is to say, they came out without our consent, and had to go back at once; we did not consider them as bona fide entitled to our support, and they had to go back. Between their going back and our people taking it in hand properly, I went and made enquiries into the fines in that place. There would be somewhere near ninety operatives there, earning on an average 24s. or 25s. per week each. The whole of the fines for one week amounted to 6d., another, 1s., and the highest for the three weeks complained about I think was about 2s. 3d., out of which one weaver alone accounted for 9d. The whole trouble in that mill had arisen from one weaver having been fined three times. They ran away with the idea that heavy fining was taking place because one weaver said she had been fined three times. The highest was 2s. 3d. out of a wage bill of ninety times 25s., a mere bagatelle. Still the employer did promise that he would not be quite so severe as he had been. A new cloth had been put in and he had been anxious to make it perfect. As a matter of fact, the firm gave up making the cloth rather than have trouble. The weavers were not used to that cloth and it was unfair to ask them to suddenly change from a rough trade to a fine trade. The weavers have to be trained before they can get from one to the other and cannot be expected to make good material when they have not been brought up to that particular kind.

6317. The friction which resulted from the imposition of fines seems to be out of all proportion to the actual amount of the fines?—That is so.

6318. Does that assist your mind in coming to the conclusion that it would be better to do away with fines?—Yes. We feel this, that what does occur is well worth doing away with, and the friction it causes is absolutely unnecessary. We feel it more for the children and younger people who have nobody to defend them.

6319. Will you kindly address your mind to this; suppose there were no fines, a system of temporary suspensions might be instituted; instead of being fined half-a-crown, a man or a girl would go off work for three days. I give that as an instance. In some trades there seems to be an inclination to prefer a system of temporary suspensions to a system of fines; what is the view of yourself and those you represent upon that subject?—If the suspension system became burdensome we should take the same action with regard to that as we do with regard to fines. If a weaver came to me and said he had been suspended for three days or a week on account of a fault, I should go at once to see the cause of the suspension and if I found the action was most unreasonable, if the fault were not such as to warrant causing a loss of 12s. 6d. or 25s. or 28s. to the weaver, we should say, "This must be stopped," and if we could not agree, then it would be a question of dispute. The employer might be faced with the total stoppage of his mill. It would be a grievance in the ordinary trade way. If the weaver deserved it we should have to say so, but if it were unreasonable we should simply fight it.

6320. Would you be inclined to the total abolition of fines, in the first place?—Yes.

6321. And with regard to temporary suspensions, you would leave them to be settled by the ordinary methods?—Exactly. We should settle it in that way. If it were unreasonable it would have to be faced in the ordinary trade way.

6322. Do I gather that you would prefer the abolition of fines even though it should introduce, for the time being, a number of temporary suspensions?—I can say this quite frankly, that our people would set their face against temporary suspension as a system. There may be individual cases which we could not defend, just as there are in regard to fines, but as a system we should just fight that as hard as we ever fought fines, there is no doubt about that, because we can see that the result of that would be far more irksome to the operative.

6323. It would be difficult to prevent an evasion of the law I mean, we must look at it all round. There might be actual dismissal, and a sort of understanding that if a person came back in three days he would be taken on again?—But even in the case of actual dismissal what happens in the spinning trade is this; the Secretary of that particular society at once enquires into the dismissal and if it is unreasonable then action is taken just the same as in the case of fines.

6324. That would again be a matter of dispute which would have to fall under the arrangements made between the workmen and their union and the employers and their federation?—That is so. We do not think there is any need to go into law on these things; we generally settle them round a table.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

6325. You mentioned spinning as the process preceding weaving; do you know what obtains in the subsequent process of bleaching and dyeing?—No, I have no knowledge. The bleachers of Bolton and district are connected with us for Parliamentary purposes, but I never heard them make a complaint on any of these subjects.

6326. You do not know whether they have a system of fines or not?—No; they are not really part of our organisation.

6327. Weavers are in great demand at present, are they not?—Yes.

6328. I mean if one is discharged it is not very much trouble for him to go immediately and get another shop?—It may be a serious matter. They may get discharged from a place at 28s. and fall to 24s. There is always a certain amount of disgrace in connection with a discharge which you cannot get rid of.

6329. With regard to a weaver being late three times and being discharged there would not be much slur on his character if he got another place, and he might get a place which paid two or three shillings a week more?—It is just possible he might, but fining would not prevent him doing that. He could give his notice and serve seven days and go. If he wanted to change his place he could do it far more readily than by being fined or discharged.

6330. I am speaking of it as a deterrent for being late, or for some other offence which they wish the weaver to stop. As things are at present, I take it discharge is hardly a deterrent?—Oh, it is. You cannot step out of one mill into another. It cannot be done so readily as that.

6331. I thought they were in such demand that they had only to put their hands out to get another place?—It might mean a man having to travel a mile or two instead of walking across the street, which would be a serious matter to him. I do not think you can take it there is any relaxation in discipline. The cotton trade is noted for its discipline. There is very little lost time. The employers themselves boast that so far as lost time is concerned in their trade, especially on a Monday morning, it is reduced to a minimum. It is very rare indeed that weavers stop off their work on account of intoxicants or anything of that sort. There is very little lost time from that cause.

6332. I take it your organisation is so strong and so well looked after that you are practically in an equal position in dealing with the employers and their federation?—That is so.

6333. There is no power the employers have which you cannot combat?—I would not say that, but we look fairly well after ourselves; I will put it in that way. Their cash bag is deeper than ours; there is that difference.

6334. In the case of a person leaving a place, as she can get another, do you not think that leads to some little carelessness?—No, not when the young person knew that as a result of her carelessness she might have to go home and tell her mother she had lost her place. I think that is a serious thing for a young person to face. And I am certain it would not make any difference to adults—persons responsible for a home.

6335. The point is to get the best work out of the mill, which of course reflects again upon the operative. Do you think that the employer would be sure of turning out quite as good work if he was not able to exact a fine—I mean what would be called a just fine now, such as you would pass if you were called in as arbitrator?—I can only answer that by saying that the places where fines are not put in force are some of the best mills, where they have the best cloth, what we call home trade goods. It is well known that home trade goods have to be made far better than those which are sent abroad, which are generally of a rougher character, and more or less cheaper—not quite so much cotton, and a bit more something else.

6336. From the employer's point of view your opinion is that in regard to good work, and in regard to punctuality in the morning, it would not be any loss to the employer to do away with fines?—No, I do not think it would.

6337. In spite of the fact that almost any weaver now can go and get a fresh job as soon as he leaves a mill, you think that the threat of discharge would have the necessary result?—I think there is a misapprehension on that point. A weaver cannot change to a good shop any time he likes. The good shops are fairly well looked after now; that is to say, there is no scarcity of operatives in the best shops. The scarcity in that trade, like every other, comes at the bottom, where there is a lower wage. Everybody is trying to get to a better place, and a weaver working at a good shop would never be careless because he knew that if he lost it he could get a shop somewhere else.

6338. But from the employer's point of view do you not think it is a little hard when he is running his mill to have to resort to discharging his workpeople, which, as you know, would mean a very serious inconvenience to him, if not a loss, when by a small system of fines he could perhaps get the necessary discipline ?—I do not think he has a right to fine. I think the point should be this: If a weaver is not giving satisfaction he ought to be told so and take the consequences just as in any other trade. In the great bulk of the organised trades, such as the iron trade and the stonemasons, there may be very small fines in those perhaps, but they do not admit any to me, and they can manage well without them; and I do not see why the cotton trade should be the only organised trade especially included in this system.

6339. You admit that the fines are not a very serious matter? You see to that?—So far as we are able. There may be pounds upon pounds which we never hear about. When a case does come to our knowledge we pay attention to it, and in cases where complaints have been made we have found the fines very small. There may be places where fines are heavier which we do not know about. I suppose you will get evidence of facts with regard to that in some cases.

By Mr. Walsh.

6340. You said that you were in favour of the total abolition of fines ?—Yes.

6341. Of course I paid some attention to your statement that you have 100,000 members ?—About that.

6342. Even with the best system of investigation and the most earnest officials, there are probably many cases which are not able to be visited ?—Yes; the weavers themselves might think that they were to blame, and therefore not tell us about it.

6343. Or if they did not think themselves to blame they might think the line of least resistance would be to say nothing about it and to go on ?—That is so.

6344. So that it is quite possible that many cases are not investigated, and are unrelieved, so to speak ?—I should think there are many 6345. There seems to be an idea—as to how far it is correct one cannot say—that discipline would be improved, and that damage, either actual or prospective, to the employer would be lessened by this system of fining; do you find that many of the faults which are alleged against the workmen are practically incident to the trade and are not matters over which the workers have effective control ?—Many of them are faults which will always happen and could not be prevented.

6346. Even under the most perfect human system ?—Yes. There are others which are caused by carelessness, Take a case like this. We are paid by the piece and there is a system of averages, driving the workers up to a certain perfection of quantity. In order not to get below the average in the mill a weaver would leave the whole four looms on while he went into the warehouse to take some weft. These looms would be going in his absence, and when he came back very serious damage might be done. The weaver might consider, "It would take me an hour to make that right; I will stand a 3d. fine rather than make it right." He will call the attention of the overseer to that and ask him whether he will allow that. That is a damage which the weaver, in a sense, is responsible for, because he left the looms going; but his motive was that he might not go below the average, in order that he might not lose five minutes, which loss might mean that he did not keep up his average at the week end. If a man goes out twice a day for that purpose, as he is required to do, in addition to doing so for purposes of nature, all those periods would make a serious difference in the fifty-five and a half hours. Therefore the looms are kept going and there are frequently faults. But the employer does not complain; in fact he expects it.

6347. So that the workmen most desirous of speeding their work and adding thereby in a sense to the profits of the mill would be the most liable to have those fines inflicted ?—Yes; that is to say those faults would happen and they would be responsible.

6348. The most eager man or woman would lay himself open to the possibility of that kind of thing ?—That is so.

6349. Do you find that many of these fines are at the caprice of the official? You said that sometimes a new broom came along, and that for three or four weeks there was very considerable trouble in the mill; should we take it from that that the offences are, so to speak, capricious, that is, are liable to exist entirely at the will of the official ?—I will put it in this way. The man is new and his instructions are to get out a certain quality, and for faults which the previous man has allowed to go by with a caution he will inflict a fine of 2d. or 3d., and the fines will jump up very considerably, therefore, simply by the fact of a new man coming in, and you will have the whole place upset. I cannot put it in any other way than that it is his idea of what things ought to be fined for, and the matter is left to him. Another cloth looker who may have had more experience would act in a different manner. He would say, "This is not satisfactory." He would talk to the weavers a little and caution them and get a better result than another person who inflicted a fine straight away. When I was a youth about sixteen I worked at a mill and was at that time on three looms. The employer sent for me with regard to a damage which I did not think I was to blame for. The machinery was old and it made an uneven weaving, what we call a crack; you could see thin places when you held it up to the light. It was the result of bad machinery, which was then being replaced. The employer said, "This is not satisfactory. I am not going to fine you, but if you do not mend it you will have to go." That had more effect upon me than stopping me 3d. would have had. I did not want to go home and tell my father I had been dismissed. In consequence I was more careful as long as that machinery was being used. An experienced cloth-looker would caution rather than fine, and train the young people to do better work without fining them. It is all a question of the individual.

28 Nov. 1906.

6350. Do you think that much of the fining depends upon the caprice of the official ?—I would not like to put it in that way. He has certain instructions from the manager or the employer.

6351. You said a man was sometimes looked upon as a good man if he made a big list of fines ?—There are cases of that kind.

6352. Would it be possible for that man to create new offences, so to speak ?—No, he would not create new offences, but he would fine where another person would caution. They would all be offences, but the penalty would be different.

6353. Do I take it that many of these offences would really be incident to the trade, inseparable from the industry, so to speak ?—Yes, many of them are.

6354. Do I understand that the best human discipline would not in many cases avoid this incidence ?—That is perfectly true. It is impossible to make what we call writing paper—an absolutely perfect cloth. There are little faults which are always understood in the trade.

6355. I do not wish to take you over much of the ground which the Chairman has taken you over. Do you think that a small penalty inflicted upon boys or girls who have parents has not really a very deterrent effect ?—I think the most serious deterrent to a child is his parents' knowledge that he is not doing well. If the parent does not know about it, I do not see what effect it can have.

6356. The prospect of dismissal would have a far greater deterrent effect ?—I think so. As a matter of fact, it was common when I was in the mill for the parent if he did not work there himself and if he had not any of his own relations there, to ask some person to look after him and report if he was not doing his duty. I have been reported more than once.

6357. I am glad to hear that fines do not exist to anything like the same extent in your industry as in other industries. Are you of the opinion that discipline is not really improved by this system of fines ?—We have never been without it, and I cannot say what the result would be if it were done away with, but, judging from the places that are without it, there would be just as much discipline. I can only judge by the actual facts as they are. There is no less discipline in spinning than in weaving, and there is no less discipline in weaving where there are no fines than where there are fines. There is no difference in fact.

6358. I suppose the employers do, from time to time, complain to you if there is any necessity for complaint ?—Generally.

Mr. D. J. Shackleton, M.P.

28 Nov. 1906.

6359. Have they ever complained in these good mills where there are no fines, of any lack of discipline?—No; their remedy is discharge and they know it, and it has been quite sufficient.

6360. And there has been no complaint to you that discipline has been less because of the non-existence of fines?—No. I believe if fines were started there, I should have complaints.

6361. I suppose you are opposed to deductions even for the particular things which you have mentioned, such as the closet and hot water?—Yes. Where there is a service rendered, I think we should pay for it.

6362. Do I take it from you that the grievance which arises as the result of fines is great, and that the sense of injustice which is left behind in the workman is out of all proportion to the amount of the fine? Do I understand that they are labouring under a sense of injustice because they are sometimes fined for matters beyond their control?—The cases which come to us are distinctly of that character. There are hundreds of course, which do not come to us, which we know nothing about, but the cases which come simply come because the weaver does not think she ought to be held responsible.

6363. And you think the sense of injustice left in the work person's breast is out of all proportion to the fines?—Not in individual cases. If it is only 2d., if she does not think she ought to be held responsible, she feels the injustice; it is not the value of the 2d.?—

6364-5. That is what I say—the sense of injustice is much greater than the small fine levied?—Yes; I understand what you mean now. To fine 2d. for something when one has to work two hours for 2d. is an absurdity. You work two hours for nothing on a loom—that is the way the weaver looks at it. Twopence may be a small thing out of 25s., but it is two hours taken from him for a slight thing—that is the way they look at it. They boil it down to the actual thing as it appears to them—that they have worked two hours on that loom for nothing by having a fine of 2d. inflicted. We put it down roughly at 1d. a loom. It is more than that now, but it used to be 1d. a loom.

6366. I wish to be quite clear about these suspensions. You are in favour of the total abolition by law of fines and deductions?—Yes.

6367. Would you say the same with regard to suspensions?—I want to give my reason why I say "by law." I believe it is possible to secure this in certain cases without law, but that would very likely mean a trade controversy which would be very costly and would be a serious matter for the trade. So we prefer to take legal action now in many things rather than always fight by a severe strike. That is the reason why I prefer it being by law, not that it makes any difference in principle. I prefer it by legal enactment rather than have the friction which arises from a strike. In regard to the other point, we should decidedly take objection to a system of suspension, but I do not say that we would not allow incidental cases to happen without protest. But we should object to the system.

6368. Why I mentioned law was not to raise a question as between law and freedom of action, but because here we have to deal with the law. It is evident from your last reply that you would not favour the total abolition of suspensions by law in all cases—to make them illegal?—What you mean is that the employer should have no remedy except discharge?

6369. Yes?—It would have to be left to the common-sense of the employer. I do not know that we could say that an employer should not have the right to suspend. They do it now. That would be a serious alteration of the law which I would not like to give a definite opinion upon.

6370. So that as a matter of fact, you are prepared to leave suspensions in the same position as you do discharges?—Yes.

6371. That is to say, a well-conducted union always leaves itself open to the question of discharge?—Yes.

6372. And if it is unfair, and you want to rectify it, as a last resource you would stop the mill?—Yes.

6373. Several witnesses have given us important evidence on this point, and I want to be clear upon it, that while you say so emphatically that fines should be made illegal, and also deductions, you do not go so far with suspensions?—I say as a union we should fight them, but I would not like to say that an employer should entirely lose the right of suspending.

6374. I have no technical knowledge of the trade, but you told us about a man who wanted to keep up his average, and I have had sufficient experience already to know what that means. He might let a defect go, and even tell the overlooker about it. Could a man by such a system make a monetary gain?—By leaving his machinery going?

6375. And letting the defect go?—No, I do not think so. The cloth-looker or manager, or whoever was responsible, would say, "If you let that go it will cost you so much." The worker would say, "Well, if you will only fine me 3d. for that, I would rather have that than the trouble of spending an hour on it to rectify it while all the other looms are stopped."

6376. It is a question of the balance of gain?—It all depends. You cannot tell. You would have to know the actual case as it arose.

6377. And the official in the mill is the person who actually imposes the fine?—90 per cent. or more than that are imposed by the cloth-looker. There are a few imposed by the manager for late coming.

6378. Where do the fines go to?—Into the employer's pocket, so far as the cotton trade is concerned.

6379. Is that the invariable rule?—He might say they are a set-off for damages, but in the first place they go into his pocket.

6380. Does he put them into a sick fund or a wayz-goose, or anything of that kind?—No, we have nothing of that kind at all. I may say there is one exception, namely, with reference to the closets; that money, I think, goes into the pocket of what we call the odd man about the place. But I suppose that when he is taken on he is told his wage is 16s. a week and that he may expect 5s. from the weavers for cleaning the closets.

6381. I was going to ask you the same thing with regard to the hot water man; you said it was paid to the man on the Saturday?—Or the woman.

6382. I suppose that goes to the man or woman?—Yes, that is for the time of the person attending to it every morning and noon and getting it ready. We have no objection to paying for hot water.

6383. But you do not want it deducted?—That is so; we do not want it deducted.

6384. Comparing a spinning mill with a weaving shed, how do they come out with regard to discipline, using that word in its widest sense?—I do not know any difference. The same engine runs both in many cases.

6385. You have a pretty wide knowledge?—Yes. The discipline is the same.

6386. I want to know whether the fines are more largely with the women than with the men?—Taking them as a whole, I think the fines are more frequent with young persons, both boys and girls.

6387. As between men and women, there is not much difference?—The women look after themselves quite as well as the men do; there is no doubt about that.

6388. What is your view with respect to deductions for hospitals, ordinary county borough hospitals, or whatever they may be?—We have none. We make collections.

6389. It is not stopped at the pay office?—No.

6390. I was interested in what you said with regard to that gold thread. I gather you did think there that the system in vogue tended to care of the material?—Yes; that is the only reason it is put on.

6391. There was a question raised by one of the inspectors of deductions for cleaning the looms and bringing in material; I believe that is done in some of your weaving sheds?—Yes.

6392. What is your view about that?—You do not mean on the question of cleaning itself, of the particular work being done; you mean simply the question of deduction?

6393. Yes?—Because that is a matter we are not agreed upon between the two sides. But so far as the deduction is concerned, it is by arrangement, and if anything was done permanently in that matter, we should prefer that it did not come within the Truck Act, but that it should be done in the form of a deduction from the list. We have a list which gives the prices, say 24s. total wage, or say, 2s. 6d. per piece. If we come to any agreement at all eventually on that, we should have to make some allowance for it, and the way we should do would be this; we should say 2½ per cent. or 5 per cent. less. It would not be a deduction from the wage, but the piece would be calculated as being worth so much less. We should do it in that way just as we do anything else. Our list is made up of additions for certain things done and deductions for certain things not required. A weaver gets his price per piece for the work he does, and if this system of cleaning became arranged between the two sides we should arrange it so that the piece price and not the wage would be interfered with.

6394. I think I have gathered rightly from your evidence that your Union, by which I mean the Northern Counties Amalgamated Weavers Association, holds substantially the same opinions as you have expressed before us to-day?—They knew I was coming here to-day and they fully approved of this précis of my evidence.

6395. I gather that you are fully alive to the necessity of discipline and of good work, and that the evidence you have given, with regard to the total abolition of fines, took that fully into account?—Yes.

6396. And you think that discipline would be just as well maintained, and even better without fines?—Yes. We hold that it is so where the system is not in force.

By Mr. Delevingne.

6397. Referring to the deductions for closet cleaning and hot water, you stated you had arranged with the employers that no deductions should be made, but that the workers should pay at the end of the week?—No. What we did was this. We objected to them deducting the amount for closet cleaning, for instance, from the wages and we said that if they desired the work to be paid for the weavers should have the option of giving 1d. or 2d. as he liked, but that there should be no compulsion. A man goes round and collects it from the weavers. If they care to give him something, they do; and if they do not they do not.

6398. It is a kind of tip?—Yes. We think it should be done away with altogether. We think the employer should pay for that bit of labour as regards closet cleaning.

6399. With regard to hot water, you see no objection to payment being made?—That is so.

6400. You make a distinction between deductions from wages and payment being made to the employer?—Yes, for those outside things. They have nothing to do with work. They are really outside things altogether. The hot water is part of the workman's food preparation. If the employer did not provide it, he would have to go across to an old lady who keeps a big kettle on the fire, and pay her instead of the employer. When it was done in the mill, the employer gets so much better production, because there is no loss of time in going outside. That is the reason of it.

6401. We have had evidence that sometimes the charge for hot water is excessive?—Our uniform rate is 1d. a week, and you can have hot water twice a day. You can have a pint or a quart. There is nothing excessive about the charge so far as we are concerned.

6402. Supposing that it were considered right to bring these charges under regulation, you would see no objection to a regulation under which the employee made some payment?—We think it is a matter for arrangement between themselves and that the law should not interfere with it. I can go outside and get it if I want to. It is a matter for mutual arrangement entirely.

6403. We have had evidence that some employees are compelled to pay for hot water whether they have it or not?—That would not happen with us.

6404. You stated you had some cases of suspension at present?—Not in our trade. I know the system is in operation in certain iron works, but we have none in our trade that I know of. We may have an odd case, but they never come to us. I know now of young fellows, grown up men, who are silly enough to get over the line on Sunday night and do not turn up on Monday, or have left work and gone away to a football match, and the employer says, "Now you can stop away for the week end." The employee never comes to us in such a case, because it is his fault, and it is nothing we can interfere with. If a man left his work to go to a football match or anything like that, I should say it served him right, and he would have to face it himself.

Mr. D. J. Shackleton, M.P.

28 Nov. 1906.

6405. Are there any disciplinary fines besides those for unpunctuality?—No; that is practically the only fine we have. Some of them have put a notice up—they are very rare—that if the employees are not there at a certain time they will fine them 2d. Some of them have said that if they sweep while the machinery is in motion or clean while the machinery is in motion, they would fine the employees—no definite sum fixed, but they would be liable to a fine. That has been done.

6406. That is occasional?—Yes; there is no regular system.

6407. In regard to the unpunctuality fines, is there any system in the cotton trade, when a worker is late, of shutting him out till breakfast time?—Yes, in a few cases. It used to be so when I was in the mill, but I have not heard of it much lately. If you were five minutes late, you were fined, but if you were not in at just turned the five minutes, they would lock the door for a quarter of an hour, till, say, a quarter past six, and if you were not in them, they would lock the door till half past six. The manager or overseer would go at stated times to open the door, and as you passed through your number was taken. If it was the first time, they might overlook it—"What is the reason? You are not usually late." "I forgot to wind the alarm up," or "The knocker-up did not come in time." It is an exceptional case, and it would be overlooked in that case. If he is a chap who is guilty of it frequently, he has to stand the racket of it.

6408. I meant a worker coming late being shut out for a couple of hours till breakfast time, and being prevented from earning his wages for that period?—That is very rare in the cotton trade. I do not know of any case in our town. It is done in the iron trade, but not with us. It is too serious a loss for the employer to have his machinery stopped all that time. If he can have it going at half past six, he will do so.

6409. Would you say they got the best class of workers at those places which you mentioned where they do without fines altogether?—Yes. The two mills in our town, which I have in my mind, practically do the home trade only; they may have an occasional order which is not home trade, but as a rule it is home trade and they must have the best class of workers.

6410. Would you say they can do without fines because they have the best class of workers, or that they get the best class of workers because they do without fines?—I believe it is because the firm find it is effective.

6411. They want a high class of operatives?—They must have the highest class. Of course, they have to put up with the learners. They have the same difficulty as any other firm; they have to train them. When a weaver goes from a rough place, he has to be trained. They have to show patience and put up with their faults. We have what we call firsts and seconds. The firsts go through and you do not expect to have any deductions in Manchester for them, but with regard to the seconds, you tell the buyer they are seconds. They may increase their seconds while they are training new men or women up to the standard of that mill as against the one they left.

6412. With regard to fines on children and young persons, are the children sometimes paid, not by the occupier of the factory, but by the child's immediate superior?—Yes. They are what we call tenters. They come in at any time after twelve years of age; many of them run to nearly thirteen before they come in now. For the first twelve months, they are tenting and learning, and eventually, when they get to about fourteen or fifteen, they get two looms. Previous to that point, they are paid by the weaver, 2s. 6d., or 2s. 9d., or 3s., according to the quality of the mill they are working at.

Mr. D. J. Shackleton, M.P.
28 Nov. 1906.

6413. Have you ever heard of deductions being made from the children's wages by the weaver?—No; I have never heard of that. If there were, there would be a serious row between them and me.

By the Chairman.

6414. You have referred to your own town several times: that is Darwen?—Yes.

6415. There is one question which a member of the Committee wishes me to put to you, broadly: is there any feeling of injustice in the minds of the operatives with regard to the system of fines now in vogue?—Yes. The feeling of injustice amongst them arises from the fact, which I think I mentioned in one of my points, that an employer always has possession; he deducts the money and forces us to take legal action. We think that he has no more right to possession than anybody else, and if he has a damage, he has a legal process. It does not always follow that he will go to law. If he makes a claim it will have to be arranged between the weaver and his union, and if we cannot arrange it then he has to take legal process. But now, he always deducts the fine and forces us into court to recover. We think if he has a claim, if he is not satisfied with a discharge, he ought to take his legal remedy in the ordinary way.

6416. As matters stand, when an unjust charge is made, the burden of getting rid of it falls very heavily upon the operative?—Yes.

6417. As to the collections for hospitals, I understand they are not done by way of compulsion?—No.

6418. But by voluntary arrangement?—Yes.

6419. In the district to which you refer, are hospitals adequately supported?—Yes.

6420. By voluntary subscriptions?—Yes, once a quarter. In some districts it is more frequent. I think Burnley has it more frequently than once a quarter. It all depends on the area covered by the hospital. Our hospital is in Blackburn, so there is a big collection in Blackburn. If Blackburn were to find the whole of the subscriptions for that hospital, they might have to make them more frequently, but they can bring in Darwen to assist.

6421. There is one question upon which I am rather anxious to get your opinion. Of course, you represent here a large organisation, and evidently an organisation of highly-skilled labour; I want you to cast your mind on the position of the unorganised workers of the country. The evidence which you have given to us was in favour of the total abolition of fines and deductions; would that, in your opinion, be likely to benefit the unorganised workers also, those who have no effective voice or control with the employers, just as much as, if not more than, the organised ones?—I should think so, from this point of view. If they are less able to recover unfair fines, they are suffering more from the fining system, and an employer would hesitate to discharge when he would not hesitate to inflict a fine. Generally, I think the effect would be beneficial.

6422. If the law negatived the possibility of fining, you think that would be very helpful to unorganised labour?—I believe the total abolition of fining would put the unorganised labourers in a far better position than they are to-day, when they are unable to take definite action against excessive fines.

6423. I will point out to you that in the case of tests which your organisation has applied, those could only be undertaken where the organisation is a powerful one?—Yes.

6424. In the case of unorganised labour they must be content to suffer?—Exactly, and that is why I think the abolition would be more beneficial to them than it is to us. That is my view.

6425. That is what I was coming to. Now, another point: is it your opinion, looking to the case of unorganised labour, that whatever is done with regard to fines and deductions, ought if possible to be made applicable to cases of outworkers?—Oh yes.

6426 I suppose it is within the range of your information that some of the hardest cases in the country have arisen in connection with the poor outworkers?—Yes.

6427. And that up to now the law has denied them a remedy on account of technical defects in the Statute?—Yes.

6428. Although you are organised yourselves, I suppose your organisation would favour the extension of those legal remedies to the poor and helpless classes to whom I have referred?—Yes, I should favour that, because I believe the effect would be that the outworkers would then know definitely what they were going to earn. At present, their position really is that they never know what their week's wages will be until they have returned their work and have had it passed. The deductions which they have to suffer are very serious when you consider the amount of money they earn, and the uncertainty whether the work will be satisfactory or not.

6429. I thought it was only fair to put these points to you, although they are a little beyond your scope?—Thank you.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.

Tuesday, 4th December, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. WILLIAM BARNES was called; and Examined.

Mr. W. Barnes.
Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6430. Will you kindly tell us the Association which you represent?—The Northumberland and Durham Miners' Permanent Relief Fund.

6431. You have a note on your précis with regard to the Central Association for Dealing with Distress Caused by Mining Accidents: what do you say with regard to that?—That is an amalgamation of all the Permanent Relief Societies which are in existence. We have the Central Association, and we meet periodically. We have our annual conference every year. Our presence here to-day is the outcome of a meeting held on the 27th of last May, in London, and we unanimously protested against any alteration in the law relating to the Truck Act.

6432. Tell me first the membership of the Central Association?—I think it is about 330,000, and 313,000 were represented.

6433. What is the class of workers?—Principally miners and surface people.

6434. In England and Wales?—In England and Wales.

6435. By surface people, do you mean those engaged in colliery work?—Engaged in connection with the working of the collieries.

6436. The Central Association was formed in 1878?—Yes.

6437. I see from your précis that the societies have dealt with 1,090,995 disablement cases, and 12,209 fatal accidents, bringing upon the fund 8,399 widows and 15,491 children?—Yes.

6438. Is the magnitude of the operations of the societies in reality much greater than is indicated by those figures ?—Certainly. These are the figures of all the societies combined.

6439. Because some of the institutions had begun their work prior to 1878 ?—Yes. The society which I represent commenced in 1862. We were the first society.

6440. At the close of the year 1905, the societies jointly had on their funds 3,659 widows and 3,504 children, together with approximately 3,000 permanently disabled members ?—Yes.

6441. And during the same year, 1905, the societies had dealt with 52,902 new accident cases ?—Yes.

6442. Was that in the one year ?—Yes.

6443. At the same date, the great Northumberland and Durham Society had on the funds of the Superannuation Department no fewer than 4,591 aged men in receipt of old age allowances ?—That is so.

6444. Now we come to your position with regard to the Truck Acts. Your Association, of course, may be classed along with hospitals under the category of charitable organisations ?—Yes.

6446. Who were the actual collectors of the money ?—The people appointed—the secretary and treasurer and committees of various branches. That continued at a slow rate of progress for many years, until we got an arrangement between the society and the owners, by which it was agreed that they would assist the society in their endeavours to try to get the men to contribute to the fund, and that, with that in view, they would allow their overman or cashier to deduct the money from the men at the colliery. As soon as that came into operation, the society went up by leaps and bounds in membership.

6447. Did the idea of that originate with the men ?—Yes.

6448. And then the owners agreed ?—Yes.

6449. About what year was it that occurred ?—Somewhere about 1878.

6450. Since that, has that system been continuously in operation ?—At that time it was not fully equipped, but it followed on till between 1880 and 1890 it was fully accomplished. At all places where the men worked they paid to the fund.

6451. I want to get some details about that from you. When a man in Northumberland and Durham under this system goes and asks for work, is the footing upon which he receives work that he must become a contributor to your fund ?—No.

6452. Is he left free to become a contributor or not ?—Yes. He commences work, and he goes on working, and when his pay comes round the money for the fund is deducted from him. If he is satisfied, that goes on ; if he is dissatisfied his money is returned.

6453. How does he intimate his dissatisfaction ?—By asking for his contribution to be returned.

6454. Have you known any such cases ?—Just one or two. It is a very rare thing.

6455. Let me put the ordinary case I was figuring, of a man out of employment going to a colliery and asking to be employed as a miner ; when he is taken on, is anything said to him as to his being expected to contribute to this Permanent Relief Fund ?—No ; there is no condition whatever.

6456. Are there any notices posted up at the pit head, or anywhere about the mine with regard to it ?—No.

6457. You remember the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act ?—Yes.

6458. There was anxiety at that time as to what might be the fate of the societies ?—Yes.

6459. How did that anxiety arise ?—There was the fear that the provision made by the Act for compensation might have a damaging effect upon the permanent relief funds, and an attempt was made at an amalgamation so as to let the permanent relief funds pay the compensation, but no arrangement was come to and the things have gone on from that time as separate and distinct funds. We, as permanent relief societies, take no notice whatever of the compensation provided for by the Act.

6460. So that the working institution which you represent to-day has gone on ?—Yes, and gone on very rapidly, because it has shewn a great increase of members. Even since 1897 we have shewn a large increase of membership.

6461. What is the system adopted for the collection of these contributions ?—The system is this. They pay fortnightly, and in some cases weekly. When the pay comes round these deductions take place from the workman's note shewing that so-and-so has been deducted from his pay. Then at each colliery we have a secretary, treasurer and chairman, and four committee men ; if there are a dozen members we have six committee men, who are elected annually. They make out the quarterly balance sheet, and when the treasurer goes to the office, he has this book. (Handing same to the Chairman.)

6462. The treasurer goes with this book ?—To the cashier at the colliery. Then the cashier turns the money over to the treasurer and he signs a paper to say he has received so much.

6463. I see this book is headed, " An Account of the Total Amount of Contributions kept off by the Cashier or other Person at the Pit Office at So-and-so Colliery " ?—That is so.

6464. So the representatives of the workmen get a full statement from the colliery owner of everything which has been taken and each workman is named ?—Yes.

6465. In that way, your officials and committee are able to check the entire body of transactions ?—Yes. This is the balance sheet. (Handing same to the Chairman.) That confirms that little book each quarter to shew the contributions which were given. That book represents an entire colliery, with 2,600 members.

6466. Substantially may I take it that it comes to this, that for purposes of mutual convenience the employers act as the agents of the men in the collection of those sums from the wages, and as such agents, they give an account to the society ?—Yes.

6467. And making the payment to the society in this way from their wages, the workmen are relieved of the necessity of individual collection ?—Yes.

6468. Then they administer their funds by taking into account the gross receipts published to them by the colliery. Does that accurately describe your way of working ?—Yes.

6469. Coupled with that, may I put it that no workman is a compulsory member ?—That is so. In the first place, as I have already described, the money is kept off men in good faith. If they wish to have their money returned, it is returned. But, as I say, there have only been a few cases ; in our great society of 160,000 members, I do not recollect more than half a dozen in the last three or four years.

6470. I gather from your evidence that the associations between workmen and employers with regard to this matter have been of the most friendly description ?—Very friendly.

6471. As to the management of the moneys so ingathered, that of course is a matter entirely for the workmen themselves, acting through their officials and committee ?—Entirely.

6472. I must put this to you, in order to have it clearly before the mind of the Committee. Suppose you found a body of men at a colliery who declined to join the society, would they be as well received by the employers, do you think ?—Oh yes ; there is nothing of that in any way ; in fact, of late we have never had anything of that sort. We have men in now at the present time, principally underground, but also surface men, who do not care to join the society, and they are left alone. There may be a dozen men working in a place and there may be two out. There is no notice whatever taken of them in any way.

4 Dec. 1906.

6473. I think you said that by collecting the money in this way your membership had largely increased?—Oh yes.

6474. And of course the expense of collection has been reduced to nothing?—Oh no, not the expense of collection. According to our Rules we pay 1s. 2d. in the £ for the collection of this money.

6475. To the employers as your agents?—We pay to the cashier 6d. in the £ for these deductions, and we pay 8d. in the £ to the secretary and treasurer, between them. Then we pay the Committee small sums for attending the meetings. When the money was collected outside, it was a terrible expense.

6476. I want to get at the comparative statement?—It used to be very costly because we used to have meetings at several places, whereas, as you will see by that balance sheet, we can hold one meeting of 2,600 members. It really meant that prior to that arrangement we would have had to have had four or five different places for collecting, and that all meant extra expense.

6477. You have not mentioned the sums which are contributed. Do they bear a proportion to the wages earned?—A full member pays 5d. a week. For that, he is entitled to benefit from accident, non-fatal or fatal, and a contribution of 2½d. out of that 5d. goes to the Old Age Department. When a man attains the age of sixty and is permanently unfit to work he can have 5s. a week out of the contributions given to the Superannuation Department, which is a separate and distinct department.

6478. The other 2½d. goes to the Accident Fund?—Yes, Accident, Widows and Children.

6479. Is that 5d. a week irrespective of the amount earned by the workman?—Yes.

6480–81. It is a stated figure?—Yes; I may say it is an agreed figure. Up to 1903, it was only 4d. a week. Then we had a rise of 1d. in the week, which made it 5d. by consent of the workmen.

6482. Is this association under the Friendly Societies Act?—Yes.

6483. And its rules are approved by the department?—Yes.

6484. The statistics of its finance have to be submitted to the department?—Yes, every five years. We submit them annually, and we get the five years according to the Friendly Societies' Act.

6485. I see you draw a distinction here between a permanent relief society and other societies; you say the miner occupies an exceptional position?—Yes.

6486. Your view appears to be expressed thus: "The miner's contribution to his ordinary sick club may be collected at leisure, but in the case of his permanent relief society the case is different; the pitman frequently changes his place of employment, and consequently, it is of vital importance to him and his wife and family" that he should be a contributor, whatever part of the country he happens to be employed in?—Yes.

6487. Have the Associations which you represent so covered the ground that if a man leaves one district for another he still retains his connection with the Association undisturbed?—Yes; that is as far as our Society is concerned.

6488. The Northumberland and Durham Society?—Yes. If the members of our society, working in collieries in our area, go from one colliery to another, they continue their membership undisturbed.

6489. Now come to the case where a man leaves Northumberland and Durham and goes to Scotland; what do you do in that case?—He can continue his membership by sending his money to the general office. If he did not do that, as soon as he allowed a certain time to elapse, he would dis-member himself.

6490. Supposing a man had been a member for ten years, without making any claim on the fund, and then for family reasons, removed beyond the range of your society's operations, would any allowance be made to him for his ten years contribution?—He has the opportunity of retaining his membership. If he goes against the rules, he loses by it, but he has the chance of continuing. Once he is a member he can continue and go where he will in Great Britain.

6491. The forfeiture occurs if he breaks the rule by not contributing?—Yes.

6492. And that forfeiture is a matter of contract originally?—Yes. We have people in Scotland and different parts who have been on our side, and who wish to continue, from whom we receive contributions regularly every month.

6493. You said, "if in Great Britain": suppose he goes to Canada?—His membership would be considered forfeited.

6494. Forfeiture is incurred in that case?—Yes. We allow visits. Anybody can go on a visit, by making a condition with the committee.

6495. I think you say that the opinion of the men seems to be unanimous in favour of the system?—Practically unanimous.

6496. Do you find that immediately on entering the works they claim the benefit of becoming members?—They all become members as soon as they start work.

6497. I suppose that arises from the consciousness that their life is surrounded with peril?—Yes.

6498. In your opinion is it important that these facilities for becoming a member of such a Society, which are afforded by the present practice, should not be interfered with by law?—That is our idea. We think it would be very detrimental.

6499. You think it would result in much suffering?—It would revert us back to the old system, when the older men suffered so much to get a society constituted.

6500. If this system is stopped, your opinion is that a large amount of the beneficent work of the permanent relief societies will disappear?—Yes, it is our idea that it will. We are safer in keeping our members by deductions than we are without them.

6501. Have you any doubt that if the law forbad these deductions from wages the membership of the societies would go down?—Well, we would not be so assured of the membership if we had to revert back to the old system, because we have proved that it was not so good as the system we now have.

6502. And the expense of financing and collecting?—Would be decidedly more.

6504. The money would have to be collected in sums of 5d. each?—Yes.

6505. What would be the cost of collection?—We should very likely have to arrange a certain system. We used to pay about 1s. 4d. in the £ to collect money from door to door.

6506. At present you pay 1s. 2d.?—Yes.

6507. There is very little difference?—But these people who have the 8d. in the £ are considered to be very well paid, while the others would be very badly paid. I know the people who get it in the present way would not like to revert to the method of getting it by collecting it.

6508. I suppose your views are also authoritatively expressed in this letter which is addressed to the Committee from Tower Buildings, Wigan?—That was the statement sent to the Tower Buildings.

6509. We need not print the statement because we have been able to get it by word of mouth from you, but you will permit us to print the table which is appended to it if we think it advisable?—Quite so. There is one thing I should like to mention, which you did not put to me. We are called the Northumberland and Durham Miners' Permanent Relief Fund, but since the inauguration of those two counties, we have taken over Cleveland and Cumberland. It is only fair for you to know that.

6510. The membership is very small comparatively?—Yes. We have more from one colliery than we have from all Cumberland. We have in Cleveland 7,075; in Cumberland 2,687; in Northumberland, 37,657, and in Durham, 112,495, making a total of 159,914. These societies, West Cumberland and Cleveland, have been with us a good number of years now.

6511. And for all purposes of management, we may consider them active branches of the Northumberland and Durham Society ?—Yes.

6513. Do the employers contribute to those funds, or is it from beginning to end a workman's association, the total contributions being given by the workmen, and the employers only interfering in that beneficial way you described, by acting as the convenient agents in the collection ?—Yes. We do not receive one penny from the employers now and have not done since the passing of the Workman's Compensation Act. It is entirely workmen's cont ibutions. At the commencement of the fund the employers paid 20 per cent. on the members' contributions.

6514. Substantially, this matter, although it assumes the form of deduction from wages, is an arranged matter of business between the workmen and the employers ?—Yes, and very much to the advantage of the workmen.

6515. I understand you are emphatically opposed to the law permitting that kind of business being interfered with ?—The Central Association is, yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

6516. You say the employers allow their cashiers to deduct the money, and the cashier receives 6d. in the £ ?—Yes.

6517. That is 2½ per cent ?—Yes.

6518. Then you mentioned some other payments which were made. As I take it, that is the sole cost of your collection, 2½ per cent. on the fund ?—Oh no. There is 1s. 2d. in the £ paid. 6d. is what the cashier or overman, or whoever takes the money, gets. There is other 8d. paid to the secretary and treasurer of each branch.

6519. That is the point I wish to elucidate. Is that all in connection with collection or is it in connection with the administration of the fund ?—It is in connection with the administration of the fund—the money got at the office.

6520. It is not part of the collecting at all; the collecting is done by the cashier in the different works and then the money collected is handed on to these officials of your society who get 8d. in the £. ?—That is for doing the duty of secretary and transacting the business—paying the recipients and doing all the business in connection with the branch.

By the Chairman.

6521. The general management ?—The local management.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

6522. The point I wish to get at is this: the sole cost of the actual collection of the money is only 2½ per cent. on the fund—6d. in the £ ?—For the collecting at the colliery ?

6523. For the collecting ?—Yes.

6524. And the money is handed to the Treasurer ?—Yes.

6525. In bulk ?—Yes.

6526. And therefore there is no further cost with regard to collection ?—No.

6527. What do you think would be the cost of collection if it were done, not in this way, but in the old way—from house to house—or in any other way you like?—I could not say, but it would be double what we pay now.

6528. You think it would be at least double ?—Yes. I know this; there are people who go round collecting who are allowed 7½ per cent. for the work. That is with regard to other matters which I know of, where collection is made, where they have not an opportunity of making the collection at the collieries. We could not get it done for less than 5 per cent., I think, if it had to be collected.

6529. You think it could be done for 5 per cent. ? You say other societies pay 7½ per cent ?—I have known matters of this sort where they have had to pay that. There is no doubt the percentage would vary a good deal. It must cost a great deal more to collect from door to door.

6530. I want to get your idea of the extra cost; do you think it would cost 5 per cent. more ?—We never got a good idea of what the collection would cost, because I know very well that at the beginning men did the work of collection more as a matter of trying to get the society established; the society being in low water they did it at very low cost. They were not paid at that time, even for the work done.

6531. I am only asking for your opinion. What do you think it would cost ? It now costs 6d. in the £ to collect your fund; can you tell me what you think it would cost if collected in the old way ?—I have an idea that it would cost double, or more.

6532. That mean it would cost 2½ per cent. more to collect in any other way than that which is now adopted ?—Yes. There is another point too, that we have more assurance of collecting the money by our present method than by the old method.

6533. And there is no chance of the collector going away with the money There is no chance of bad debts by the present method, if I may put it so ?—Oh, yes, there is, if a man gets the money and goes away with it.

6534. But if the money is handed by the employer's cashier to the society, as far as the collection of it goes, it is absolutely safe ?—It is safe till it gets into the treasurer's hands.

6535. If you had to employ collectors, you would have to have them insured, or else you might lose money sometimes, as we know is the case ?—We have them at the present time under a bond.

6536. But you have no collectors now ?—No, but we have those men who are responsible for the money—our treasurers—under a bond now, according to the amount of money which passes through their hands.

6537. What is the total amount of the funds collected ? About £150,000 last year.

6538. Which costs £3,750 a year by the present system to collect ?—Yes.

6539. So that if I am right in my calculation, the present system saves your association £3,750 a year and besides that, you have no risk of bad debts, and therefore the cost of insuring the collectors is practically done away with ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

6540. I understood you that these societies met in May last ?—That is so.

6541. And entered what was practically a unanimous protest against interference with the Truck Act ?—Yes—I want to be clear upon that—that is, so far as the Permanent relief fund is concerned. We did not consider anything else. The Central Association only deals with permanent relief funds.

6542. So that you do not carry it quite so far as your first statement on your précis might lead one to suppose: you did not enter a unanimous protest against interference with the Truck Act altogether ?—Decidedly not. All we want is the law to be left entirely as it is so far as permanent relief societies are concerned.

6543. So far as concerns deductions from wages in respect of contributions to permanent relief societies ?—Yes.

6544. With that proviso, your first statement stands ?—Yes. We do not complain about anything except what we are interested in, namely the permanent relief societies.

6545. You have spoken of collecting at the pit heads ?—Yes.

6546. And at the homes of the people ?—Yes, and meeting the men when they come out of the pit, at the colliery office, and so on.

4 Dec. 1906

6547. And other various ways in which you could most effectively catch your hare, so to speak ?—Yes.

6548. Were the results very satisfactory under those circumstances ?—They were not.

6549. You started in 1862 ?—Yes.

6550. Up to 1868, which is a period of seven years, you obtained under those circumstances a membership of 12,500 ?—Yes.

6551. At the rate of 1,750 new members in a year, roughly speaking ?—Yes.

6552. Giving an average of thirty new members per week ?—Yes.

6553. You have, of course, enormous mining counties in Northumberland and Durham ?—Yes.

6554. With very large mining populations ?—Yes.

6555. Did that seem to imply that the people were very anxious to join the societies ?—Very anxious after they were fairly set on foot.

6556. Of course the canvass would be a continuous one ?—At first it was a continuous canvass.

6557. That was successful to the extent of thirty new members a week out of probably 120,000 miners ?—Certainly ; they kept coming on and coming on. I might say we got the greatest success when we got the arrangement with the owners with regard to the deductions.

6558. When you got the employers to make the deductions the figures went up by leaps and bounds ; in three years, from 1870 to 1873, you leaped up from 16,500 to 27,000 ?—Yes.

6559. And from 1873 to 1875 you leaped up very similarly—from 27,000 to 44,000 ?—Yes.

6560. Was the assistance of the employers entirely disinterested ?—They were disinterested in the assistance they gave to us. We got an arrangement with them to allow their cashiers to deduct the money. By that system, we got a good deal larger membership than we probably would have got in any other way.

6561. So that really from 1869 to 1875 the system was completely changed—from a system which had been one of voluntary contributions to one of passive deduction. Is that the case ?—It came like this. It still followed the voluntary principle but by a different method. The overmen were told, " Keep the money off the men, and if they demur, give them their money back." By that system a good many people came on the fund who did not care very much about it before, who did not care to object to being members. There was nothing to object to. They could have objected, and said they would not be members, but they did not do that.

6562. I suppose you know the work of the great friendly societies of the country ?—Yes. I know most about our own.

6563. You have been acquainted with large bodies of men ?—Yes.

6564. And the chances are you know a good deal, at least of the old friendly societies of the country, such as the Manchester Odd-Fellows, and many others ?—Yes.

6565. Do you think you have any superior claim as compared with societies such as those ? You are probably aware that those depend upon the voluntary payment of the members ?—That is quite true.

6566. That there is no system whereby they can deduct from the wages of the people the payments supposed to be requisite for such societies. There is no method whereby they can deduct the contributions from wages ?—I quite understand there is not.

6567. Therefore I put it to you, do you consider that you yourselves have any superior claim as compared with the great friendly societies of the country ?—My answer to that would be this. Our people are all in one class. The members of the other societies are a mixed class. That is why their collecting will be more successful than it would be with us. While all our people are together, and all in a combine, we feel that we have a sort of superior claim.

6568. Whom do you mean by " we " ?—I mean the people who are members of friendly societies are of various classes, all classes, whereas our men are all one class, miners.

6569. Do you think that that constitutes a special and superior claim ?—I would not like to say that it constitutes a superior claim. We seem to know our own class best. If the friendly societies such as you mentioned had the same system as we have, it might not be beneficial to them. Their method would be more costly to us, as you will be aware.

6570. Do you think that because your men are all of one class, that constitutes an argument why there should be deductions made from their wages towards the fund instead of the fund being dependent upon voluntary contributions ?—Our men are all together, and it is a great convenience.

6571. Do you think that constitutes a reason why the payment, instead of being a voluntary contribution, should be in the form of deductions from wages ?—It constitutes our reason. You must know that the friendly societies' method would be a very costly matter.

6572. We shall come to the cost later, or rather the Chairman has gone into that and I do not know that it is necessary for me to do so. Do you think that because a deduction has been made from wages, and because a specific and open complaint has not been made of that, that that is equivalent to the contributions being voluntarily made ?—I do.

6573. Because the men have not grumbled, you think it is voluntary ?—Yes ; if a man does grumble, he can get his money back.

6574. Therefore you think it is perfectly right that the deduction should be made, because he has an opportunity of grumbling afterwards and does not do so ?—I think it is perfectly right for a combination of men to allow their money to be deducted, with the option of saying that they will pay or will not pay.

6575. You have spoken of the origin of the fund ; you say, " It was considered that something should be done to relieve the distress caused by mining accidents, not only where more than one life was lost, but in every individual fatal accident " ?—Yes.

6576. That was the origin ?—Yes.

6577. Suppose those circumstances had not existed, would there have been any need for the fund ?—But they did exist.

6578. Supposing they had not existed, can you imagine any need for the fund ?—Yes, there is need for the fund. The provision is really needed.

6579. Suppose that the law of the land had in the meantime stepped in and done away with these causes, which amount to the origin of these things, would you not think that the primary cause of the existence of the societies would also be removed ?—It would have been a very serious matter for the people.

6580. Do you think the primary cause of the existence of the societies would be removed if the law stepped in and did away with the reasons for which the societies were started ?—The law should never be allowed to attempt to stop anybody from making progress.

6581. Let me put it in this way. Every fatal accident, at least in mining, is now met by the law of the land ?—Yes.

6582. Every individual case of disablement is met by the law of the land, with the exception of cases where there has been serious and wilful misconduct on the part of the workmen, which are very few indeed ?—Yes.

6583. Every single case of disablement is met by the law of the land ?—Yes.

6584. Do you consider that the special cause which brought these societies into existence has now been overridden by the law of the land ?—We were in advance of the law of the land at the time we commenced.

6585. Do you consider that the special cause which brought these societies into existence has been done away with by the law of the land ?—I think not.

6586. Will you tell us what special causes still exist ?—There is a good deal of special cause. There are a number of accidents which the Workmen's Compensation Act does not provide for. There are numerous accidents which we pay for under our rules which are not subjects for compensation.

6587. Will you tell us what special kind of accidents those are?—If a man happens to get his hand hurt, or a part of his body, we pay. They are cases we pay for according to our rules. Then whatever the misconduct may be, if it is brought in as an accident, we pay. There is nothing which occurs down the pit in the way of accident that we do not pay for, from the date of the accident, whether wilful or not.

6588. You think that in order to provide for those comparatively few occurrences it is necessary to make deductions from 150,000 members?—We have done that all along. Why should they not be allowed to make provision, even though there be compensation according to the law of the land? Whatever they may get from the compensation, is that sufficient to maintain a man? There cannot be anything wrong in a man providing something more, even supposing he gets 10s. a week from the compensation; there cannot be anything wrong in his getting 10s. from other sources.

6589. I am only referring to the statement you have submitted to us as to the reason for the founding of this fund. You say, "It was considered that something should be done to relieve the distress caused by mining accidents, not only where more than one life was lost, but in every individual fatal accident." I am asking you, assuming that to be the real intention of these societies, if that reason has not broadly been removed?—Certainly, it has been removed somewhat, but there were over 200 lives lost in a shaft accident at Hartley Colliery.

6590. That was forty-four years ago?—Yes. Not one of those were provided for in any way. There was no State provision for those people. The people themselves, by their voluntary subscriptions, led the way for anything that might happen in the future. Small accidents, where only a few people were injured, took place, and then in 1880 we had an explosion at Seaham Colliery, where 164 lives were lost. Out of those, 160 were members of our fund.

6591. Supposing the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 had been in existence at that time, and the State in its wisdom had seen the necessity for providing for that condition of things, would there have been any need for these relief societies?—You put to me that which has just come up to date?

6592. Yes. I wish to put this to you. You are laying before this Committee (very properly, of course, from your point of view) that a necessity still exists for continuing this condition of things, the main cause for which has been already removed by the law. Do you still submit that the condition of things which came into existence forty-four years ago should be continued, whatever may be the state of the law?—I do under the present circumstances, for the very reason that it gives the people a chance of making provision, a chance of exercising thrift.

6593. You speak here, I understand, not only on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham Societies, but on behalf of the other societies attached to the Central Association?—I speak for the Northumberland and Durham Society. If there is any question of a society outside our own, I should rather that those people who know more about it should answer those questions.

6594. Is there anybody here that can speak upon that?—I can answer any general question on that.

6595. Can you speak for Lancashire?—Yes, on that general point.

6596. On the general statement here you can speak for Lancashire?—Yes.

6597. I see the acting secretary for Lancashire, Mr. David Shaw, is mentioned here in the list of names?—Yes.

6598. You say here in the general statement, "Practically all of the members are enabled to continue their membership by means of the convenient, inexpensive and efficient method of the deduction of their contributions through the colliery office"?—Yes.

6599. That would imply that they are desirous of continuing it?—Yes.

6600. Now I want you to take your memory back to the Employers' Liability Act, 1880: do you remember anything of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Relief Society before that year?—I cannot say I can.

6601. Are you aware that the employers in Lancashire and Cheshire forced the men to contract out of that Act and to enter this society, as a condition of employment?—I am not aware of it.

6602. To that extent you cannot answer for Lancashire?—No. There is a gentleman here who may be able to do so.

6603. You may take it from me that the condition of the employment that the workmen must contract out of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act and become members of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society prevailed very largely. Do you think that is a method whereby voluntary contributions are made?—That is a matter that I would hardly care to go into. It is a matter I do not know of. From our own society, I could have said something on that matter.

6604. You are not in a position to speak for Lancashire?—No; I would not like to do that.

6605. Did the Northumberland and Durham colliers contract out of the Act of 1880?—No, they did not. In Cheshire there were a lot of owners who paid 20 per cent. contribution up to that time, who ceased paying it.

6606. So far as the Act was concerned, for good or for evil, it was open to the men?—There was no contracting out. I know that well, because I was in the mine at the time.

6607. Is there any means of gauging the solvency of these societies represented in this memorandum?—Every five years—we are in the last year now—we have an actuary to go through the accounts, under the Friendly Societies Act. That gives us an idea of our solvency. They give it in this way—how the society should stand, and how much money it should have to meet its liabilities. But we are a going concern, and all the societies are going concerns. They will say to us at the end of the year, "You are not solvent; you need so much to make you solvent." I know very well we need a good deal of money to make us solvent. We have £371,000 in our fund now, but we have a terrible liability. We have the liability of pensions for the aged.

6608. What did they actually say with regard to the solvency of your own society?—The last time the actuary went through our accounts he advised us to make an alteration, and the alteration was to put on ½d. per week, and to give no increased benefit. We went to our members with two propositions: one, to increase the contributions ½d. per week and to give no increased benefits, and second, to increase the contributions by 1d. per week, and, to give another 1s. per week to the old men. We used to give them 4s. per week prior to that. That more than met the liability for the time being; that is, it was more than we really needed to meet the liability. From that time we have saved from £25,000 to £30,000 a year. But there is a liability to meet that, because we are getting on at the rate of over 800 old men per annum. The last three years have averaged 810 men a year at 5s. a week whom we have had to provide for.

6609. You have put 1d. a week upon the contributions?—Yes.

6610. And have given 1s. a week extra to men over sixty years of age?—Yes.

6611. So that in-coming members are paying increased contributions because of the accrued liabilities of the past?—If they live long enough they will benefit by it.

6612. What does the actuary say with regard to your solvency? Does he say your society is solvent or invent, and if insolvent, to what extent?—He pointed out at the end of the last five years that we were about £29,000 to the bad. The increased contributions, as I have already told you, should in time work out, and we should become a solvent society. But we are a going concern.

6613. There are a good many going concerns. Do you know anything of the condition of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society?—We meet very often on these matters, but I could not answer questions closely connected with that society.

6614. I do not wish to press you any further?—If I could answer you I would, but it is no use my making a statement when I do not know anything about it Anything in connection with our own society I am willing to give.

4 Dec. 1906.

By Mr. Maddison.

6615. What is the attitude of the Northumberland Miners' Union and the Durham Miners' Union toward permanent relief?—Very friendly.

6616. Are you a member of either of those bodies?—I am a member of the Durham Miners' Union, and have been ever since it was commenced.

6617. Would you say that the attitude of the Durham Miners' Union and of the Northumberland Miners' Union is expressed by your own statement here about permanent relief societies?—All the leading men have been on our committee and have worked with us—from Northumberland, Mr. Fenwick and Mr. Burt; and from Durham, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Taylor. Mr. Wilson is one of our present trustees.

6618. Your answer to my question is that the Durham and Northumberland Miners' Unions are in sympathy with, and support, the miners' relief societies?—Certainly.

6619. What is the attitude of the unions in other counties? I do not want Northumberland and Durham now. Take Lancashire and Yorkshire, or Cheshire, or Somersetshire. A general answer will do for me?—I would not care to give evidence as to the unions in those counties. These gentlemen present may be able to answer that 6620. It is a general question?—Anything in connection with permanent relief societies I can readily answer, but you ask a question with regard to the trades unions?

6621. You have given a very clear straightforward answer as to the attitude of the Durham and Northumberland Miners' Unions towards permanent relief. Now, I put the same question about the unions in other counties. What is your answer?—I would not care to answer it, because they may vary from the attitude of Durham and Northumberland.

6622. Do you think they do?—I do not think so; I cannot say they do.

6623. In a general way, would you think the miners' unions throughout the country are in favour of permanent relief societies?—Yes.

6624. That is to say, of deductions being made for permanent relief societies?—Yes. We have half of the membership of the unions in the permanent relief societies.

6625. You have made it quite plain that in Durham and Northumberland these relief societies are governed entirely by the men?—Yes.

6626. Is that true of the other counties?—I would not like to say exactly. They have different systems.

6627. You cannot give any general answer, even on behalf of the Central Association?—Only what is here. As far as that is concerned, I quite expect the unions are very forcible with regard to permanent relief funds?

6628. I was not talking of the unions; I was asking you whether in the other counties, outside Durham and Northumberland, these relief societies are governed by the men in the same way as they are in your counties?—Pretty much in that way, but they have more mixture with the owners.

6629. You mean the owners have more control?—Yes; there may be a mixture between the two, which I gather there is in some places.

6630. But you cannot really answer the question with regard to other counties?—No.

6631. Supposing in any county the contribution to the permanent relief societies was a condition of employment, would you still defend deductions?—I would not like to say that. That would be a different matter altogether. I would say at once it had no right to be a condition of employment. We never admitted that.

6632. If it were made a condition of employment, you would support its being made illegal?—Certainly.

6633. You told us that men can continue their subscriptions if living anywhere within the United Kingdom? Yes.

6634. Does that mean whatever occupation they may be following?—With the exception of that of a soldier or sailor. If they meet with an accident outside those occupations we pay. They can continue their membership unless they become a soldier or sailor, and get the same benefit as they would if they remained in the mine.

6635. For any accident in any calling except that of a soldier or sailor, they would receive the benefit?—Yes.

6636. There are a few men who do not contribute to the fund, even in your county?—Yes, surface men.

6637. Just a handful. Supposing anything happened to them, their families would not get any benefit?—No.

6638. Supposing it was a big explosion?—We have had one lately. There has been money collected from the trade, and they would receive that, but they would not receive directly from our fund.

6639. Mr Walsh has put to you some questions in order to see whether the permanent relief societies are really popular with the men, or whether these deductions, in an indirect way, mean compulsion. Your answer, I understand, is that the men are really genuinely in favour of joining those societies?—We never hear any dissatisfaction whatever.

6640. You were asked a question with regard to the effect of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and you declined—I do not think unnaturally—to state what would have happened if matters had been different. But what do you say in view of an enlarged Compensation Act which will, I understand, include beat hand?

6641. That is one of the things which is being considered

By Mr. Maddison.

6642. The case you gave does not come under it, but in view of an enlarged Compensation Act, certainly covering a larger area of accidents, are you still of opinion that these relief societies are desirable?—Yes.

6643. Your reason for that is that you think the men do need an addition even to the most liberal law of compensation?—I do.

6644. Have you any other reason?—Yes. Here is a man working for, say, 30s., 35s., or £2 a week, who falls off work, he has compensation given to him from 12s. to 15s. a week. He may have a family, and that is not sufficient to maintain it.

6645. He can well do with an addition, and you think it worth while for him to pay for the addition?—Yes.

6646. And that is the view of the men?—Yes.

6647. With respect to the superior claim, in a sense, which you put forward, for your own society as against friendly societies, in connection with having the collection made by the cashier at the office, do you put that on the ground that as the fund is entirely confined to employees, you have some kind of claim upon the machinery of the office?—Yes.

6648. Have you any other reason but that?—We get the work done at half cost.

6650. You would raise no objection?—Not at all if they could agree. They would be welcome.

6651. With regard to cost, Sir Frederick Cawley worked it out that a saving of 2½ per cent. on the cost of collection amounted to £3,750; can you tell me what is the total cost which is taken from this £150,000 per annum?—About 10 per cent. or 12 per cent.

6652. Can you give me the figures?—They are not worked out in this statement.

6653. But clearly you do save by using the machinery of the office?—Yes.

6654. You have told us the actuary put you some £29,000 to the bad from the purely solvent point of view?—Yes.

6655. How does that compare with other friendly societies?—There are not many of them very much nearer than we are.

6656. Is it a fact that there is not a friendly society among the large societies which is actuarially solvent?—Yes; we hear they are all insolvent.

6657. From an actuarial point of view ?—Yes.

6658. It was not the opinion of your committee, after carefully considering the actuary's report, that you were more insolvent than the average, well-to-do friendly society ?—That is so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

6659. I think you said that in Northumberland and Durham practically every man employed in the mines was a member of your relief fund ?—Underground, yes.

6660. The total membership of all the amalgamated societies is a little over 300,000 ?—Yes.

6661. That is rather less than half of the total number of men employed in mines in the country ?—Yes; it will be decidedly less than the number employed. In Scotland there is no society at all.

6662. I was coming to that. The difference is partly explained by the fact that in some mining districts there is no relief fund at all ?—Yes.

6663. It is also partly explained by the fact that in some of the districts the relief fund is very much less popular than it is in Northumberland and Durham ?—That may be so.

6664. Can you give me a reason why the relief fund is more popular in Northumberland and Durham than in other districts ?—It was the first society. There was not any other society for many years after it commenced. It being the first society, and the other societies having grown from it, it is very popular; they seem to like it very well. As they knew it was the first established fund, it has been very popular ever since I knew it.

6665. Has any moral or social pressure been exercised by the miners on new comers ?—No. It has become so general now, that everybody expects they will be in the fund, and there is no call to bring any pressure to bear upon them.

6666. A man is not looked upon as a black sheep if he does not join the fund ?—No. It has never come under my observation that anybody has been victimised for not being a member of the fund. The cases where a man has not been a member have been very rare.

6667. I notice in this document which has been put before us a statement is made that members under fourteen years of age pay a certain amount, and members above fourteen years of age pay double that amount ?—From fourteen to sixteen they must be half members.

6668. Does a boy become a member at once when he goes into the pit ?—Yes.

6669. And he continues to be a member all through ?—Yes. He commences as a half member, but as such he must not go beyond eighteen years of age. When he attains the age of sixteen, if he chooses he can become a full member. If he does not become a full member then, he must become one at eighteen; that is, he can no longer be a half member. His contributions are doubled and his benefits are doubled.

6670–72. By that time, a boy has a certain interest in the fund ?—Yes.

6673. Has he any choice when he first goes to the pit ? Is he, practically speaking, a free agent ?—He is a free agent inasmuch as the money will be deducted from the first pay he gets, but if he chooses he can stop its being deducted.

6674. Is the boy really a free agent with regard to becoming a member of your society when he comes into the pit at thirteen years of age ?—Yes; his father is a member, and sees that his son becomes a member.

6675. That is my point—he practically is not a free agent; he becomes a member as part of an existing system ?—The father could object to his son being a member, but he knows he is a member; he knows he has that money deducted from him.

6676. I see there is no difference made in the amount of contribution paid by married and unmarried men ?—No.

6677. Everybody pays exactly the same amount ?—Over eighteen years of age they do, yes.

6678. Is that the case in all the miners' relief funds ?—Yes.

6679. Notwithstanding the fact that the benefits to married men are very much greater than they are to unmarried men ?—Quite true.

6680. Has any complaint been made ?—At death an unmarried man would receive £23 legacy; a married man would only receive £5 legacy.

By the Chairman.

6681. Whatever may be necessary with regard to the finances of your society, whether the contributions must be made greater or smaller, on the subject which is remitted to this Committee, namely, deductions from wages, I fancy your opinion and that of your colleagues would remain the same—you would approve of the management of its finances being left to the men themselves, and you would say that the present method of collection is a convenience of which you would not like the law to deprive you ?—That is our point—the point of the Central Association—that the law should not be disturbed.

6682. It does not matter to you, I suppose, in connection with this matter, that this society may have sprung up at a time when there was no legislative provision such as there is now, but, at all events, you see no prospect of its dying down in consequence of such provision now being made ?—No; it has gone on continually increasing year by year. We have gone on increasing at an average of 5,000 a year.

6683. With regard to the point which this Committee has in view, you favour the deductions under the present conditions being allowed by law whatever the basis may be upon which the society was founded ?—Yes. We have no desire that the law should be altered so far as the permanent relief societies are concerned.

6684. I am a little surprised that you have not given your testimony in a broader way with regard to the Central Association, because I started to get your evidence upon the footing that you represented the views of the Central Association. In answer to Mr. Walsh, Mr. Maddison, and Mr. Delevingne, you seem to have been very guarded ?—We had a secretary of the Central Association, but unfortunately he died in May of last year, and this has been a matter which we have had to take up hurriedly amongst ourselves.

6685. That is quite fair, and it is as well we elicited that ?—There is another point. We were under the impression that only one witness would be heard.

6686. That was the reason the members of the Committee wished to get the true breadth of your evidence. There is one point we are all anxious about. Are you able to testify that there is no force or compulsion, direct or indirect—mark you, indirect is as important to us as direct—upon men to join this association ?—There is none.

By Mr. Maddison.

6687. That is an all-important question, but we must still take it that Mr. Barnes is only speaking for Northumberland and Durham, and we must really get some answer with regard to the other counties from some one.

By the Chairman.

6688. I am very much impressed with that view. On behalf of the Committee, I will say that if other localities of the country are represented by gentlemen now present who have heard this evidence, and they are able to give us in a single word the experience with regard to the fund in other localities, we should value that information ?—That is what we expected; we expected that would be so.

6689. You can put in a witness from another county—Yorkshire, or anywhere you like ?—Yes.

Mr. GEORGE BOOTH, was called ; and Examined.

Mr. G. Booth.

4 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6690. What is the Society you represent ?—I represent the West Riding of Yorkshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society, of which I am the secretary.

6691. What is roughly speaking the membership of that ?—31,000.

6692. Engaged as miners underground, and some on the surface ?—A few on the surface.

6693. You have heard the evidence which has been given to us by Mr. Barnes ?—Yes.

6694. My question to you generally is, do you concur in that evidence ?—I do.

6695. Does that represent the views of the West Riding Miners' Union ?—In a general sense it does.

6696. There are two or three specific points that we are rather anxious about. Are you able to assure us that your Association is absolutely voluntary ?—Yes, in a sense.

6697. You must explain that ?—It is voluntary in this way. In some of the collieries where a permanent relief fund has been established a number of years they are all in the fund, and if a man goes there, he is supposed to become a member of the society, but if he objects, he can have his money back. The same applies to Mr. Barnes' society. Our society is based on the same kind of rules as Mr. Barnes' society.

6698. Do you manage the Funds substantially in the way that Mr. Barnes described ?—Yes.

6699. There is no contribution by the employers ?—No, with one exception ; there are one or two subscriptions from the royalty owners ; but they have no interest whatever in the society.

6700. With regard to the management, that remains with the workmen and the Committee ?—Yes, and a few honorary members.

6701. Do they take an active share in it ?—They are on the board of management.

6702. I mean so far as the actual arrangements are concerned ?—They are left with the men.

6703. I fancy the honorary members are more ornamental than active ?—Yes, just so.

6704. With regard to the attitude of the West Riding Society, is it in the same position as the Northumberland and Durham Association which Mr. Barnes represents ?—It is with regard to the head officials. You always find a little opposition from minor officials in all societies.

6705. I am speaking of the Society you represent. We want to know from you whether that part of the country, the workmen of which you represent, concurs in Mr. Barnes' evidence, and protests against an alteration of the law which would make deductions illegal ?—Yes.

6706. In the one particular which you give evidence about ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

6707. I do not want to carry it very much further. I have been in this business practically the whole of my life, and I know a good deal of the inception of our Lancashire Society. I think you will admit that our Lancashire secretary, Mr. George L. Campell, to whose death Mr. Barnes referred, was the mainspring, so to speak, he was the very centre and focus of your societies, he was a man of very great ability ?—He was.

6708. I would not like to press points upon a witness with regard to this matter unless he came from Lancashire and was really acquainted with the main facts. Are you connected with the Miners' Trades Union of Yorkshire ?—I am not.

6709. Therefore, you do not speak officially in any sense for that trades union ?—I do not.

6710. You may know their mind in a sense, but not as a member of their organisation ?—That is so.

By Mr. Maddison.

6711. Have you any general knowledge of other counties, or is your knowledge confined to Yorkshire ?—It is confined to Yorkshire.

6712. You could not give a general answer ?—I should not like to speak for other counties.

6713. If we cannot get a witness who can speak for the whole country, it is not much use asking a general question ?—I am on the consultative committee of the Central Association and we appointed a deputation of about fifteen to come to this Departmental Committee, but there was an objection raised.

By the Chairman.

6714. The views which as a deputation they were going to put forward were discussed, I suppose : can you not inform the Committee whether the views of that deputation were for or against deductions ?—For deductions, certainly.

6715. And against the law interfering with them ?—Just so.

6716. What area of country did that deputation cover ?—It covered Northumberland and Durham, Lancashire and Cheshire, the Midland Counties, the West Riding of Yorkshire, North Wales and South Wales.

6717. Was that deputation formed to come here to give evidence upon that subject in the sense in which you have given evidence ?—If called upon.

Mr. EVAN OWEN, was called ; and Examined.

Mr. E. Owen.

4 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6718. What Society do you represent ?—The Monmouthshire and South Wales Miners' Permanent Relief Society.

6719. You have heard the evidence of the two preceding witnesses ?—I have.

6720. Do you concur in it ?—Absolutely.

6721. What is the membership of the society which you represent ?—Perhaps I should save time by explaining. The Monmouthshire and South Wales Society was formed in 1881, the year in which the Employers' Liability Act came into operation. It was made the basis of an arrangement between employers and employed in lieu of that Act, and up to the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act it was carried on in that way. So far as regards the attitude of the leaders of the miners is concerned, it has never been antagonistic to the permanent relief fund as such, but they have always objected very strongly to what is generally called (although we object to the term) contracting out. Consequently they have always been more or less in antagonism to the miners' provident fund as carried on in that way. But to the permanent fund as such, apart from the contracting out arrangement, they have always been friendly, and they are still friendly to it.

6722. The object of this Committee is to enquire as to the expediency of fines or deductions from wages. The point you are here upon is a deduction in respect of a benefit and sick fund ?—Yes.

6723. What is the view of your union with regard to that ?— By " union " I take it you mean the society ?

6724. Yes ?—We are distinctly of opinion that it would be very detrimental to the interest of the society if Parliament prohibited thecollection of these contributions.

6725. That collection takes place in the way described by Mr. Barnes ?—Precisely.

6726. What is the membership of this society ?—The membership of the Monmouthshire and South Wales Society has greatly diminished since the Workmen's Compensation Act has come into operation.

6727. We want things as they are ; what is it at the present time ?—About 12,000 or 15,000.

6728. Did the coal owners in Monmouthshire and South Wales place before the men a condition of employment which necessitated contracting out at that time?—No. As a matter of fact, since the formation of the society there has not been a case at a single colliery in Monmouthshire and South Wales where all the workmen have been members of the permanent relief society. Some have been in and some have been out.

6729. What is your present membership?—From 12,000 to 15,000.

6730. Roughly speaking, 13,500?—Yes.

6731. What proportion does that bear to the underground mining population of the district?—I daresay there are 110,000 or 115,000.

6732. So that about one in eight is a member of your society?—Yes, practically.

6733. Would you say that that shows very great willingness to become voluntary members of the society?—The reason these workmen have left the society is that the employers have declined to collect money through the offices, and the society finds it would be too costly to carry on the operations.

6734. The Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, and subsequent Acts, have removed a good deal of the incentive?—Yes, there is a good deal of force in what you say, but still I quite agree with Mr. Barnes that if the workmen wish to continue some system by which they can add to their benefits Parliament ought not to place any obstacle in the way.

6735. Do you occupy any position in the trades unions?—I did when working underground.

6736. But not now?—No.

6737. How long ago was that?—Twenty-five years ago

By Mr. Maddison.

6738. I have only one question. As it is such a small number it is hardly necessary to ask; but amongst the members of your society, can you tell this Committee plainly and straight that there is no pressure brought to bear upon men to join?—I can certainly.

By Mr. Delevingne.

6739. Why did the employers refuse to continue the collection of the contributions at their offices?—Because they found they could cover the risks cheaper under the Workmen's Compensation Act than they could by their payments to the society.

6740. But we understood that in Northumberland and Durham the system of collection was continued after the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act?—There is no mutual arrangement there. There is no contracting out arrangement such as we have in South Wales. It is worked upon a different basis altogether.

6741. I understand the position of the fund in both countries is the same, only that in Northumberland and Durham, as a matter of grace and favour, the employers are continuing to deduct the contributions?—Yes, whereas in South Wales they declined. Hence the difference in the number of members.

6742. You do not give any reason for that?—I cannot.

By the Chairman.

6743. In South Wales do the masters contribute to the fund?—No, not since the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Prior to that, they did; they contributed a fourth.

6744. So that the difficulty seems to be different from that usually anticipated; it is not that the workmen do not want the deductions in your case, but that they cannot persuade the employers to be the agents?—That is so 6745. And if it is managed upon the ordinary principle of out-door collection, it is too expensive to work satisfactorily?—It is.

Mr. FREDERICK GEEN, was called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

6746. What part of the country do you represent?—North Staffordshire.

6747. What is your society?—The North Staffordshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society.

6748. You have heard the evidence of the preceding witnesses to-day?—Yes.

6749. Do you concur in it?—I do, generally.

6750. What is the membership of your society?—Approximately 20 per cent. of the mining population of North Staffordshire.

6751. Your relief fund is entirely of a voluntary kind?—Absolutely.

6752. Are the employers the collectors or agents in the same way as in Mr. Barnes' society?—At a few collieries. At others, where the employers do not collect, arrangements have been made, as far as it is possible to make them, for the collection of the contributions. But the cost of collecting is great—at least 12½ per cent. of the contributions.

6753. As compared with 5 per cent.?—Compared with 2½ per cent. And I am satisfied that it cannot be done at a less figure.

6754. Would your evidence go thus far, that if the law were to prohibit these deductions in such circumstances as Mr. Barnes described, you have no doubt it would be a blow at the existence of these societies, or at all events at the extent of their operations?—I have no doubt it would.

6755. And do you think that would be a calamitous thing?—I do.

6756. Very much against the interests of the workers?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

6757. You say you have a membership of 20 per cent. of the mining population in North Staffordshire?—Yes.

6758. Can you give us off-hand what has been the fall in the figures since 1898 when the Workmen's Compensation Act came into force?—Yes; about three-eighths.

6759. Three-eighths of the members of that time have gone away?—Yes.

6760. Leaving five-eighths of the membership of eight years ago?—Yes.

6761. Do you occupy any official position in the North Staffordshire Miners' Union?—No, but perhaps I might be permitted to say that although I am not an official or a member of the Miners' Union, yet Mr. Enoch Edwards, the president of the Miners' Federation, is a trustee of my society, and the committee of management has upon it several of the leading officials of the Miners' Union.

6762. I ought to say that I am not in any way putting those questions with a view of making the slightest implication with regard to these gentlemen, many of whom are life long friends of my own?—I have said what I have in order to show there is no antagonism.

6763. I wished simply to find out the official position occupied by yourselves?—I quite understand.

who are members of your society, are they confined to two or three collieries, or spread about? Do the men of a certain colliery all belong to it, generally speaking and in other collieries none at all?—That is so.

6765. Do you tell the Committee that in those collieries where the permanent relief society is old established, the men are perfectly at liberty to join or to refrain from joining?—That is so.

6766. You would be against any compulsion?—Yes. I should like to say, as the question of the solvency of societies has been mentioned, that the one I represent is absolutely solvent, and has a surplus of £14,000.

5 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

6767. Please tell us in the first place what is your representative character here to-day?—I am general President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers.

6768. What part of the country does that union affect?—The West Riding of Yorkshire.

6769. And about what number of workers?—About 4,600.

6770. They are, I understand, weavers and textile workers entirely?—General factory workers, largely weavers.

6771. Are they men or women?—In the weaving department, they are about half and half, the other departments are solely men.

6772. How many women do you think there are amongst the total of 4,600?—About 1,000. I may here state that I happen to be district secretary of one of the sections of the association for the heavy woollen district, which includes Dewsbury, Batley, Morley, and Leeds.

6773. In the evidence you are going to give to-day, do you represent to the best of our judgment the opinion of both the General Union of Weavers, and also of the organisation to which you last referred?—That last organisation is part of the General Union, representing a district. I am general President of the Union.

6774. And you represent its opinions in the evidence you are about to deliver?—Yes, I think so fully, having been an official for about twenty years.

6775. You probably know that we are here to inquire into the subject of fines and deductions from wages, with regard to which I would like to put to you a general question. I suppose you remember the passing of the Act of 1896 because your experience goes back considerably anterior to that?—Yes.

6776. Has there been much change produced by that legislation in the practice of making fines and deductions?—Yes, some little change. I think there is less fining now than there was prior to that period.

6777. Then you think the Act of 1896 has brought fining under better conditions?—It has not brought fining under better conditions, but it has slightly reduced it.

6778. I gather from you that fining still goes on?—Yes.

6779. Please give us the categories, as it were, under which fines are imposed?—"Timing" in to work is a pretty regular custom now in most of the textile mills in the Huddersfield, Dewsbury and Leeds area. I am now speaking, of course, of the woollen and worsted cloth trades.

6780. Please give us some concrete illustrations as to what happens when a worker, male or female, goes to work late?—Yes, I can give you two or three examples. In the case of a worsted mill in Farsley the workpeople are fined for being late whether they are piece workers, as a large number of them are, or day workers.

6781. What is the scale or system of fining?—The scale of fines ranges from 1d. to 4d. according to how long the worker is late. They are allowed to be three minutes late, and then they are fined up to fifteen minutes.

6782. What relation does that fine bear to the wages earned?—That depends upon the individual operative. One operative may have 8s. per week, another 18s., and another perhaps 28s. a week.

6783. The amount of the fine is a fixed quantity?—Yes.

6784. You say that applies to piece workers also?—Yes, to both sorts.

6785. I will ask you a question or two as we go along with regard to each. You are, of course, aware that this habit of late coming is apt, to some extent, to disorganise the work of a department or a mill?—Yes.

6786. Do you approve of the continuance of these deductions or do you advocate their discontinuance?—I believe the deduction should be discontinued as it does not prevent late coming, and often inflicts injury upon individuals who are not habitual late comers.

6787. You say that whether there are fines or not the late coming may be continued. Have you any experience of places where fines have been abolished—fines for late coming?—Some firms do not fine at all for that, but others do, and the system sometimes makes it rather worse for the firms where they fine for late coming.

6788. You might give us an example of that?—At a mill in Batley they fine if more than three minute late and take half an hour off the worker. The worker is expected to go into the mill immediately the three minutes are up, but the half-hour is still deducted. That, however, does not pay the firm very well, insomuch as the workers who are treated in that way, unless they happen to be piece workers, will not at once begin work, and that rather disorganises the place and checks production more than if the firm were more gracious and allowed a more liberal margin. When half an hour is taken off the workpeople, many of them refuse to work any part of that hour and they therefore loiter about inside the place to the detriment of its good management.

6789. Do you consider the fine or deduction for late-coming is purely disciplinary ?—Yes.

6790. Do you think that discipline has been secured by it or can discipline be secured by the ordinary means ?—I know many mills which are just as well disciplined where they have no Bundy clock or timing in process. It is, of course, a matter of habit with the workpeople or partly training, and partly influenced by respect for their own character or for the firms who employ them.

6791. I suppose the form of ordinary discipline is that if workpeople get into a chronic habit of late coming, they can be dismissed ?—Yes, that is the ordinary form of discipline.

6792. If the late coming is only occasional, they will be warned ?—Yes, where they are not timed in.

6793. Do you think that between the warning and the dismissal the effect will be as satisfactory as a fine ?—Yes, in my own mind I am certain of it. May I mention one place where the employers take 1½d. off for a quarter of an hour late, that is at the rate of 6d. per hour; but seven-tenths of the operatives there, whether on piece work or not, do not earn anything like 6d. per hour.

6795. I presume you are free to admit that in addition to the actual wage earned, there must be some fair consideration of the question of machinery standing idle and the like ?—Yes I am aware of that, but I do not see how the charge could be anything like 2d. per hour for the loss or possible loss of production in running power. I am not skilled in that department, but the proportion does not seem to me to be equitable. I may mention one or two more examples. Take the case of a cloth mill at Heckmondwike. Three minutes grace is allowed although the workpeople tell me it is often two minutes or even less. Then they have a ½d. taken off for five minutes late and 1d. for fifteen minutes. A large number of the girls engaged there have from 12s. to 14s. per week and therefore the wages do not run to anything like 4d. per hour, although the reduction is at that rate, or even a little more. At another yarn mill in the same district 2d. is taken off if any of the workpeople are five minutes late and get locked out. Some of the men only get 22s. per week and the taking of 2d. off for being five minutes late is a larger reduction than their wages would come to. At another mill in the same locality work is begun at 6.30 a.m., If the workpeople are not there at 6.36 2d. is taken off, and if they are not in at 6.45 they are locked out until breakfast time. The men or women who go in at 6.36 have 2d. taken off, and as a man told me on Friday night last, they many a time work from twenty to twenty-five minutes for nothing, besides having the 2d. deducted. That is a sample from the Spen Valley. At Morley, another textile centre, fines for late coming are very prevalent, which itself, I think, proves that the system does not stop late coming. At a mill in Yeadon they adopt the "penny hole" business, which means passing through the special wicket or gate where the timekeeper sits, who imposes a fine upon late comers.

6796. I think the cases you have given sufficiently illustrate the fines in connection with the timing in system, and now we are anxious to get any evidence you have as to exactions in the way of deductions in respect of other matters ?—I have here a few sample tickets from one firm which is a specimen of deductions made also by other firms for alleged bad work. It is in connection with the weaving department at one of the best leading firms in the town of Huddersfield, and the same thing applies to other firms in that town and the Colne Valley. These are sample receipts that workpeople who have had deductions made from their earnings have received from the firm as evidence of the fines or deductions inflicted.

6797. I observe that these fines in one case are 1s., in another case 1s. 6d., and in two other cases 2s. The 1s. fine is for "end out," the 1s. 6d. is for "ends out long;" and the first 2s. fine is for a "wrong bobbin." The second 2s. fine is for "end out on back floating." Do you wish to represent that these fines are objected to ?—They are.

6798. Take the case of the workman whose tickets you have put in, and who is fined, say, 2s.—what wage would be earn ?—Probably his wage would average from 24s. to 26s. per week when trade is fair.

6799. Is it in accordance with your experience that such a workman may sometimes be fined more than once a week ?—No, not more than once in a week. In the worsted cloth trade, they seldom get more than two pieces out per week and a man is not likely to be fined even every week.

6800. Do the workmen resent that charge ?—They do and some have left as a consequence of these deductions

6801. What do you say with regard to the deductions being right or wrong in themselves ?—They are absolutely wrong.

6802. Why ?—It is not possible for man or woman to be perfect, and if men and women are doing their best, and not wickedly, careless or ignorantly reckless in their work, it is human to err, and I do not think that fines and deductions of that character improve the worker or are the right way to deal with defects.

6803. Is it the opinion of yourself and those whom you represent that discipline could be sufficiently maintained without fines of this kind ?—Yes; several leading firms, the names of which I can give you, do not have such deductions. Whether they do it from the belief that people must make occasional mistakes or not, I would not say, but they have the other alternative of correcting people who make mistakes regularly, that is to dismiss them because they are not good enough, or competent enough, or efficient enough to do their work.

6804. So far as your experience goes is the result as good for the employer without fines as with them ?—I could not speak from the employer's standpoint on that. I know that our union prior to the passing of the last Truck Act in 1896 and for the last score years have religiously and deliberately opposed deductions for alleged bad work, as they consider that the employer or manager, or head of department, is both judge and jury, and that the work people, male and female, have little to say in such fines and deductions, and that many times a weaver would make a mistake or cause damage quite innocently, consistently with having due care for his work. I am a weaver by occupation, and I know that is so.

6805. So that it comes to be an unjustifiable exaction ?—I think so. May I explain that 2s. fine which you have before you ?

6806. Certainly ?—It is a question of wrong bobbins In the fancy worsted trade, such as your waistcoat is made of, and our coats and so on, there may be two thicknesses of yarn, but both of one colour, that is, there may be two bobbins of weft, one a 24 counts and the other a 36 counts. The only perceptible difference is in the thickness of the yarn. The loom may be in some dark corner of the place, or things may happen on a particular day which make it nearly impossible for the person to find out that he has got a wrong bobbin in the shuttles. Two baskets are beside him, one 36 blacks and the other 24 blacks—that is counts of yarn. It may be that he dropped one in by accident, not knowingly, or it may be that the weft given him by the person who delivers out the weft has gone to the wrong bin where the weft is kept, and that by accident he has been given a wrong bobbin from the wrong bin. The weaver is fined anyhow because it is said he ought to have seen it or to have felt that these two blacks were of different thickness. In that particular case before you the blacks were of different thickness, absolutely the same class of material except in thickness of yarn, and he did not know he had put the wrong bobbin in. The 2s. exaction, although the cost of the quarter yard of the piece may be 2s. or thereabouts, looks like a punishment to the man, as he was doing his best, and it was not done ignorantly, or carelessly, or wilfully.

6807. We have got as far as what you term "irritating exactions" in your précis ?—I can put the case in regard to alleged bad workmanship a bit stronger if you care to have it.

6808. All we want is clear illustrations of the existing system ?—At one of these mills which you have just had mentioned in connection with workmanship, it is very fine delicate workmanship, and if the yarn happens to be a shade faulty—not the weaver's fault, but the fault of the buyer of the wool and the spinner of the yarn —it is apt to get twisted together. In fastening or rolling the two ends together one end may pass over the other and make a streak down the cloth which the weaver will not see, and which is only detected when the piece comes to be finished or milled, or put under a window where the full light is thrown upon it for perching purposes. This weaver was fined 2s. for having an end rolled over like that. The healds themselves which the weaver has no control over, may be kept in longer than they should be for economy's sake. The weaver may have these defects, which are not his or her fault, but still they have got to suffer the deductions because they did not see the defect. In one case the ends were rolled nine yards, and the person was fined 2s. The menders had to correct the damage, but they are there to correct damages at mills, or at least they used to be, and I think they should be yet.

6809. Is there any other ?—Yes, there is another. There is one here of a very strange character in connection with the fettling department, not in connection with weaving. Fettling is part of the mill process ; in the cotton trade it would be the carding department. This is the scribbling department. In this case the overlooker, that is the foreman of the department, told the fettler to clean the condenser end whilst in motion. The man did so, and the thing he cleans the cards with, a kind of comb, something like what you scrape a horse with, fell into the end of the scribbler and bulged four rings. This man was fined 24s. That was a firm in Leeds. In this particular case he was obeying instructions. It was a simple accident which might easily arise.

6810. What wages did he have ?—26s. a week. That is only a fortnight since.

6811. Now I will ask you with regard to that, was there any list of fines up ?—No.

6812. Was there no written contract ?—No. It is not customary to fine fettlers. That is the first case I have heard for a long time.

6813. Was that reported to the inspector ?—I do not think it has been yet. I only got this information on Thursday last week.

6814. Of course if fines and deductions were, broadly, made illegal, cases of that sort could not occur ?—They could not.

6815. Do you think that would be just ?—I think it would not be unjust, because the other position is that the employer can always discharge the careless man or woman.

6816. So that the former part of your evidence applies to that too ?—Exactly. I have a case here where at a mill in Leeds a deduction of 3s. 6d. was made for one wrong bobbin. In the case of the cloth which you have mentioned the likelihood is that the price of their cloth will be double the price of the cloth at this particular mill, because the Huddersfield trade and the Leeds trade is, I should say, anywhere from 20 per cent. to 50 per cent. better value.

6817. And yet the fine there was 3s. 6d. ?—Yes, for one wrong bobbin ; and one person has been fined 10s. 6d. for three wrong bobbins in rotation.

6818. In one week ?—Yes, one part of one piece. There would be three wrong bobbins one after the other.

6819. Was that 10s. 6d. exacted ?—Yes, and paid. At a Bramley mill 2d. is deducted for a broken pick. A broken pick is when the shuttle goes through the warp without any weft in it ; or when the weft breaks of course it leaves a break across the piece. At all mills there are menders for the purpose of sewing in the thread to repair the defect of a broken pick. I do not think there is a weaver born that could weave a piece without a broken pick, unless the loom appliance and the weft fork were absolutely in perfect order all the time and the weft was always decent stuff. But the weaver has no control over the yarn or weft and sometimes the engine running will disturb the fineness of the weft fork, which indicates when the weft is breaking, and it may not always act. It is not the weaver's fault.

6820. Is it your opinion that these fines have to be borne by workmen in many instances in which the responsibility for the damage or loss does not rest with them at all ?—In scores of instances the weaver is not at all to blame for the defect or damage ; other causes effect the damage.

6821. There is a special part of your evidence as to lads who are fined in press shops which I would like you to tell us about ?—The press shop work in Yorkshire has largely, up to recent date, been men's labour on account of its being such very heavy work.

6822. What are press shops ?—They are where part of the finishing of cloth is done. This applies all the way through the woollen and cloth worsted trade. The pieces are put into a form of press, laid with a piece of thick paper, as thick as this blotting paper, or thicker, between each fold of cloth ; then it is put into a huge steam box and pressed down with iron plates between each fold over this press paper to keep the plate from damaging the cloth. Men have been accustomed to do this up to recent date. Some three or four years back the Germans and others brought out inventions, and for the cheaper cloths a pressing machine of a huge character was introduced. They, therefore, get men and lads to do this work. All the pressers have been on piecework up to now, and they have put the lads on piecework at Morley. Of course lads are lads all over the world and are liable not to do everything that is right or correct, and in this case to which I refer of course they made a mistake. An accident happened, and although they were on piecework they had to lose their time in getting the machine going, earned no money, and were fined 6d. in addition. Their wages are only 13s., 14s., and 15s. a week. In the press shops they are now instituting a system of fines in this direction. We contend that it takes men all their time to be as perfect as angels, and that lads cannot be.

6823. Then there are deductions for menders' wages ?—Yes, that is a serious grievance at some mills. When a piece is defective by reason of broken picks or ends out or floats (that is where the ends have got across or some snarl has taken place) the menders are supposed to remedy the defects, and are employed solely for that purpose. There are menders and burlers. The burlers and knotters take out the bits of thick pieces, smooth the surface, as you may term it, take away the bad knots, and prepare it ready for the mender to make the piece as nearly perfect as possible. Menders have been the skilled portion of the female workers in cloth mills and have been paid varying wages of a better character than any other section of operatives in textile mills.

6824. Up to how much ?—24s.—from 16s. up to 24s.—a week. Many of them are on piece, of course.

6825. Now will you explain to us what deductions are made for menders' wages ?—When a weaver has woven the piece it is sent to the mender, and the employer tells the mender, that he must do it in a certain number of hours. The time varies, and must vary, according to the class of piece ; one piece may take two hours to mend and another may take half a day because of the difference in the class of material and because it is a different sort of piece. Certain pieces are allowed so many hours to be mended in. If it takes more than that then the weaver has to pay the mender's increased wage. Supposing two hours are allowed and it takes four hours the weaver has to have a deduction from his or her wages to pay the mender's two hours' wages. The mender may either be a slow person, a quick person, a careless person, or a poorly person. In any case the weaver has no control over the mender. Weavers have had to pay deductions towards menders' wages when they felt sure that the time allotted would have been ample for the mending to be done to their piece. I will take the case of nine yards, which you have on one of those tickets. That is 1s. 6d., I believe ?

6826. It is 1s.—"End out 9 yards" ?—I have one here of 2s. Anyhow, we will take the one at 1s. Menders are employed to mend pieces, and no weaver can weave a warp if the material is of the ordinary sort without some ends down—it may be an inch, it may be six inches, or it may be a yard. The weaver is supposed to see one before it is nine yards—I will admit that—but a shilling deduction for nine yards is out of proportion to what the mender's wages would be.

6827. You will excuse me, but I do not quite see how the system works. The mender is in the employment of the firm ?—Yes.

6828. And the mender has certain wages ?—Yes.

6829. Which are paid by the firm ?—Yes.

6830. A deduction is made from the weaver if the mender takes longer to mend the piece than the allotted average ?—Yes.

6831. Is that how it works out ?—Yes.

6832. Now I understand your view to be that the menders, being a separate class, should be settled with by their employers, and that whatever their wages or capacity may be that should be part of the on cost of the mill ?—That is so.

6833. And there should be no back reckoning with the weaver who has furnished the cloth ?—That is so.

6834. Is that the view of those you represent ?—Absolutely. May I just continue it a shade further.

6835. Certainly ?—At small mills it has now got into a worse position than that. At two mills in the Batley area they have dispensed with a number of their menders and make the weavers mend their pieces or pay the mender the whole cost of mending the piece. A firm which formerly had six menders has reduced the number down to two. That is a concrete case I am thinking of. When a weaver has finished her piece she has to mend it herself—broken picks or ends out or floats—and if she does not, she has to pay the mender employed by the firm the complete number of hours' wages that she has been mending that particular piece for her. That therefore has a double effect—causing menders not to be wanted, and reducing the weavers' wages either by the amount which is deducted for the mender's work or on account of their own increased work in mending the piece for which they are not paid.

6836. On the other hand, of course, the advantage of that is that there never can be an overcharge; they do the thing themselves, or just pay for the doing of it ? —But it is not many weavers who can mend their own pieces. It requires good eyesight and a trained steady hand to use the needle to put the threads in. Not all of them are competent, because many of them are young persons of fifteen and sixteen years of age, not staid enough to understand it.

6837. Suppose one person to be a good workman and another to be a bad workman, is there any rule of the employment that they must each be paid at the same rate of wage ?—In connection with weaving of course, it is piece work and rectifies itself in production. In the other case, where it is weekly wages, the employer or his foreman is wideawake enough to only have efficient work people, generally speaking.

6838. But there is a standard rate of wages ?—There is a general understanding with regard to wages. In Leeds there is a proper official standard; in Yeadon the same; in Colne Valley the same; and a common understanding, but not a fixed standard, in the Dewsbury woollen district.

6839. So that the alternative is not available of a bad workman who caused a great expense for mending being reduced in wages in consequence; the alternative truly is that if he is bad enough to be dismissed he must go ?—Yes.

6840. And that is the alternative you prefer ?—We say that is the only just alternative. The other method punishes the occasional accidents and misfortunes of decent people.

6841. I quite see your point. Then you have something to say with regard to cook-house charges ?—That is not very common, except in Morley. In Morley, of course, it has come into operation. The unfortunate thing is that there are not a great many textile mills which have cook-houses or dining-rooms. They are getting more common as we get more civilised.

6842. Of course it is a practical advantage to have them ?—It is an advantage to have a cook-house and to have a dining-room, and I should imagine that no mill ought to be allowed to be erected without some arrangement of that character. But that does not convey with it the idea that a deduction for anything of sort is that a proper thing.

6843. You think, in short, that that should be part of the general expense of working a mill ?—I do.

6844. You have a note here with regard to the activity which you think is needed by inspectors to examine fines and the cause of the fines and their reasonableness ? —Yes. There is a firm only two or three miles from the inspector's place which does not give a receipt. There are several of those cases. In fact, I should say that most of them do not give a receipt in our mills in the Dewsbury, Batley, Morley and Leeds district, as they should do.

6845. Do I understand that there are cases at present in considerable numbers in which fines or deductions are imposed without there being a written contract ?—That is so.

6846. Without there being anything posted up ?—That is so.

6847. And even without there being a receipt granted for the amount deducted ?—That is so.

6848. Why do not the inspectors examine those cases ? —For one thing there are not enough inspectors. If you take the district where I come from, of Huddersfield and Dewsbury—I come from Batley and our headquarters are in Huddersfield—there is one inspector and an assistant for all the multitude of factories and workshops in the Colne and the Holme Valleys and the Huddersfield district, the Spen Valley district, and the heavy woollen district, the great centre—the complete centre—as you may term it —of the woollen cloth trade.

6849. I gather from you that the precautions and provisions of the Act of 1896 have largely been unavailing ?—They have not been put into operation.

6850. And, short of total abolition, do you think that the statutory provisions would in future probably be evaded ?—I think some of our employers are old-fashioned enough to evade anything, nearly.

6851. I am afraid you use the word "old-fashioned" in a somewhat actionable sense ?—We are immune from any of those charges just now.

6852. This kind of consideration confirms your opinion that there should be a total abolition of fines ?—Without a doubt. May I put it in another way. It would pass the powers of any State Department to appoint a person or persons to judge upon the reasonableness or otherwise of some of the fines. Supposing I was a mechanic by occupation and became an inspector by appointment, I could not at all comprehend as to whether that fine of 2s., supposing it was allowed to be continued was a reasonable one or not; and of course as a weave. I could no more understand whether a fine was reasonable in amount in a blouse factory or some similar concern.

6853. Do I gather from your evidence that even supposing a recommendation were made that fines should be continued, but, before being legal, should be subject to approval by the inspectors, that would fail ?—Well, I think the employers would kill it themselves rather than have that.

6854. But I gathered from your evidence just now that the inspector might not have the qualifications to declare whether a thing was reasonable or not ?—I cannot see how they could. One inspector could not know about a number of trades and occupations. I have been a factory worker, a textile worker, since I was a lad of nine years of age, and I could not state whether a deduction in regard to the making of sealskin goods, plush goods, was reasonable or unreasonable, because my section of the trade has not been that of plushes or sealskins.

5 Dec. 1906.

6855. There are two questions I have to ask you in conclusion. You have a reference here to fining weavers for light and heavy weights ?—This is largely in the Morley district, where the cloth sells from 7½d per yard to 1s. 4d. per yard.

6856. What is the material ?—Woollen cloth. They are very common, cheap cloths. The sale of these cloths is in two directions. The merchant buys them by weight per number of yards length of cloth ; they have a weight of so much per yard—16 oz. cloth, 24 oz. cloth, and 36 oz. cloth as the case may be. Some are heavy, some are moderately heavy, and some are of medium sort. The weaver has to bring out a piece so that it weighs say 120 lbs., being so many yards long. If it is 118 lbs. she is subject to a fine of 3d., 6d., and 1s., in various places. I have samples of fines here at Morley where they have been 3d., 6d., and 1s. for light ends. Then if they are too heavy, if they are 3 or 4 lbs. more than they are specified to be on the ticket, they are also fined for being too heavy. The employers' point is that in being too heavy the weaver has wasted so much of the yarn—that he has put more yarn into the piece than he requires. But the 2 or 4 lbs. one way or the other are absolutely wicked charges. They are most unreasonable, because a weaver has little control over the weight of a piece to that limit which is put there of 2 lbs. light or 4 lbs heavy. The thickness of the yarn which the weaver has to manipulate may cause a difference in weight, The spinner in spinning the yarn may make irregular counts, one or two or three more or less than there ought to be, altering the whole basis of the weavers' piece, and she has no control whatever—these are females—in that direction. Then again it may be done if the engine is going unsteady. It may cause her loom to go either quicker or slower, or more irregularly, and may even cause a disarrangement of the machinery which will interfere for the time being, for half a day, or a quarter of a day, whatever the time may be, with the weight of her piece. They have to be so many picks in per inch. She is paid by the number of picks per inch in the number of yards she weaves ; that is, a piece of 60 or 70 yards long with fifty picks per inch will be a good amount per string or per cent. or per warp. If she has fifty picks in she is keeping her contract, but it may bring her piece out either 2 lbs. too light or 4 lbs. too heavy according to the yarn she is using, over which she has no control.

6857. That is another illustration of what I understand you to say is a very frequent case, namely that the fine operates as a punishment upon a person who has really committed no offence ?—Yes.

6858. You have already given us your opinion as to the abolition of fines altogether ?—Yes.

6859. You think nothing short of that will work out satisfactorily on all sides ?—I do not see how it can. I do not see how you can have a degree of right or wrong in that business. If it is right to fine, then of course a multiplicity of fines must be allowed. And I think it is not right to fine. I do not think it helps to fine.

6860. Is it your opinion that if fines were abolished altogether, always assuming proper supervision of the mills, the abolition would not result in any outbreak in want of discipline or any waste of material, or loss or damage to the work ?—The case of a designer at a certain mill puts the matter very plainly. He was fining some of his workpeople, and one of them said to him, "Do you ever make mistakes yourself ? Do you never have bad seasons when your designs do not take on ?" The reply was, "Yes, we do." Then the workman asked, "Who fines you ?" The reply was, "Oh, that cannot be helped." The workman said, "We are in the same position." After that fines were stopped, and it is now one of the most perfect of mills as regards discipline.

6861. I am rather anxious to have my question answered as I put it to you, although I am obliged to you for giving me that illustration. Assuming proper supervision of the mills, is it your opinion that the abolition of fines would not result in any outbreak of want of discipline, or any waste of material, or loss or damage to the work ?—I think the fear of dismissal will cause just as good discipline as anything else.

6862. And result in as good work ?—Yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

6863. In regard to coming late, I suppose the operatives can come in time if they like ? It is their own doing if they come late ?—It is their own doing in many cases. Occasionally it may be an accident to the tramway when they have to come long distances, or it may be that they have only been late occasionally.

6864. Those are very occasional matters. As a rule if they do not come in time it is through carelessness or through not having sufficient wish to do right. There are some who are habitually late I take it ?—There are some habitual late comers in every mill, unfortunately, and our point would be to fire them, as they say in America.

6865. To dismiss them ?—Absolutely.

6866. You do not suggest that the employers fine them for any other reason than because they think they preserve discipline better by so doing?—I can imagine that at some places the fines will more than pay the wages of the man in charge, but I should not suggest that because they made a profit by it that was the cause of the fining.

6867. I suppose you would admit that in nearly all case the fines are imposed because the employers think that, they can preserve better discipline thereby, and that their hands will be more likely to be punctual ?—I should suggest that is their own view of it.

6868. And your view is to the contrary ?—My view is that it does not help them at all.

6869. Then the result of your evidence is that whilst the employers think that they manage their places better by imposing fines for coming late in the morning, your opinion is that they could manage the places better without fines ?—My opinion is they could manage them quite as well if they would fire the habitual late comers but not punish the occasional late comers

6870. But is it any hardship to the habitual late comer that he should be fined ?—It is the other man I am looking at.

6871. But is it any hardship to those who usually come late ?—Not necessarily, because he is old-fashioned enough to get his time out. It is the other person I am bothered about.

6872. When a man can come at the proper time if he likes, and he does not do so, is it any hardship that he should be fined ?—I think it does not help discipline, and it is better to sack him.

6873. I suppose you will admit that the cases where a man could be in time, but is not, are the bulk of the cases ?—No, they are not.

6874. And not those cases where it is merely accident which prevents them ?—No, that is not the fact unfortunately. I have a case here, a place at Burstall, where the actual amount of time a person is late is added. That is to say, if they arrive at two minutes past six, which is running it very fine, that two minutes is recorded. If they are late to a total of twenty minutes, by the addition of the minutes which they are late each morning, they are deducted half-an-hour. I say that is an irritating exaction which does not tend towards good feeling inside the mill, and is a hardship to a person who comes once a quarter of an hour late and gets his half hour taken off.

6875. Your idea is that the greatest penalty of all should always be exacted, namely dismissal ?—Dismissal for habitual late comers, yes.

6876. And that no other punishment has any deterrent influence ?—There may be such punishment as suspension for a day or suspension for a week for the occasional late comers—those who have gone over the mark pretty often, but are not habitual late comers.

6877. You would not object to suspension ?—So far as disciplinary purposes are concerned, no.

6878. Although you would object to fines for disciplinary purposes you would not object to suspension as a matter of discipline ?—We cannot do it. That is a matter within the province of the employer day after day, if they care to use it, for anything, nearly. Legally they can do it.

6879. When instances of unjust deductions take place, has not your union any power ? Do not they ever come and report matters to you, and you investigate them ?—They do.

6880. Has not your trades union power to interview the employers or in some way to help the operatives to get the deduction lessened or withdrawn ?—We had a case at Honley about three months back, where the list of fines which the firm had hung up was absolutely out of all reason. The weavers met us, and we saw the firm, and the list was pulled down.

6881. You have given us several cases of what you consider to be unjust deductions in regard to supposed bad work; how long do those instances which you have given extend ?—All this evidence is this year's.

6882. You have instanced one mill. What proportion do the fines bear to the wages paid ? In other words, how much do the fines come to in any one week in that mill, and how much do the wages come to ?—I could not give you that. One firm in Leeds fined 15s. out of a 17s. 6d. piece, and 8s. 6d. out of a 17s. 6d. piece.

6883. Those are odd instances ?—Yes.

6885. I wish to get that down to a percentage. If you could tell us how much the operatives were earning per week, any particular class, and how much the fines from those operative's wages were per week, we could then tell what percentage the fines bear to the wages received ?—It would be almost impossible to do that. At the firm in Leeds to which I have referred, the average wages of the weavers will not be 10s. a week.

6886. You have given us an odd instance which may, for all we know, only happen once in six months: I want to know whether these things often happen ?—The fines there—the worsted mill in Leeds—are regular, and also at the other places I have mentioned. They are not regular upon each operative, but upon some of the operatives.

6887. You have given us one or two which look very bad cases where the amount of deduction has very nearly equalled the amount of the wages received; in those cases did they not report them to you or some other official of your union ? Could not they be looked into ?—Unfortunately, the worst cases are those where they are not in the union. That is often the case.

6888. If they were in your union and they came and reported one of these bad cases to you, would you not be able to go and see the employer and say, "We do not think this is right ?"—Yes.

6889. Could not you say, "Will you explain to us how it is these things happen ?"—A few days ago a woman had 4s. 10d. deducted from her wages; I went down to the firm, and got the money back. But some of the worst cases are where they are not in the union at all. Were they in the union we could go to some of the employers undoubtedly, and get some of the things rectified.

6890. Where they are in the union they would report to you, and you or some other official would go to the employer and see whether the deduction was just or not ?—Yes; we should do our best according to the law to get something back. There is a legal claim if the firm has the notice up, and so forth.

6891. With regard to the fines for being late, where do they go to ? Do they go into the pockets of the employers or do the employers put them into some fund which ultimately goes to the operatives ?—I do not think there are half a dozen firms which put them into any fund for any purpose; they go into the offices.

6892. Would your opinion be any different in regard to fines for being late if the law said that any fine for being late in the morning should not go into the employer's pocket ?—I should not think that would be a remedy. That would not satisfy us in any shape or form.

6893. I say if it all went back to the operatives in some way ?—The operative who is fined to-day may not be working in the same place in six months' time when something may happen for the benefit of the operatives; but the injustice is there, wherever the money goes to.

6894. If it is an injustice ?—Yes.

6895. The Chairman asked you a question which I think is very important, and I should like to have it confirmed if possible: would it answer the purpose if all fines were recorded and were open to the inspection of a factory inspector ?—They are supposed to be open to the factory inspector to-day.

6896. The fines which are posted up are, but I mean all fines which were actually made, either for being late, or for bad work, or suspensions, or any deductions of any sort whatever—would it answer the purpose if these were recorded in a book every week in every mill and were always open to the inspection of the factory inspectors ?—But the fines have got to be legal, according to a specified list, and have to be kept in a book now.

6897. I am speaking, not of the fines which can be made, but of every fine and deduction which is made ?—It has to be recorded now.

6898. But is it open to the factory inspector ?—Yes.

6899. Do the factory inspectors look at it ?—I do not they they can get round to half the mills in a year's time to do that work. But it is open to them; they do see them sometimes.

6900. And do they see what they are for ?—Yes, certain firms specify what they are for.

6901. Perhaps Mr. Delevingne, who knows more about it than I do, will ask you about that. There is one thing about menders' wages which is not quite clear to me. I take it that the time which is allowed to the mender is considered sufficient if the operative in the previous process has done his work sufficiently well ?—Taking this class of cloth, there are sixty weavers on it, and they get sixty pieces out per week; the employer knows how long it takes on an average to mend those pieces; he therefore fixes the time probably upon the average time which is taken to mend the pieces, and any time over that average is charged to the weavers.

6902. If the operative weaves a piece badly, it takes the mender more time than it ought to do, and therefore the master makes the operative pay for the time of the extra mending ?—That is so. May I say that bad healds, buying poor wool, having bad cards in the spinning department, would produce a poor material, and may all cause a weaver to have a worse piece than he would do with decent stuff. In those cases she is not responsible for the causes which make the piece take longer to mend.

6903. You consider that the master is making an automatically unfair supervision of the work ?—That is so.

6904. You said that one or two place do without fines ?—Yes, absolutely.

6905. Are those places better managed than those which have fines ?—They are quite as well managed, I should say; they have some of the best workpeople, and keep them.

6906. You spoke of one or two places as having abolished fines; do they turn out the best work ?—Both the best work and the best weavers in the district.

6907. And they are considered well managed places ?—Yes.

6908. They have not, I presume, had fines, and then given them up ?—They used to have fines for defective work.

Mr. B. Turner.

5 Dec. 1906.

6909. And for coming late?—One firm has fines for coming late, but no fines for alleged bad material, and the employer told me that since they have abolished fines for alleged bad work they have done better than before.

6910. In the places which you mention as not having fines you did not mean to include the question of coming late?—No.

6911. But merely with regard to not having deductions for bad work?—Yes.

6912. Do you know of any place where there is no punishment for being late?—Yes; I know many a one.

6913. They do not fine for coming late?—No; they do not have Bundy clocks, or a timekeeper, or anything.

6914. Do you consider that good discipline?—The men stop there regularly and the firm does not sack them.

6915. Do you consider that good discipline?—Yes, I consider they get as regular attendance at those places as at other places, and as much command over the men as at other places, and there is less evasion of work. If you are going to take 2d. for a quarter of an hour's time off, or seven minutes' time off, the man is going to dodge you afterwards, and it spoils the morale of the concern; I am certain it does. I am certain that firms lose brass by it.

By Mr. Walsh.

6916. You spoke of broken picks in the early part of your evidence; are the fines very heavy for that class of incident?—To me as a weaver by trade it looks very heavy.

6917. What was the earlier fine which you mention for the broken pick?—2s. for a hole; 2d. for a broken pick.

6918. I understood you to say that the conditions in which a broken pick resulted were such that the work person had little or no effective control?—Many times no control; sometimes yes. May I put it in this way—there is shoddy coal and decent coal, and occasionally some shoddy coal gets in. So occasionally a broken pick may happen without the weaver knowing anything about it; it may just go through the warp, drop one-third of the width of the piece, and pick up again, break in the middle and catch again on the other side, and the weft fork does not act. It may be the fault of the running power or a defective fork or a fault of the tuner, or, of course, it may be the fault of the weaver. A deduction of 2d. is made.

6919. I understood you to put it that a multiplicity of conditions over most of which the worker had little or no control might occasion this incident?—That is so.

6920. And that in a sense only conditions approaching perfection would enable that class of incident to be altogether avoided?—I do not see how some of them could be avoided.

6921. Unless there were the most perfect conditions?—That is so.

6922. Of engine running?—And good materials.

6923. And almost perfect human beings?—Yes. "Sluffed" bobbins from the mulegate may do it, and the weaver has no control over that.

6924. Are we to understand it is because of those conditions that the sense of injustice operates so keenly in the minds of the workman?—Yes. If a weaver has broken picks regularly she is not fit to be a weaver, and her place is outside.

6925. Are we to understand that dismissal in the case of the weaver who had broken picks habitually would operate much more beneficially both for the workers as a whole and for the employers than the comparatively trifling fine of 2d. or so which is at present inflicted?—I am sure it would be better to dismiss them.

6926. Do we understand that all those conditions which are under their control would be more effectively brought under their control?—That is so.

6927. And that it would bring the worker to a higher state of discipline?—I think it is better than a 2d. fine.

6928. You do not have fines scheduled in many mills?—I think in some of the biggest mills they carried out the Act as religiously as they could, but many of the firms do not. Within the last fortnight an employer has put up the following, which he evidently thinks will do. "Should any damage be done to piece or material they will be subject to a fine for the same. Nov. 3rd." He thinks that is sufficient. I do not think it is, but he is doing it—that is the notice he has recently hung up.

6929. In regard to fining for light and heavy weights, as I undertsood you, the implication was that the conditions in which these light or heavy weights sometimes result are such that the weaver has absolutely no control over them?—He has not any earthly control.

6930. And you describe the fines as wicked charges?—Yes, they are more than unreasonable; they are wicked.

6931. You think in that case that a most perfect work person with the most careful supervision could not avoid such results?—Only by having a perfect amount of yarn, a perfect running, and a perfect loom could they have that piece of the exact weight. There is not a Christian born who could make it the correct weight.

6932. Most of those conditions are not under the control of the work person?—Not at all.

6933. You spoke of a deduction of 15s. 6d. from a 17s. 6d. length?—Yes.

6934. Does that mean that with regard to a length of piece which would bring 17s. 6d. to the work person as wages if it were perfect, a deduction of 15s. 6d. is made?—That is so, by a firm in Leeds.

6935. What length of time would it take the worker to earn that 17s. 6d.?—At this particular place about seven or eight days.

6936. So that, roughly speaking, 90 per cent. of the work person's possible earning power was taken away for that particular incident?—15s. 6d. out of 17s. 6d. Yes, about 90 per cent.

6937. Have you any idea as to what proportion that would bear to the actual or prospective loss that would be caused to the employer?—Some of these pieces made at that place would sell wholesale for not more than £3 to £5, because they are a cheap class of goods; therefore, I should think the employer, taking 15s. 6d. out of 17s. 6d., and selling the piece as a "band-end" or waster, would not lose anything, but might make a shade of profit.

6938. On the actual transaction you think it is possible a profit might be made?—Yes—not a loss anyhow, because there are jobbers who would buy it if it was not all holes, which it could not possibly be.

6939. There is an idea—how far it is correct I do not know—that fines are inflicted for either an actual or a prospective loss to the employer; are we to understand that in this case, so far as your knowledge would lead you to answer, not only would there be no loss inflicted, but that, on account of the fine from the work person's wages, an actual profit might result to the employer?—Of course, he would not say so because he would reckon he had lost so much profit.

6940. I am leaving out of consideration the question of commercial profit to the employer. At any rate, no positive loss would result, and there would be a probable profit on the transaction, leaving out of consideration the commercial profit?—Assuming it cost £2 19s. to produce the piece, and he sold it for £2 5s., and made a fine of 15s. 6d., the profit to him would be 1s. 6d. I will put it in that way.

By Mr. Maddison.

6941. With respect to fining for late coming, what would you say if instead of those fines the employer were to say that after three minutes, or whatever the time was which was fixed, the mill would not be open from half past six till seven? What would you say to that as a substitute for fines?—Do you mean as to whether that would be satisfactory from a disciplinary point of view?

6942. What would you say to that as a substitute for fines?—I think it would be very hard indeed in winter, for people who have come two or three miles, if they closed the doors absolutely and kept them outside. It would be bad for the workpeople, and not good for the employer. One or two firms do that already—they keep them out till breakfast time or till seven o'clock. It causes some to go on the spree.

6943. Therefore you would say that such a system would be worse than fines ?—Yes, I think so.

6944. Would you also say that having regard to the many things which may happen to a man or a woman, fines would also be harsh ?—Yes.

6945. With respect to the Act of 1896, I rather gather from your evidence that your union has not used it very much: am I right ?—How do you mean ?

6946. I mean to say they have not called the attention of the inspectors to the matter or insisted upon the employers conforming to its provisions ?—That is quite true. We have not used it much.

6947. Why ?—Because we did not like it at the time; we did not seem to take to it. Like the Lancashire people, we wanted to be exempt from it at the time, and did not succeed.

6948. You took part in the same agitation as the weavers ?—Yes, as the cotton people.

6949. And although it became an Act of Parliament your union did not think it worth its while to try and use it ?—No; we have gone on what is possibly the obstinate policy of saying we would not have anything to do with it if we could help it, as we did not agree with it at the time.

6950. Do you think that has been a wise policy ?—I am not very certain that it has.

6951. I gather also that your view is that any Act which left fines in existence would break down ?—I think so; or rather it would not be satisfactory.

6952. Why do you say that ?—Because in all cases the employer must be both judge and jury and the employees would have very little to say as to what is just or unjust.

6953. That is to say it would be impossible in your view for inspectors to carry out even an improved code ?—I think so; from the point of view, first of want of intimate knowledge, and second, want of a proper number of inspectors.

6954. Therefore you come to the conclusion that nothing but the total abolition of fines will be satisfactory ?—That is so.

6955. In that connection you made it plain that you would not ask Parliament to make suspensions illegal ?—Oh, no; suspensions are legal now for many things.

6956. I say you would not ask Parliament to make them illegal ?—No.

6957. I think you said because it was a right reserved to employers which could hardly be interfered with ?—That is so.

6958. But could not you conceive of occasions when suspensions might be used in a very arbitrary way, even worse than fines are ?—Occasionally, yes, but not regularly.

6959. You think that it would be more serious both to the employer and the workpeople and that therefore it would not be so often resorted to as a small fine ?—That is so.

6960. You said that since 1896 fines have been less ?—Yes.

6961. But that the fines that were imposed have not been better ?—The quantity of fines is less for alleged bad material and bad workmanship. The fines for timing in are more than they were in 1896.

6962. Then you would rather say that the increase has been for the offence, if we may call it so, of being late ?—Yes.

6963. Now take an ordinary average mill; is there a large number of fines there ?—Not a large number. In a mill with 500 people I should say there will perhaps be thirty or forty fined each week.

6964. Out of 500 ?—Yes, for late coming.

6965. Apart from late coming the percentage would be very much less ?—At a mill with about 200 weavers I should imagine that not more than five or six would be fined each week.

6966. That is rather a big percentage of late arrivals, is it not ?—Well, there are six days in the week and the limit is very small—three minutes in some cases.

6967. Now with respect to bad work, of course I know that your weavers are all on piece work ?—Yes.

6968. But have you any day work where bad work can arise ?—Yes.

6969. What is your experience with regard to fines from day workers ?—There is not as much fining among day workers by a long way as there is amongst piece workers.

6970. But there are fines amongst day workers ?—Yes. I have a case here where two girl burlers of Sowerby Bridge earned 16s.—8s. each. They were fined 5s. each, and had to pay 1s. a week till they paid it off.

By the Chairman.

6971. For what ?—This is one of those strange things—for not making the piece better. A burler is supposed to make a piece better, to improve the piece, and because these girls did not do it well enough they were fined 10s. between them, 5s. each out of 16s. joint wages. That is three weeks since.

By Mr. Maddison.

6972. I think you gave us several bobbin cases, but I have it on my notes as "the bobbin case"; that is very interesting to those of us who are not experts; you made it plain as to the two bobbins, of the same colour but different thicknesses. I suppose that piece would really be damaged ?—It would.

6973. So that there would be a loss there to the employer ?—There would be a loss of the price of a quarter of a yard to the employer. They generally work them in quarter of a yard lots.

6974. Your contention, I gather, is that defects of that kind are really incidental to working ?—Until there is perfection they cannot have perfect pieces.

6975. But I suppose you will admit that in a mill there are damages and faults which are not due to the imperfection of human nature merely—I mean there is carelessness and that sort of thing ?—That is so. There are negligent weavers, negligent foreman, negligent managers.

6976. And if there were any great repetition of that you have made it plain that you would dismiss them ?—Absolutely.

6977. Supposing that this Committee did not go so far as to recommend the total abolition of fines, what would you say to an alteration of the law by which no employer could in one week impose a fine beyond, we will say, 5 per cent. of the wages ?—I could not believe in any system of fines and therefore I could not assume that.

6978. I think you are equal to seeing the possibility of Parliament not going the whole length and yet endeavouring to minimise the risk of excessive fining; what would you then say to such a proposal as that ?—I do not think that would be satisfactory. I think it would have to be more drastic than that—more complete than that. The employer should send to the inspector a list of each fine that he inflicts each week so that the inspector may have a record of what he is doing, so that it will be a guide to future inquiries in regard to legislation.

6979. But would you not say, especially in case of girls earning very small wages, that it would be some mitigation if we could be assured that in no factory a girl could be fined, we will say, more than 6d. or 4d., or whatever we fixed upon—some low amount ?—No, I could not see any wisdom in that, or any justness in that at all.

Mr. B. Turner.

5 Dec. 1906.

6980. You think to allow a girl to be fined 3s. out of 10s., which we have had evidence of, would be no worse than to say that she should not be fined more than 3d.?—Logically you are correct in that position, but my point would be that girls and boys are not big enough to be fined. Adults are the only persons who ought to be fined, if anybody.

6981. But if they were fined ?—They had better be fined 3d. than 3s., certainly. But I do not see how you can fix your limit.

6982. I will not pursue it further. Now you said something about dining-rooms and conveniences of that kind ?—Yes.

6983. You do not include in your objection the supplying of hot water by some man told off by the firm, to whom you pay something for the hot water ?—I think it ought to be insisted upon in the Factory Acts that appliances and facilities for meals and the provision of the necessary hot water should be made by the firm free of cost. I think it is unjust to the employee to have to pay, as some of these people have to do, so much per week towards the cook and dining-room. In one case at Morley they have to pay 4½d. per week if they worked overtime and 3d. per week if they are not working overtime.

6984. You think that all factories ought to provide a cook ?—I think that all factories ought to provide appliances for getting the employees' meals ; that would include hot water of course.

6985. Suppose they employ a cook or make extra facilities, you would not object to paying for them, would you ?—If the employees were agreeable, no. But if persons do not have it they should not pay for it as they do at present There are two places I know where they have to pay whether they use it or not.

6986. What is your view with regard to deductions from wages for hospitals—I mean a regular accredited borough or county hospital, whatever it may be ?—My view is that no deductions should be made in the office unless there is complete unanimity amongst those who have the deductions made from them. It looks impossible to have unanimity. I think that is the only way, that those who have the deductions made shou'd be agreeab'e to its being done that way, 6987. Is it your experience that more money is got from the hospitals without these deductions from wages ?—Yes. Ours is voluntary. Our hospitals are supported by the workpeople. In most of our towns there are no compulsory deductions. Voluntary contributions are paid willingly and freely, and complimentary thanks are recorded each year to the mills and workshops for their support.

By Mr. Delevingne.

6988. A good deal of your evidence has gone to show that deductions are made for damage to work which is not due in any way to the fault of the worker, but due to a variety of circumstances outside the worker's control which may affect the quality of the work ?—That is so.

6989. But that nevertheless when any damage does occur the worker is frequently fined ?—Yes.

6990. I should like to direct your attention to Section 2 of the Act of 1896 which seems to limit the cases in which a deduction may be made by the employer to those cases in which the damage has been due to some act or omission on the part of the worker, and would not apparently include cases where the damage has been due to something quite oustide the worker's control ?—Could you tell me what the wording of that is ?

6991. "Provided that the deduction or payment to be made under the contract does not exceed the actual or estimated damage or loss occasioned to the employer by the act or omission of the workman" ?—Of course that is not bothered with all at by the employer or the employee. I mean to say, the deductions are made irrespective of what the actual loss may be. I gave an instance of that in the case of the light weight at Morley.

6992. I understand from what you say that the provision in this section is in practice ignored ?—It is ignored.

6993. Have any steps been taken by yourself or by your union to test cases of that kind in the courts ?—I think I mentioned a moment ago that we have to some extent ignored the Act because we wanted to be kept out of it, like the Lancashire people.

6994. As a matter of fact, has the question whether such deductions are legal or not been tested in the courts ?—Not the amount of it—not the reasonableness of it or otherwise. The question of the cause of the damage has never been discussed at all.

6996. Is it easy in most cases to assign the damage to the right cause ? Is it easy to say whether a worker is to blame or whether the yarn is to blame, or the machine, or some other cause ?—The person who assigns the damage may be the person to blame, who puts it upon somebody else. That unfortunately may sometimes be the case. It may be the fault of the overlooker or of the tuner of the loom that the damage has arisen in some of these cases. In these cases of light and heavy weights it may be his fault solely in connection with the manipulation of the loom, of which he has complete control, and over which the weaver has no control whatever.

6997. All I want to know is, is it easy to say who is to blame for the damage ?—Generally speaking, yes.

6998. One question on those cases of wrong bobbins. In the case where 10s. 6d. was taken for three wrong bobbins, was the amount deducted equivalent to the whole value of the piece damaged ?—The weaver got 16s. The cloth per yard would be from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 8d. The outside would be 2s. 8d. The 10s. 6d. was for less than a yard of cloth.

6999. I am afraid I do not follow, but all I want to know is, was the worker made to bear the whole cost of the piece of damaged cloth ?—She had to pay the whole cost of that damaged portion, and more. Have I explained it clearly enough ?

7000. No. Will you explain it a little further ?—Three bobbins of wrong weft would cover in round figures half a yard of cloth. The cloth would be sold at from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 8d. a yard. The weaver was fined 10s. 6d. The whole cost of that cloth, even supposing it was three yards long, would not be half-a-guinea. Therefore, she was fined considerably more than the cloth was valued at for the portion she had damaged. But may I put it in this way in fairness to the employers as well, that sometimes if a piece is not a complete length, if they provide 56 yards or 48 yards, as the case may be, and it is damaged in the middle, a customer may not take that cloth, and therefore there may be more damage than there seems to be on the face of it ? Therefore I would not like to say the damage is more than the actual loss to the employer. Several circumstances might arise to cover that.

7001. You say that in one or two mills a practice is growing up of dispensing with some of the menders, and compelling the weavers either to mend their own cloth or else to pay the whole cost of the wage of the mender to whom it is given ?—That is so.

7002. You see, I suppose, that compelling a weaver to mend his own piece is not making a deduction ?—No ; that is so. It is only a reduction of wages.

7003. It becomes a wage question ?—Yes.

7004. And therefore not within the Truck Acts. Do you think that practice would be likely to be extended if all deductions for damaged work were abolished ?—If all deductions for damaged work were abolished, I do not think that practice would be extended except in the very cheapest cloth trades. I think they will have to have menders, because weavers are not trained to be menders, and it is only in these cases where they are trying it on or making them pay that causes them to do it at all—I mean where they are made to pay if they do not do it themselves. I do not think it would grow if fines were abolished. I think menders would still be wanted and still be kept up ; I think more so.

7005. Sir Frederick Cawley asked you whether it would not to some extent remedy the abuses you have mentioned if a register of all deductions for damaged work was required to be kept under the Truck Acts, and you said a register was required to be kept already. I think that was not quite correct, because the provision in the Act of 1896 only applies to disciplinary fines under Section 1 of the Act, and not to deductions for damaged work or deductions for materials under Sections 2 and 3 ?—Possibly you are correct on that particular point, but I thought it was—I am not very clear on the point—that all the deductions made had to be booked and had to be open for the inspection of the inspector; but as you say, it may be only disciplinary fines.

7006. You may take it that is so. May I put to you the question which Sir Frederick Cawley put to you: would it not help to put a stop to unfair and unreasonable deductions if they were all required to be recorded in a book, and that book was either open to the inspector when he called, or, possibly, if a copy of the book were required to be sent to the inspector from time to time ?—It might have more effect if it were compulsory that each fine recorded should be sent to the inspector. I do not see that it would serve a useful purpose for the book to be open to the inspection of the inspector when there are so few inspectors. But if the employers were compelled to send every week or every month, as the case may be, a list of fines recorded, that might have some effect and be some help, both in reducing fines and also in finding out how the fine system worked later on.

7007. There would be no difficulty on the part of the employer in giving sufficient particulars ?—No, I do not think so, because it is part of his bookkeeping already. It is part of the firm's bookkeeping already; supposing a person has a piece for which he is paid 26s., and 2s. 6d. is deducted, that has to be shown somewhere from the point of view of the employer, to show his turnover, his working and management expenses. Therefore he has the information in his possession.

7008. With regard to the fining of lads and girls, you said lads will be lads, and occasionally they do things which lead to damage. Of course you admit that some discipline must be maintained over those lads ?—That is so.

7009. What would be your method ? Would you advocate the dismissal of a lad for some freak which led to damage ?—I should have some method of reprimanding him. I should not go in strongly for the dismissal of lads unless it was a very bad case. I think there is a way of getting their parents to talk to them, which would make them better lads.

7010. You think there would be methods other than fining ?—Yes, I do not think it is fair to the lad to fine him. There is a bit of old human nature in him.

By the Chairman.

7011. On the point which Mr. Delevingne has put to you, I do not suppose that you favour this system of a weekly report of fines as a substitute for actual abolition ?—No; abolition first.

7012. If fines are kept up under any category approved by the law, then you would favour a weekly report ?—Weekly or monthly, or some short time report.

7013. Would one of the advantages of that at all events be that it would put the inspector on the scent, so to speak, of an ill-regulated factory ?—It would give the inspector the knowledge of what was being done, and he could, as you suggest, visit those that he thought were fining in an unreasonable and improper way.

7014. And indeed he could go further than a general survey of the mill; he could actually, if the names of the operatives were given in that report, interview them and obtain their version of the transaction and see how the thing stood ?—He would have much more control over the subject than he can have now.

7015. This is on the assumption that fines are continued, which you do not approve of ?—That is so.

7016. But even assuming they are continued, in the event of an inspector having formed his own opinion as to a fine being improper, would you make him the arbiter to say that it should be returned without any necessity of going to law ?—I am not certain upon that point as to what would be the best course to adopt. It looks just as bad to make the inspector the arbiter as it does at the present time to make the employer the arbiter.

7017. In both cases you lose the moral advantage of the publicity of a law report ?—Yes.

7018. I will not press you upon that. Generally speaking, is your evidence to the effect that there is more damage amongst piece workers than amongst day workers ?—I should not say there is, but there is more fining amongst piece workers than amongst day workers.

7019. Take the piece worker's case: I gather that even with regard to the piece worker your view is that there may be a series of errors in the processes which have led up to the ultimate fault which is discovered ?—Yes.

7020. And it is practically the fact that the fines fall upon the last workman concerned ?—It is the piece worker who is practically the burden bearer, generally.

7021. In that way, of course, to some extent that may account for the large number of fines among piece workers ?—That is so.

7022. They bear the burden of a good number of processes ?—Yes.

7024. It would be better with regard to the output of good work ?—Yes, both with regard to efficiency and quantity.

Mr. ROWLAND BARRAN, M.P., was called; and Examined.

Mr. R. Barran, M.P.

11 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

7025. Kindly tell us, Mr. Barran, what is the name of your firm?—John Barran & Sons, Ltd.

7026. And its place of business is in Leeds?—Yes.

7027. How many workpeople do you employ of all grades and classes?—From 2,000 upwards.

7028. Are you yourself a partner in the business?—I am a director. The business has recently been converted into a limited liability company, but previously it was a private concern.

7029. Headed by your late father, Sir John Barran?—Yes, formerly. During the last years of the business as a private company, one of my brothers and myself were at the head of it.

7030. What proportion of the number of workers you have referred to are employed in the work of tailoring—the actual making up?—Probably about 150 to 200 in the cutting out, and the parts that appertain to it, and from 1,500 upwards as factory workers including the staff connected with the factory.

7031. Are they employed largely with sewing machines, or is it hand labour?—Roughly speaking, about half and half.

7032. I assume that a large part of the work is of a minute character requiring hand labour?—Yes.

7033. We have had some evidence given to this Committee referring incidentally to your firm, and it has been the desire of the Committee to have your views with regard to it. In the first place there was produced by one witness a list of fines scheduled by John Barran & Sons, Leeds. No date was given to the Committee with reference to that list of fines, and we now want, if possible, to get from you any details with regard to it?—I hand in our printed list. (List handed in.) That is a list compiled more than thirty years ago with a few subsequent alterations bringing it more up-to-date—for instance substituting electric light for gas. It is just about thirty years since I became connected with the business and the list was in existence at that time in practically the same condition. The firm to which I belong was the first to introduce the clothing trade into Leeds. The workers at that time were mill hands, and they were more or less, a rough lot, quite different from what is required in the work of a clothing factory. It was necessary to get an entirely different type of discipline from what there was in the woollen mills around. This code of rules and fines was arranged so as to bring about suitable discipline. It succeeded in doing so, and that has been the basis of the discipline adopted in all the other clothing factories in Leeds and the surrounding towns. It was at the time a little difficult to establish that discipline, but when once established it has been comparatively easy to maintain it, because the girls we employ practically maintain it themselves. We should find it impossible to have a work-hand of bad behaviour, or of doubtful character within our works. The hands themselves would not permit it.

7034. There was evidence given to us to the effect that the operatives you employ were composed of the best class of girls?—Yes, I believe that is so.

7035. Roughly speaking, this list of fines is under two categories; first, bad work, and second, coming late?—That is what in recent years it has come to. Practically most of that list has been inoperative for many years It has merely stood there as a code of regulations. In recent years doing bad work or coming late have been practically the only items in respect of which fines have actually been imposed. No doubt that list of fines looks rather irritating, and the only reply I can give to that is that during the thirty years I have been connected with the business, there has never been any friction with our workpeople on account of it. That, of course, means either that where fines have been inflicted the workpeople have assented to them as reasonable or that they have practically not been inflicted.

7036. Can you tell us whether, during the course of that time, there have been representations made by the workpeople against the code?—No.

7037. You do not recollect anything of that sort?—No.

7038. Do you happen to know whether the existence of the code and such enforcement of it as you have described has been the subject of reports to His Majesty's inspectors by way of complaint?—No. I believe that, at times, the attention of the inspector has been called to individual cases which have been brought before the partners or directors. I therefore think it would be inaccurate to say that such a thing has never occurred, but I believe the instances might be counted upon the fingers of one hand.

7039. I gather that although the list was compiled thirty years ago it still has continued at least before the eyes of the workers until now?—Oh yes.

7040. But I understand you to say that in recent years it has been reduced to the two categories of late coming or bad work?—Yes, that is so.

7041. With regard to bad work, have you found under that head that you can do as well without fines?—Yes, and I may mention that during the last fourteen months no fines whatever have been imposed. During the two previous years the fines were reduced first to £6 and then to £2.

7042. But for the last fourteen months they have been nil?—Quite so.

7043. With regard to the fines for bad work, was it difficult to estimate the amount of the fine, or was it regulated by the sheet that you have handed in?—It was not a fine in proportion to the damage.

7044. But by way of discipline?—Yes, a purely disciplinary fine.

7045. Have you had in your works any deductions from wages on account of damaged work?—That would come under a different category.

7046. Well, we can come to that later. The second head was fines for late coming. I suppose you do find from experience, don't you, that late coming has a certain disorganising effect upon the work?—Yes.

7047. I understand you started with a system of fines for late arrivals; but what do you do now in that matter?

—In the two years, 1902 and 1903, which were very busy years, the work-hands were earning good wages, and it was important to get them to the factory punctually. These were the heaviest years for fines on account of coming late, but the fines did not produce punctuality, as the girls were earning good wages and cared very little about the small fines. Finding that the fines did not secure the desired result, we tried another system. We closed the doors a quarter of an hour after the time at which work should begin morning and afternoon, and unless a work-hand had some reasonable excuse for coming late, she found the door closed for the morning, and lost her morning's work.

7048. That refers to piece workers?—Yes, that system produced the desired result, and secured greater punctuality than the fines ever did. If girls came from a distance by train and could not arrive punctually, they were given a written permit to enter a little later. That has answered the company's purpose better than the fines, and I think it is better for the work-hands themselves, than the old system of fines.

7049. Then the result of the alterations is that under the gradual abandonment of the system of fines th amount taken under that head in 1904 was £6 5s. 10½d., and in 1905, £2 8s. ½d. whereas in 1906 the fines are nil?—Yes.

7050. That applies to the 1,500 or 1,800 workers to whom you have referred?—Yes.

7051. Have these fines ever been taken by the firm into general account?—No.

7052. They seem to have been devoted towards the cost of trips?—Yes, entirely. A trip is given every year to the workpeople and the fines were placed to the credit of the trip fund.

7053. Who pays the other expenses of the trip?—The firm or company pay for the trip and it varies according to where we go. Over a period of ten years, the fines averaged about £18 a year, and the cost of the trip has averaged about £140 a year. I give here a list of the fines from 1897 to 1906 inclusive, and opposite to that list in parallel column, a note of the cost of the trips for these respective years. The list is as follows—

	Fines.				Cost of Trips.
1897.—	£12	9	9		£127	17	0
1898.—	13	13	1		100	4	0
1899.—	16	0	2		112	1	2
1900.—	34	17	3		126	11	1
1901.—	21	2	3		151	16	8
1902.—	25	5	3		180	3	11
1903.—	29	14	4		214	7	3
1904.—	6	5	10½		119	1	7
1905.—	2	8	0½		157	16	11
1906.—	Nil				183	6	3
Total	181	16	0½	Total	1,475	5	10

7054. I understand that the evidence which has been given before us with reference incidentally to your firm, has been brought under your notice?—Yes.

7055. Will you look at Q. 5326. Have you any knowledge of this trades' union sending round to the factories, and the Secretary, Miss McArthur, giving out bills asking the girls to attend a meeting?—It has not come to my personal notice.

7056. You see a statement here that everyone of the girls' pay tickets had deductions upon it; the lowest was 3s. 9d., with 7d. off for fines and deductions; did that apply to your firm, and, if so, about what date?—That I cannot tell you. I could not trace anything of the kind. Of course 7d. for fines and deductions might easily occur.

7057. Has that occurred during the last few years?—It might have occurred at any time up to fourteen months ago.

7058. In Q. 5418 there is a suggestion that 22 per cent of the wages may be taken off in fines; what do you say with regard to that?—That might occur in an individual case, although the fines might have been very small. But you will see that an average of £18 a year in fines works out to about 7s. a week, which on a pay list which sometimes goes up to £1,000 a week, is a very different proportion to 22 per cent.

7059. That is to say, out of an extensive works you might take one case of hardship, and by bringing that to a percentage produce an apparently very startling effect?—You might have a girl who really ought to have been dismissed, an impossible hand, who was fined as much as 15d. in a week; probably she would have been dismissed the next week. Such a thing is quite possible.

7060. Under your system at present I gather that is what would occur?—At the present time, we should dismiss a girl like that. That is a very much more satisfactory method of dealing with such a girl, both for herself and for her fellow-workwomen.

7061. At Q. 5449 and following there are a whole series of questions and answers apparently applicable to this list of fines?—Yes.

7062. And it is to that that your evidence as to the gradual abandonment of fines applies?—Yes. Of course the abandonment of most of these dates many years back.

7063. So I gather. Might I put it at twenty years back?—Ten years back it was as low as £12 in the year. I would not like to say that any of them have been absolutely obsolete. I could not say which have been obsolete.

7064. Take Q. 5454, "In regard to using cottons instead of linen thread, might not that cause damage or loss to the garment," and then the suggestion is that 5½d. per reel is charged when 3½d. is the price outside; what is your practice with regard to the use of sewings?—We charge all sewings at net cost, as charged to us by the manufacturer, but we disregard the fluctuations of the market. At the present time, for instance, every reel of cotton which is sold, will necessarily at the present price of cotton (which, in the raw, is just double what it was a few years ago) be sold at a net loss; but at the present time every reel of silk probably will be sold at a slight profit. A few years ago the converse would be the case. We disregard fluctuations of the market. But that is really immaterial, because when the price per dozen which a certain garment is made at is worked out, the cost of sewings is added, and it is added at the same basis as the sewing is charged to the work hand. Supposing you are going to pay 5s. a dozen for certain garments and the cotton will cost 6d., you pay 5s. 6d., and you charge 6d. for the cotton. So that it is really immaterial what the price may be, because it is added in as near a proportion as possible, to the payment made to the girl. A schedule of all sewings with the prices is hung up in a prominent place in every workroom.

7065. And would reach at the end of the transaction the same net figure?—You reach the same net figure. It is not revised over a number of years, because it would merely be irritating.

7066. Is the character of your sewing essential?—Absolutely essential. Our goods go to all parts of the world—to all the Colonies, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and every part of the world—and unless the sewings were good the trade could not be kept together. They are almost as essential as the cloth. You might almost as well say to a girl, "Go out and buy a piece of blue serge," as to say, "Go out and buy a black sewing to sew it with."

7067. The suggestion which is made that the same quality of reel could be got for 3½d. as that which is charged 5½d. for has no relation to anything ever done by your firm?—No. It is inaccurate in fact, and it does not require further comment.

7068. Will you look at Q. 5465?—That might easily have occurred at any time previously to fourteen months ago, where a girl was fined 1s. out of a total earnings of 1s. 3d. It would be a very hard thing that a girl should be there a week for that, but of course a girl might obviously have been there, on her own account, only a day.

7069. It is said that that is five weeks ago. That is obviously inaccurate?—Yes. I take it that the answer to Q. 5465 is rather interesting because that is given as a definite example. But I see he says, "I think it was five weeks since."

7070. You see Q. 5466 where the witness says that no firm should compel a girl to go at eight and stop till six, when there is no work?—That has never prevailed in our factory. If there is no work the girls go out at the even hours. They may not go out at odd times, for this reason. When the girls go out they have to pass through the dining-room to get to the cloak room to get their cloaks ; there are many cloaks hanging up in the cloak room, and, of course, if you have many hands, you cannot allow the girls to go there without anyone in charge. Therefore, if there is no work, the girls go out at each of the hours—ten, eleven, twelve ; and three, four and five in the afternoon ; they cannot go out at odd times. If a girl is kept for our own convenience, for work of a special nature which may possibly come in later in the day, we pay her time wages although she is a piecework hand ; we pay her wages for the time she is kept at our own cost, because it is for our own convenience.

7071. Now you have given us evidence with regard to the way the fines are disposed of which covers a good deal of ground of our examination. If there are any suggestions in the evidence to the effect that these fines go into the firm's pockets in the sense of being a profit to them, that obviously does not apply to a firm like your own ?—That is so. The suggestion in answer to Q. 5528 that fines would amount to £300 or £400 in the year is rather interesting. The suggestion there is that the fines of our company amount to £300 or £400 a year. I have given you ten years, which will probably be the heaviest ten years, where the average is £18 a year. Of course you will gather how far that discredits the evidence which has been given. This book of fines has been available for many years, in all its details, to the factory inspector—not the totals only, but all the details as to what every fine has been imposed for have been laid open for the factory inspector to see on his rounds.

7072. The evidence as to that large sum, perhaps £300 or £400 a year, for fines, apparently does not refer to your firm ?—That is so.

7073. Do you know any firm where there is anything like that ?—No.

7074. Have you ever heard of such a case ?—I should regard it as belonging entirely to the realm of fiction.

7075. Or of ancient history, at any rate ?—No ; to pure, very interesting, fiction.

7076. Now we pass on to Q. 5658 ?—It is said that the girls come to us for pastime. Well, the number of hands varies from 1,500 to 1,700, perhaps a little less or more. The wage sheet often runs up to £1,000 a week. I think the idea that 1,700 girls come to us for pastime may be described as belonging to the realms of fiction.

7077. You see the evidence at Q. 5659, about the girls being compelled to go there at a certain time and not being allowed to leave before night except for meals ; what you have already told us as to your practice covers that ?—It covers that.

7078. Will you turn to Q. 5729 ? The witness under examination was asked by me to put in the documents, as you will see ?—Yes.

7079. And she put in a list of fines and deductions of your firm. " That is particularly interesting because that is a model factory ; they say that no girl can be employed who is not moral, and everything has to be very respectable." The evidence is recorded, and we must take it as we find it, but so far as the character of your girls is concerned, that is accurate ?—That is accurate.

7080. They are good girls ?—Yes.

7081. And well-behaved girls ?—Absolutely.

7082-7083. And come of a good stock, apparently ?—Yes ; their own discipline is excellent.

7084. And so far as this list of fines is concerned, it is the list originally compiled thirty years ago and is now, totally discarded ?—That is so.

7085. Now in Q. 5953 there is a suggestion that the employees are threatened that if they do not take a certain wage the work will be sent out to be done by a middleman. The witness says that there is a certain kind of work which the girls are not capable of doing at certain times. Do you employ middlemen in connection with your firm at all ?—Yes.

7086. Will you tell us how that system works ? Give us a description of it ?—There is a class of work which is of too heavy a nature for the English work girl to do. They are large garments—you might, for instance, take men's motor coats as an extreme case. These are done very largely by machinsts who are men. All the machinists who work in our factory are women. The male machinists are almost always Jews. They work in workshops where they have almost entirely men machinists. The smaller parts are done by women, who may be Jews or Christians, they are a good deal mixed up in the subsidiary factories That heavy class of work (which is better dealt with in that way, the Jews having been specially engaged in it in all times) is not really in competition with the work in the factory. The idea suggested here that work could be taken from the girls inside and done outside, or that work could be taken from outside and brought inside, is not accurate, because they are rather different types of work. That heavy work is mostly given out to middlemen who do it in smaller factories. In our case it is entirely done in factories. We have not had a single garment for a great many years which has gone into the homes of the people. We had at one time.

7087. In short, you have no outworkers in the ordinary sense of the word ?—No, absolutely none. We had some years ago, and some we took into the works ; any that we could not take into the works we pensioned. We had for some time a very large pension list. When we discontinued that, we pensioned off every hand that we could not take inside, for life. That is a good many years ago. All the work that is done for us now is therefore under the inspection of the factory inspector.

7088. I should put to you the list of fines and deductions which has been given to us ?—May I see that ? (The list was handed to the Witness.)

7089. At what date does it begin ?—This begins in 1902 and ends in 1904.

7090. I do not recollect how that was got, but substantially it appears to be correct, does it not ?—I do not know.

7091. It does not look a very large amount ?—This probably totals up to the figures I have given you. I cannot say whether it is correct or not without totalling it up, but, as I say, the fine book has been available to the factory inspector, and therefore available to anyone else.

7092. The other matter arising out of this which I wanted to ask you about was with regard to deductions ? —Deductions, of course, may be sewings.

7093. That is what we want to get at ?—That is another point.

7094. Will you tell us about that ? What is your system with regard to deductions ?—The deductions for sewings are taken at the same time as wages are paid. Whether they are two transactions, or one transaction I cannot actually say. I did not know that I was going to be asked that. But they are carried on at the same time. That is, supposing that a girl is paid 14s. 9d. in wages and the sewings amount to 9d. or 10½d., that amount would be deducted at the same time that the wages are paid.

7095. That is with regard to the thread which you were referring to ?—Yes, thread, silk, cotton.

7097. Yes. I fancy you would strike a net wage which would bring out the same financial result ?—I really do not think that in our trade it would signify much. We should have to provide the sewings and pay a less wage. The only thing, of course, would be that there would be a slight tendency to wastefulness. But I do not think that that is so important as it was twenty or thirty years ago. I do not think it is an important item. One is bound to admit that the effect of the higher education of this class of girl has made the management of a factory an absolutely different thing from what it was thirty years ago. We should have no objection whatever to the absolute abolition or prohibition of fines. Provided that we could insist by some method upon having our own sewings used ; so that we did not fear the deterioration of our goods ; we should not object to any prohibition of deductions even for sewings. That is so far as my own trade is concerned.

7098. Then with regard to deductions for the cook and for benevolence I suppose they would work out in the same way ?—For the cook ?

7099. Yes ?—There is no deduction for the cook that I am aware of.

7100. It is said that there is. Will you just look at this, please ?—(Document handed to Witness.)—"C. cook ; B. benevolence ; F. fines." We have neither deduction for a cook nor for benevolence. We provide cooks, and we provide tea, and we cook the meals for the girls.

7101. Is there a charge made for that ?—A charge is made for the tea. The cooking is nominally done for nothing. The charge is made for the tea or cocoa There is the cost of the cooks, and, I believe, on the year there is possibly a slight balance either one way or the other on the kitchen. The girls declined to take the thing over as a club. We have rather urged them to do so—we should much prefer them to do so—but they have declined to take it over ; they say it is so satisfactory at present that they will not consider any alteration.

7102. Are they charged for it whether they take it or not ?—Oh no ; they buy it over the counter. They go and pay their penny, for which they get three pint mugs of tea. They buy it as they like. We provide a very good dining-room, and, whether a girl buys her tea or not, she can get her meal cooked free. If she likes, to buy a mug of tea or cocoa she can do so. They bring their meals in little earthenware dishes which are put into ovens and heated in that way. We do not deduct anything for benevolence. As a matter of fact, they do raise a very large sum, varying between £60 and £100 a year, for medical charities. Then they give an entertainment. This rather gives you an idea of the character of the work-hands. They give a dramatic performance, with songs and recitations, and fill a hall holding 800 people for two nights, and they raise a large sum which they use in buying tickets for convalescent homes for themselves. That is all done outside us. The whole of their benevolence is done entirely outside the firm, they merely ask us to come in and preside, but we have nothing to do with it. That is in the nature of a club.

7103. I will ask you a more general question. Suppose there was a system with regard to cooking established in a certain firm (which shall be nameless) whereby the work was carried on in this way: that every person employed was bound to pay, by a deduction from the wages, for the supply of hot water, or the cook's wages, irrespective of whether they took advantage of the facilities offered or not; would you approve or disapprove of that ?—Such a thing I should say should be prevented by law, distinctly.

7104. You can see that it limits the freedom of the workpeople ?—Undoubtedly.

7105. And besides, you think that upon the whole there can be excellent management without any devices of that kind ?—Yes. We should not in any way oppose the prohibition of fines.

7106. And there can be excellent management without deductions, in the sense which you have described ?—Yes. We should not oppose the prohibition of deductions. In regard to that, I only speak for my own firm. I cannot speak with regard to weaving, or with regard to the mills. The details vary so much. But in any firm in our trade, discipline can at the present time be kept up without fines.

By Mrs. Tennant.

7107. I understand that the list of fines which you hand in, as now hung up in your factory, is in fact the same as the list of fines which was handed to us by the witness whose evidence is under discussion ?—I cannot say.

7108. They do correspond exactly. The list is in the evidence which I gather has been submitted to you ?—I did not check them off, but I presume they agree.

7109. It shows there are twenty-one items, eighteen of which involve a fine. I have compared them, and there are twenty-one ?—I have no doubt they are the same. There are hundreds of these books in circulation and there is no object in giving any but the right one. It is posted up in every room and is at the beginning of every wage book or has been until recently. They are not now printed in new wage books. I believe as a matter of fact that a good many of the old wage books are about still—probably the majority of them.

7110. I see at the foot of this list a space for the signature of the worker which says that she agrees to be bound by the above rules ?—Yes. Mr. R. Barran, M.P. 11 Dec. 1906.

7111. Does she still sign that to-day ?—I should think so. I should think probably that is where her name is in the book. The name must be in the book somewhere.

7112. You do in fact really ask her to sign this ?—No ; we do not ask her to sign that to-day—not since the fines have been abolished. Up to fourteen months ago, she would undoubtedly have been asked to sign that.

7113. But yet I understand this list is hung up in the factory ?—Yes ; that list is hung up in the factory at the present time. As a matter of fact, it has never been taken down.

7114. Is it not apt to lead to a certain amount of misunderstanding that the list should be hung up, while you do not wish anybody to follow it ?—You see, we do wish that as a code of behaviour. But of course it should not be hung up. Fourteen months ago, when fines were abolished, the list should have been revised, and hung up without the fines upon it, obviously.

7115. It is reasonable for a witness to put in as a current list of fines what is actually on the wall of the factory ?—Yes, unless that witness is aware that they have been discontinued. If a witness professes to be in touch with the work-people, and knows that as a matter of fact some months ago—more than a year ago—all fines were discontinued, it is scarcely honest to put that in as a list of fines which are exacted to-day.

7116. But it looks as if there must be some mistake, because one of the witnesses, whom the Chairman mentioned, spoke of a fine which was imposed about five weeks ago, according to his impression. Even allowing for some mistake—say it was seven or eight weeks ago—it is yet current ?—He says he thinks it was about five weeks ago. If he had left out the words "I think," I should have said it was an untruth. The books are entirely open to anyone that this Committee may like to send down to make any enquiries they like. No fine has been exacted for fourteen months. That is a matter beyond all doubt. So that a statement of that kind is merely unimportant.

7117. Are you satisfied that a foreman could not have imposed a fine without your knowledge ?—Oh, absolutely.

7118. So that you are positive that the statement of a fine having imposed within the last fourteen months must be a mistake ?—Yes. Of course the thing is very easily proved because all the books can be produced. They cannot produce a book with a fine in it for fourteen months.

7119. Are the fines entered in the books ?—The fines are deducted by the clerk. No foreman has any power ; no foreman can impose a fine or do anything without putting it into a book. Those books are as accurately kept as ledgers. If a foreman himself imposed a fine and took it from a girl he would not only be dismissed, but he would be prosecuted. That would be a case of common theft.

7120. You do not think that a foreman, seeing the list up, actually hanging on the wall—perhaps a new foreman—would be misled by that and impose a fine according to the list ?—A new foreman scarcely exists. A man is not made a foreman until he has been in our employ for a long time.

7121. You do not think that it puts a foreman in a position of difficulty—that he may find it hard to reconcile the fact that he is not to impose a fine with the fact that instructions to impose it are hanging on the wall ?—If you are leading to the point that the list should have been revised and should have been taken down, I am absolutely with you.

7122. No ; I am not leading to that point ; I am taking the point that a foreman seeing the list there might, without your knowledge, have imposed a fine ?—No, it is impossible ; he has no power. No foreman ever did impose a fine. The only thing he can do is to enter a fine on the girl's book. No fine can be paid except through a book, which is as carefully kept as the ledger, and which can only be taken, not by the foreman but by the clerk at the end of the week The foreman has nothing to do with the payment ; the payment is taken by the clerk.

Mr. R. Barran, M.P.

7123. Do you include wrong sewings under bad work or under what head do you place them ?—Deliberately using wrong sewings ?

7124. I do not think the witness's statement suggested their deliberate use. It is "Any work-hand using wrong sewings such as cotton instead of linen thread" ?—That would be treated by a warning, and if persisted in deliberately or carelessly—it might be done deliberately of course, because it would be a great saving—that would be dishonesty. For a girl to use cotton instead of thread or silk persistently would be dishonest, and that of course would be treated by dismissal. To do it carelessly would be equally detrimental to the work and would eventually have to be treated by dismissal also.

7125. In the interval would there be a fine ?—No. Fines are absolutely discontinued.

7126. I want to ascertain whether you regard that as a case of damage to the work ?—No; we should regard that as a breach of discipline. No deduction would be made for that.

7127. I put the question because I do understand from you that you would consider that work was damaged by the inclusion of cotton instead of linen ?—Oh yes.

7128. So that it would be open to you to consider it as damaged work or as a breach of discipline ?—Quite so. It would be considered as a breach of discipline. No deduction would be made for it.

7129. I think you said you have had no representations from the workpeople themselves as to their dislike of the system of fining ? What brought you to the conclusion that it had better be abandoned ?—Practically the failure of fines to produce punctual attendance. We then tried the other system. Unpunctual attendance covered the great majority of the fines, and then it was not worth while to retain any. I think that in recent years a general feeling has been growing up that fines are ineffectual and rather irritating. I think there is that feeling.

7130. Now on another point evidence has been given as to the girls not being able to leave, even though there is no work for them, and you said that girls are sometimes kept for your own convenience ?—Yes.

7131. And that when they are so kept they stay at your expense ?—Yes.

7132. Can you explain what you mean by your own convenience ?—Supposing there was no work, or very little work, in the department in the morning, and the girl had finished her work and there was no probability of more work coming from the cutting room before noon, she would be allowed to go at ten, eleven, or twelve. Supposing a girl came at half-past eight to finish the job which she had the day before, and had finished it by half-past nine; she would say to the foreman," "Is there any more work ?" He would say, "Not before noon." Then at ten o'clock she could go. If she has finished at a quarter past nine she must stay there from a quarter past nine till ten o'clock; that is at the most three-quarters of an hour. At ten o'clock the door is opened, and those who have no work, or know that no work will come before the mid-day meal, are allowed to go. Suppose the foreman says, "I have got certain work coming in this afternoon at five o'clock, and it will take an hour to do, it will be finished by six o'clock. I want you to remain until five and finish this piece of work, because it must go away to-night," then he would say, "I will pay you at the rate of 1d. an hour;" (or 2d., 3d., 4d., 5d., an hour, as the case may be, whatever her work may be worth on the average, roughly)—"I want you to stay, and you shall have your afternoon's wage." That is a very exceptional thing. That does not apply to bulk goods; it applies to a small single article which some customer wants sent off that night.

7133. You consider that to be for the convenience of the firm ?—That is for the convenience of the firm. It is not a paying piece of work for anyone. It is a matter of convenience, and in order to oblige a customer, we pay a hand to stop and do it.

7134. In the illustration you give, the foreman says he expects the work to be done by six o'clock. Perhaps he says that at ten o'clock. Is there any reason why the girl should not come back at five o'clock ?—You cannot tell when it may come. The foreman says it will come during the afternoon. He cannot tell exactly when it will come.

7135. Would not an experienced foreman be able to calculate how long a certain piece of work would take ?—He could not tell when it would arrive.

7136. Could he not tell how long it would take to do ?—The question is when you will get it from the other part of the factory.

7137. Surely somebody in the factory knows how long that work will take, otherwise it would be impossible to conduct the work of a big factory ?—It is very difficult to conduct the work of a big factory.

7138. Would it be possible, if you cannot make a calculation ?—You make a calculation, but it may be falsified altogether. It is falsified every day. Every week you promise a hundred things which are never fulfilled.

7139. There is a statement by one witness that girls go to the factory for pastime; I agree that that is hardly an exact statement with regard to work in any factory, but on the other hand there is evidence directed towards proving that the girls employed in your factory are of rather a higher class than the girls who are actually dependent for their living upon their occupation ?—There are a great many daughters of the foremen engineers and higher paid artisans of that kind who come to our factory simply because they know the general tone that prevails there; they send them there with satisfaction. Of course that means they do a higher class of work, and it is very well paid. I believe that the work in our factory is paid for at a higher rate, for what it is, than in any clothing factory in the country Perhaps I ought not to say that it is paid more highly, but at any rate I will go so far as to say that it is on a level with the highest. Garment for garment, there is no factory in the country that pays a higher rate of wage for the work done than we do. The general tone of the work we do is also the best in the country.

7140. What do you regard as the average rate of wages ?—That is a very difficult thing to say, because we always have some hundreds of learners. A learner learns from another girl and she pays her a certain proportion of her first week or two's wages. Learners of course earn very small wages for many weeks. Then, when they reach a certain age they get married. Very few come back to work after they are married, very few indeed, because they are in a class of life where they do not need to work, as a rule, after marriage. Therefore, we have a very large proportion always filling up; we engage many hundreds of hands every year simply to replace those who marry. So that it would be a very difficult thing to say what the average might be.

7141. I can quite see that. Would the wages of 3s.9d. from which the fine of 7d. was deducted—I suppose more than fourteen months ago—have been the wages of a learner ? Must they have been the wages of a learner ?—Presumably. And the learner is one who would most likely be to be fined, obviously. When a girl has been there some time and has got beyond the learner's stage, she does not need fining.

7142. You would not consider that the mistake which she was likely to make as a learner would be really set off by the low wages which she was getting as a learner ?—I do not follow you.

7143. You do not expect a learner to be doing good work, and therefore you do not give her good wages: would you not consider that as a set off against a mistake which she made ?—She gets precisely the same wages. She is given a bundle which is marked at a certain price, and she is paid exactly the same price as the oldest hand in the place. The only thing is, she does not do it so quickly; that is why she gets a less wage.

7144. She is not allowed a certain number of mistakes ? It is not assumed that as a learner she must make a certain number of mistakes ?—These are more or less disciplinary. Oh yes, if a girl first of all used cotton instead of threads she would probably be allowed to do it half-a-dozen times before she would be fined for it.

7145. You cannot give an idea of the average, but would you say to what the wages run ?—They run up to 35s. or 40s. A very large number of them in busy times earn £1, and a great many hundreds earn over

15s. a week. If you were to take the full hands, you would often find that between 700 and 1,000 earn over 15s. a week.

7146. Out of the 2,000 ?—Out of 1,700. And you would find many learners who would be pretty low. I am speaking entirely offhand, without any figures, which is rather a dangerous thing to do.

7147. I understand you are speaking entirely from memory ?—It is not from memory ; it is rather a question of estimation, of impression.

By Mr. Walsh.

7148. You say that this list of fines was in existence about thirty years ago ?—Subject to variations, such as the electric light and things of that sort, which have been added, that was in existence thirty years ago.

7149. The schedule itself ?—The schedule itself.

7150. The firm came into existence more than thirty years ago ?—More than fifty years ago. I should think nearly sixty years ago. The list might go back fifty years, but I decline to speak for more than thirty years. That is as far as I go back in the history of the firm.

7151. How long is it since the idea developed that fines were really ineffectual ?—The fines with us have always been kept down at a minimum. We have always regarded them as an undesirable thing excepting the two that I mentioned. The matter has been considered at intervals. The question that has developed recently is the question of coming late. Now, if one is slack, if there is very little work, it does not matter whether they come late or not. If one is busy, one wants them to be punctual. But if one is busy they are earning good wages, and they do not care about a few fines at all. They are doing well, and they pay the fine readily. So that we came to the conclusion that when we were slack it did not signify, and when we were busy it did not answer.

7152. That is just exactly the point I was going to put to you. Are we to understand that in the slack season it would really be almost an injustice to fine the girls ?—We never fined them in the slack season.

7153. And in the busy season they would not really feel it ?—They did not feel it.

7154. So that the reason for the existence of fines practically disappears in both cases ?—Yes. I think it would have been a wise thing if the whole list had been swept away ten or fifteen years ago ; I do not hesitate to say so. And if it had been anything but a dead letter, if it had been active, if it had been annoying, we should have heard so much about it that we should undoubtedly have been practically influenced to sweep it away then. The fact that it has been very slight, that there has been very little annoyance, is the reason why it remained.

7155. Have you had a continuous period of pretty good business ? I am not speaking of your firm, but of your trade generally. Has the period been one of fairly continuous activity ?—There have been depressions, but it has been an increasing trade for a good many years.

7156. Because I notice that right away from 1897 down to 1903, seven complete years, the fines have been on the increase ?—That, of course, would mean an increase in the number of hands.

7157. I do not know ; I am not quite so sure about that. Looking at the cost of the annual trip, there seems to have been on one or two occasions a fall in the number of hands, while there has been a very heavy rise in the amount of the fines ?—The fines mean the busy years. £12 in 1897 probably means a slack year. The four years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903 mean four very busy years.

7158. The point I wish to elucidate is this. From 1903 to 1905 there is a tremendous fall—from £29 to £2 ; did the light dawn suddenly upon the employers ?—Oh, no ; I thought I had explained that. I am sorry I have not made myself clear. From 1903, after we had found that fines did not conduce to punctuality, we practically dropped fines.

7159. The decision was come to suddenly ?—The decision at the end of 1903 practically was to see whether we could do without fines altogether. 1903, for all practical purposes meant the end of fines. I stated to the Committee that no fines had been exacted for the last fourteen months. I might have stated that fines have been practically a dead letter since 1903, because the two remaining years, 1904 and 1905, are infinitesimal in regard to fines ; but they were not actually wiped off the books till 1905. But those two years do not represent the carrying out of the old system of fines. The end of fines was in 1903.

7160. I think you will see that from 1900, when you had £34, to 1902 when you had £25, and 1903 when you had £29, there seems to be rather an increase in that last year ?—They represented four busy years, when it was desirable to get the work hands there.

7161. But as a result, you found that the fines really did not bring the discipline you desired ?—It did not. You are quite right. If you check off those four years you will find there were more work hands there, and the trip consequently ran up also. That shows there were more work hands.

7162. Yes, I quite see that ?—Now, you will find more work hands again, according to the trip, in 1905 and 1906. In 1906, you reach £180. That means more work hands. £157 is also high. That is uninfluenced by the fines because they were practically abolished.

7163. These certainly seem very small items compared with the heavy list of wages paid, running up to £1,000 a week. Do you think there would be any way whereby deductions would be made from the wages of the workpeople that would not be classed in this list at all ?—Nothing but sewings.

7164. For instance, you do not think there would be any offence which a work person might have committed for which a deduction would be made from the wages, so that the work person would only receive the net wages ?—It is not a question of thinking ; I am absolutely as sure of that as I am of the balance in the ledger. It is the same class of book keeping.

7165. It is difficult to understand how such a broad complaint should have been made if for the past two or three years this is almost the entire total ?—Yes. Many of the statements made in that evidence are untruthful and dishonest—the statements are untruthful and the inferences are dishonest. I must put it courteously but plainly. That is the result of my reading of the evidence.

7166. Of course that is certainly a very emphatic contradiction. That is the reason I desire to be clear as to what you say ?—I should be glad for a clerk of the office to come down and go into an examination of the figures which I have given to the Committee.

7167. My knowledge of certain industries enables me to state that sometimes by arrangement with the firm or an official a certain deduction is made from wages for a particular fault committed, or alleged to have been committed, and of course as a matter of fact the work person then only receives the net wages. Such a thing as that could not happen in your place ?—Are you speaking of a case where some garment is damaged ?

7168. Yes, or some offence is committed—not necessarily a damaged garment, but matters of discipline ?—I am only dealing with disciplinary offences ; I am not dealing with damaged garments ; but even damaged garments or anythng of that kind must appear in the wage book. No deduction can be, or ever has been, made in our factory which did not appear in the wage book, and was not open to the factory inspector's supervision. That is definite and clear.

7169. I understand that the prospect of dismissal is in your opinion quite sufficient to produce a high standard of discipline ?—Quite ; I think it is the most satisfactory.

7170. And you do not fine at all now ?—That is so.

7171. You find that "the honour of the regiment," the higher motive, appeals to the girls, and that brings about the high standard of discipline which exists in your place?—That is what has really kept them together for the whole of the time I have been there. It has done far more even than the list of instructions. That is the thing we have all along relied upon.

7172. So that the appeal to the honour of the workpeople, and, in the second place, the fear of dismissal have both operated upon the workers and have combined to produce and to retain a high standard of discipline far better than the system of fines?—Yes. The system of fines has in recent years been almost entirely with regard to time keeping. I do not mean to say that a high standard of esprit de corps brings anyone early; that is a question of what time they get up. There is a version of an old proverb—"Many are called but few get up." A large percentage of the fines has arisen from that particular version of the proverb.

11 Dec. 1906.

7173. Do you not think that after all a girl would sooner or later feel a sense of shame in coming constantly late even if dismissal did not follow?—Oh, I do not know. I should not like to generalise with regard to the practice of getting up late.

By Mr. Maddison.

7174. It is obvious that we are faced with a difficulty; we have conflicting evidence between the previous witness and yourself. With respect to the deduction for sewings, of which you have told us, would it be possible that those deductions would account somewhat for the amount which has been given as fines in the previous witness's evidence?—Oh, yes; they might easily mix them up. But they ought not to mix them up. Anyone who professes to know the trade ought not to mix them up. They would be marked distinctly "sewings" and "fines."

7175. In the book sewings would be distinguished from fines; they would not be put together?—No, certainly not.

7176. Averages are awkward things to give, I know, but what would a girl have in the way of deductions for sewings?—One cannot give any average. A girl might buy a reel of cotton this week and it might take her six months to use it.

7177. What about cottons and commoner things?—She might buy three or four reels of cotton of different colours in a week, and it might take her many weeks to use them up.

7178. Roughly speaking, about what amount of deductions in a year would a girl have for sewings?—I really could not tell you the proportion of those.

7179. Would it amount to £2?—I have no idea what the sewings amount to; you see, they vary so enormously. You have a girl of fourteen, just fresh from school, who is doing nothing but sewing on buttons with cotton; and you have a woman of twenty or twenty-five who is doing the best work with silk; it is an impossibility to give an average.

7180. I saw the difficulty. But if by any blunder—I admit a very awkward blunder for a witness to make—the witness had added the two together—deductions for sewings with fines—he would get, during the time you fined, a pretty large amount?—If he added sewings and fines he could.

7181. You said that while you had these fines you never had any friction and that seemed to you to be evidence that fines were never excessive?—I do not say that no girl ever objected to the system of fines; I mean that generally from the workpeople we found no objection. We had no friction in the nature of a strike or anything of that kind, or any deputation whatever asking for fines to be discontinued.

7182. In your factory, is there very much chance of any friction arising among the girls expressing itself?—How do you mean? Do you mean do they talk to us about things?

7183. Yes.—Oh, they do, freely. When garments are put at certain prices they go to the director who manages the factory and say, "We think you have put these too low; we cannot do well at that price." There is no difficulty in discussing a matter like that.

7184. Do they do that except by individual complaints? In a word, is there anything like a committee amongst the girls who speak as representatives?—No, but there are the leaders in every room practically who discuss matters as they arise freely with the factory manager.

7185. May I ask you if any of the girls, or anyone in your factory, belongs to a Union?—I do not know that there is a Woman's Union. Many of the men are in the trades union.

7186. We were told by the previous witness that the women were eligible as members of the union, but I think he said there were not many in it?—I cannot say. We never enquire.

7187. You would not object to the girls being in a union?—Not in the least. Many of the men are.

7188. I am anxious to know if during these fourteen months you have had to fall back at all upon suspensions, I mean as an alternative to dismissal?—Not suspension except by the closing of the door.

7189. That is a separate thing?—There have been no suspensions.

7190. During these fourteen months, what has your experience been as to the number of girls you have had to dismiss, dismissal now being your only alternative to warning and caution?—I could not tell you how many have been dismissed.

7191. Would you think a larger number than in a similar period before? Has the abolition of fines led to more girls being dismissed?—No, I should doubt it very much. I should say there has been no appreciable change in any way made in the place in that regard by the abolition of fines.

7192. You have not come across cases of hardship where you thought you wished that you had not to dismiss a girl, but had to do so because you had no system of fines to fall back upon?—We might have done, but one always comes across those cases.

7193. You have not experienced that more during the last fourteen months than previously?—No, I do not think so.

7194. So that the abolition of fines has not, in your opinion, resulted in a large number of dismissals?—Oh no, certainly not.

7195. You are aware that the witness, while giving evidence which you have characterised as untruthful and dishonest, did, right through, pay a very high compliment to your factory, and to the sort of girl there?—Yes.

7196. I think he said that your girls were drawn from a certain class; I almost thought he said from the Nonconformist section?—Oh no, nothing of the kind.

7197. They come to your factory in the ordinary way?—Yes, hundreds and hundreds of them. They belong as much to one class as to another.

7198. Although you have no fines now, do you still prevent girls going out into the street without having their bonnets on?—Certainly. That question never arises. They do not want to.

7199. You still keep that up?—Yes.

7200. And it is kept up as well without fines?—Yes just as well.

7201. You said that all factories had followed your lead: you were speaking about Leeds, were you not?—No. I said that our discipline had formed the basis of other factories. Our system of discipline has formed the basis for other factories in Leeds; it has also formed the basis for other factories in Leicester and Nottingham.

7202. I have understood your evidence to be that you have abolished fines: have you abolished deductions for damaged goods?—No; we have abolished fines, and deductions for using wrong sewings.

7203. Is there any deduction remaining for damaged work?—If work is carelessly damaged; if there is actual damage to work, as for instance a girl upsetting her oilcan over a suit, an accident of that kind is not a question of fine.

7204. Take a case like that, because that is one of the cases mentioned by the witness. What happens under your present system if a girl upsets her oilcan over a garment and does serious damage to it?—Well, the girl would probably be charged some share of the damage done.

7205. Then a deduction is made?—In that case.

7206. Which is not in this list?—A deduction is made which is not in the nature of a fine.

7207. Which would not be in this list?—Yes.

7208. Could you give me any idea of the amount of the deductions which ought to be added to this to get the amount of fines and deductions?—I am not sure that there are any.

7209. It is rather important. You have evidently not looked that matter up?—No. It is not a matter that arises. The damaged goods in those departments are practically nil, I think. I will look that matter up, and see what they are.

7210. Pursuing that point, is any provision included in your contract with the workers, or in your notice which is posted up, with regard to deductions for damage to work?—No; there are no notices of that kind. I am not sure whether there is anything on the second page of that list which you have there.

7211. When the Truck Act of 1896 came into force, did you make any addition to your list to meet the provisions of Section 2 which relate to that very matter?—May I ask if there is anything on the second page of that list?

7212. I see in this list this item appears: "Bad work which cannot be altered: damages to and loss of materials to be paid for by the work hand?"—Is that made illegal by the 1896 Act?

7213. Unless certain conditions are complied with?—That is at the end of that book.

By the Chairman.

7214. It would be illegal unless you had it specified by way of contract with the workers, but you seem to have it specified in the contract; is not that so?—That is so. It is specified that damaged work is to be dealt with in that way.

By Mr. Delevingne.

7215. I was going to ask the witness whether he has borne in mind the conditions imposed in Section 2, that the deduction must be fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and also that it must not exceed the actual or estimated damage or loss occasioned to the employer by the act or omission of the workman. Neither of those conditions appear in the contract, and it suggests itself to me that this list is not such a contract as is contemplated by the Act.

By the Chairman.

7216. I have some doubt about your law. The deductions do not require to be put in the contract; they require to be "fair and reasonable," in fact.

By the Witness.

7217. This is put in as part of the contract which is signed: "Bad work which cannot be altered: damages to and loss of materials to be paid for by the work hand." That is part of the contract which has to be signed. I will look up the question of how far they are included in the fines and how far they are outside.

By Mr. Delevingne.

7218. On the quesion of materials, what advantage have you seen in continuing your present system of deduction for sewings, first charging the worker and then adding the charge to the price paid? What was the object of it?—The object of it is that a worker shall be economical in the use of her sewings. That is the sole object. Everything is given out in exact quantities, and they use exactly what is given.

7219. I quite follow the point. I was going to put this further question. You mentioned that it was possible for a reel of silk to be in a girl's possession for six months before she had finished it: supposing deductions for sewings were abolished, and that you simply provide the materials and make no charge for them, how would you deal with a case like that?—The sewings then would have to be kept and would belong to the company.

7220. Your point is that the present system is a check on wastefulness?—Yes.

7221. In a case like that, what action do you think you would take to prevent wastefulness in the use of a reel of silk?—It would need rather an elaborate system of booking every reel that went out. Suppose a girl is leaving for any reason, you would have to look at her book to see what sewings she possessed and how much had been used. It would be an absolute impossibility.

7222. You see some difficulty in your exercising a check upon waste?—It would mean you would practically give your girls all the sewings, and as the silks are a very expensive item, it might lead to great wastefulness, and it might also be a temptation to dishonesty. At present if a girl takes her silk away and uses it at home, it is not of any consequence to us whatever; if a girl uses her silk at odd times when waiting for work, it is of no consequence to us. But on the other system that would be transformed into a dishonest act.

7223. Would it be possible for you to prevent it?—It would be impossible for us to prevent it. I do not think it would have a good tendency, but if it was felt that the danger on the other side was great, I should pass it. It is a much more important matter from the point of view of discipline for the girls themselves than it is with regard to cost or trouble to the employer. It is not a question that interests us as employers at all. To put it candidly, on the turnover which we have a loss of £100 a year in silk wasted or stolen would be of no consequence—it would be of no consequence if we made £100 less profit—but with regard to discipline I think it would be bad.

7224. With regard to your present system of dealing with unpunctuality, can you give us any idea of the number of cases in which girls are shut out for half a day?—No, it is not many. It is very few. It brings them in. It is effective.

By Mr. Yarrow.

7225. I think you told us in the first part of your evidence that you had to resort to fines because the girls were at that time a very rough lot?—That is so.

7226. Then you found one effect of these fines was that you got better discipline?—Yes. We drew a class of hands who would adopt that discipline. It was never effected so much by the fine itself, as that we drew the the kind of hand who was willing to adopt that form of discipline.

7227. I suppose there are many factories where the girls would be about the same rough lot as you had formerly, in different industries?—I do not think any of them are as rough as they were 50 years ago.

7228. But they would be rough?—Yes, rough compared with ours. A mill hand with a shawl over her head is much rougher.

7229. It might be that fines for that class would be very necessary?—I am not sure that they require quite the same discipline in a mill as we require. They are not dealing with the same fine work.

7230. But I suppose with regard to punctuality, that would be even more necessary?—Yes; but as regards the ordinary discipline of a place, it is very different in a mill from what it is in a place like ours.

7231. Evidently your girls are a good lot?—Yes, it is a work which needs intelligence.

7232. You say that when they get married they do not return to work; that is evidence that they can manage to get along without working?—Yes, most of them.

7232. In most places they could not?—No. The factory hand very largely works after marriage.

7234. Your girls are evidently of a very much better class than in many industries?—Yes.

7235. The better the class, naturally the penalty or the form of penalty would vary?—Yes.

7236. With regard to the list of fines which you have stuck up, as it appears to have led to some controversy as to what is in vogue now, may I ask if you will take that down?—None of them have been printed for more than a year.

7237. But they are stuck up in the factory?—Yes.

7238. Will you take them down?—Certainly. We shall put up in their place rules for discipline which will be more or less similar. They will be revised and brought up to date, but rules of discipline will be put up, to replace the fine list, as an indication of what is desired.

7239. You have now a class of girls with whom the system of shutting out for a quarter of an hour after the bell rings, by which they suffer the penalty of not working for that time, combined with the power of dismissal, answers the purpose of maintaining discipline?—Entirely.

7240. If the Committee thought it well to advise that being made the law, and Parliament thought it well to follow their advice, do you think that many firms would resent it?—Do I think that some firms would resent the abolition of fines? That is rather a delicate question. That is rather asking my view of some of my competitors. I think some of them would resent it.

11 Dec. 1906.

7241. Of course everybody thinks they can manage their own business best?—I think the more they resent it, the more necessary the legislation is.

7243. Yes, if it is found a good thing, and you get discipline in such a simple way, without the friction which fines must naturally involve, I do not understand why they do not do it?—I can scarcely criticise them, as I admit we have been rather late in doing it ourselves. Fines have been practically a dead letter, with one exception, for ten or fifteen years, and yet we have never abolished them till recently.

7244. Perhaps it is owing to your having a better class of girl, better educated and better disciplined, that this system answers the purpose, while formerly it would not?—Yes. I think in many cases, as in our own case, the list has not been withdrawn because for years practically no attention has ever been called to it.

By the Chairman.

7245. I gather that you incline to the opinion that the general leaven of education is in the direction of making discipline more effective?—Undoubtedly; it has been the main factor.

7246. And you think, without actual personal experience, that that would apply pretty well all round to a certain extent?—Yes.

7247. The leaven of education improving, and your own experience being what it is, you think a juncture has arrived when the State, without damage to either party might interpose, and in fact do by law what you have done as the result of experience?—I see no objection to it whatever.

7248. I want to ask you about damaged goods, arising out of what Mr. Maddison put to you. Is there a system prevailing in your work of compelling a worker to buy the whole garment?—No.

7249. Evidence has been given to us, not only of the worker being compelled to buy a whole garment, but being compelled to buy a whole suit of which that garment was a portion, and then having to go through the process of raffling that for what it would bring and so recouping herself or himself for the charge that was made. I gather from your general attitude that you disapprove of that system?—Yes; that would not be allowed with us, and it ought not to be allowed anywhere.

7250. We are obliged to you for the list of fines, but in order to make everything complete it would be of assistance to the Committee—I think I am expressing their mind—if you would address yourself to the other matter which, I gather from you, is of a small kind, namely the question of deductions?—I think that is included, but I cannot speak definitely.

7251. Will you make a written communication to the Secretary upon that matter? If it is not included, will you accompany it by a schedule which will be placed alongside of the schedule of fines for the years 1897 to 1906 inclusive?—Certainly.* May I say that I am obliged to the Committee for giving me an opportunity of correcting certain statements which have been made.

* The Secretary has since received a letter from Mr. R. Barren in which he states: "Charges for 'damaged work" are I find included in the amounts given in the schedule under 7053, not treated as fines, but entered as 'damages' or 'damaged work.'"

TWENTY-NINTH DAY.

Miss DEVINE, was called; and Examined.

Miss Devine.
12 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

7252. I presume you are aware generally of the subjects remitted to this Committee, namely, the question of fines and deductions from wages?—Yes.

7253. Before asking what is your experience in connection with that subject, please tell me what position you hold?—I have been a weaver for twenty-six years in different mills in Lancashire. I have been working between eleven and twelve years in my present place, and in it there are no such things as fines. There are no deductions whatever.

7254. In what capacity do you come here to-day—I mean do you represent any particular organisation?—Yes, I represent the Oldham Weavers' Association. It embraces reelers and winders as well, but I suppose your Committee are most concerned with weaving.

7255. What is the number of members of that organisation?—About 3,000 weavers.

7256. Are they all women?—About 75 per cent.

7257. Do they know about your coming here to give evidence?—My society knows it.

7258. What is your society?—The Oldham Weavers, Reelers, Winders, etc., Association. We are one of the districts connected with the northern counties amalgamation.

7259. Have they held a meeting in regard to your coming up here to give evidence?—I am the representative from my own district to the Oldham Association. We have a membership extending to Rhodes, Middleton, Blackley and Middleton Junction, and I am the representative from that district to the Central Committee at Oldham.

7260. In the evidence you propose to give to-day, do you think you fairly represent the opinion of the class of operatives whom you have been describing?—Yes, sir, I do.

7261. What kind of work is done in the mill where you are employed?—Weaving. It is a big manufacturing place.

7262. Can you give us the name?—If the other witnesses have given the names of the firm I need not be afraid of doing so.

7263. If you mention the name we shall make no bad use of it. The other witnesses have trusted us in this way?—It is C 4.

7264. How many people are employed there?—I could not tell the exact number all through the mill, as it is a large place, but I understand there are about 1,700 looms of which at least 1,240 are running, and we are nearly all two loom weavers. The looms are wide and sometimes extend to about 126 inches.

7265. How many workpeople would that represent?—Probably between 500 and 600.

7266. What is woven at the mill?—Calico and sheetings, but the latter are a kind of calico, although wider than the ordinary run of calico.

7267. What is the practice of C 4 with regard to fines and deductions from wages?—We have no fining whatever. If it happens that a weaver has had any mishap through no particular fault of her own which causes some damage to the work, it is usually sufficient to go into the warehouse and explain how it occurred, but even if the worker does not volunteer the information, and is sent for, and can make it clear that they were not to blame, their account of the matter is usually accepted. As a rule we get good material to work with, and if there seems any reason for it we are cautioned perhaps three or four times if the mishap is repeated, but I don't think I can remember more than half a dozen weavers discharged from our place through bad work.

7268. How long have you been there?—Between eleven and twelve years. When we hear of anyone discharged from our place for bad work, we know, as a rule, that the dismissal had been richly deserved.

7269. Do you know the system practised as to fines in other works?—Yes.

7270. What is the opinion of your class generally with regard to fines?—We are greatly opposed to fines. There are weaving mills in Oldham where fining takes place, sometimes for the smallest fault, or even where the fault may be due to the machine or the material rather than to the worker.

7271. With regard to works where fines and deductions prevail compared with such mills as your own, where they do not prevail, is your place better organised than they are, or worse organised?—I don't think so. Better than some, worse than others.

7272. Do you mean that fines and deductions make no difference with regard to organisation?—If our society hears of members being unjustly fined the matter is reported to our secretary, who takes it in hand and goes to a firm, telling them that they will have to return the unjust fine to the weaver or be sued. If the weaver is not connected with the association, she has either to speak up for herself, which many of them cannot do very well, or else submit to the fine, whether it is small or large.

7273. You know, of course, what is meant by discipline in a mill, that is, keeping good order, etc. Let me put the question in this way. Instead of using the term organisation—is the discipline in your mill as good as the discipline of mills where fines and deductions prevail?—Yes, I think better. At many of the places where there are fines, the workers are continually changing about, and are more frequently out of work.

7274. What is done at your works if anyone arrives late in the morning?—An allowance is made for weavers who live at a distance. Weavers who live close to the mill are told that if they don't come at six o'clock, or five minutes past six, they will be locked out until breakfast time; but that is only a threat. They don't really lock them out until breakfast time, but the manager may talk to them once or twice and give them warning. Allowance is made for weavers who have to travel from a distance by train or car.

7275. Is it piecework?—Yes, the majority of weavers are on piecework.

7276. Are there any deductions for spoilt work at the mill where you are employed?—None whatever. The hands have either to do good work or clear out, but they may be cautioned a time or two. They are liable to dismissal unless they can prove that repeated faults are due to the machinery or material.

7277. Are you and your fellow workers satisfied with that system ?—Yes, but I have worked at other weaving places where there are fines.

7278. Can you give us any illustrations of fines to which your fellow-workers are subjected ?—It is a sore point with weavers who have to submit to fines for faults arising from causes which they cannot control.

7279. You might give us some examples. What is done to them. What are the fines for ?—A weaver has to try and make perfect work and seems to be held responsible for everything in some places, even if the fault lies with the material in the different processes through which it has to pass. I think it is some of the firms with the worst material who go in most for fining.

7280. You are talking of fines for bad work ?—Yes.

7281. How much are the workpeople fined and what for ?—There are many different cases. A weaver's loom may be out of repair; the picking band may break; I mean the band attached to a picker that knocks the shuttles backwards and forwards. If a loom is in the way out of order, it may cause damage which takes from two to four hours to put right, and still the cloth looker has the option of fining the weaver after she has spent all that time in piecing the ends up.

7282. How much are they fined for that ?—Sometimes 3d. or 6d. and sometimes 1s. There is much authority left to the cloth lookers with regard to fines, to inflict what penalties they think fit, and some firms think the more of the cloth looker who can produce the most fines without asking much about their justice in particular cases.

7283. Where are the mills in which the practice to which you have referred prevails ?—Oldham and the surrounding districts.

7284. The names will not be published by this Committee. You may accept that assurance, but please state the names so that we may make private inquiries if necessary without committing you or anybody ?—One firm in particular is a velvet firm. That trade is supposed to require a particular class of weaving in which there must be as few faults as possible. I refer to a mill (D 4) where bad material is supplied, and where fines may be imposed amounting in three or four weeks running to 10s. or 11s. or even 19s. 4d. It often takes a long time to finish the weaving of a length, and a fine of 6d. or 1s. or 2s. is rather common. Fines are sometimes inflicted for broken picks and face ends if the material does not happen to be so good as it ought to be for the class of work required. There would not be so many face ends and broken picks if the weft was always good enough. Still, some employers seem to expect perfect work from bad material.

7285. Are there other firms of a similar kind in Oldham ? —Yes.

7286. With similar practices ?—Yes. There is a firm at Oldham with two mills (E 4) where fining is in existence and where sometimes the weavers have to contend with bad materials.

7287. With regard to mills where fining prevails are the fines posted up on a placard in the works ?—No.

7288. Is there any contract made on the subject ?—No.

7289. Who arranges the fines ?—The manager, I suppose. It is a recognised thing on the part of many firms that if you do not make the work as they expect, you are subject to fines.

7290. Is the amount and nature of the fine settled on the spot by the manager ?—No, the manager himself does not trouble about it unless the matter is brought under his notice by the secretary of our association. It is not every woman who can defend herself before the manager in the warehouse, especially as some of the people are not kind in their remarks and try to frighten the weaver who speaks in her own defence.

7291. Do you think cases of hardship occur with greater frequency amongst unorganised workers and in non-union places ?—Yes.

7292. And that when hardships do occur in the case of non-union hands, there is no remedy easily available ?—That is so.

7293. I see amongst the instances of fines and deductions which you have noted that there are deductions made in some mills for heating water ?—Yes, whether the weaver uses it or not.

7294. Yes; but that is not so in your mill ?—No, we pay nothing for water.

7295. That is supplied as part of the costs of the mill ? —Yes.

7296. Then there seem to be some deductions for closet cleaning ?—Not in our mill, but I know of mills where the weavers have either to pay or do the cleaning themselves which we think an injustice. I have worked at a place where we had to do that, and we don't like it either way We think the firm ought to see to that.

7297. Then there seem to be some deductions for what you call putting in beams ?—That is in vogue in our place.

7298. What does it mean ?—Beams are like large bobbins and the warp is wound on them. They are in the shape of bobbins and hold perhaps thousands of yards of yarn. They are at the back of the loom and are what the yarn comes off. The material that we have to make the cloth of is supplied on these beams.

7299. What is the deduction for putting in beams ?— It has always been a system in the place to pay a man to assist the overlooker in putting in beams. It is not deducted from the wage, but it is paid for.

7300. How much ?—Threepence in the case of a certain width of loom, perhaps 1d. in narrower ones. Sometimes the weaver may have two warps out in a week which means 6d. out of her wages, but that depends upon the length of the warp.

7301. Are you content with that payment, or do you think that it should disappear ?—We have had the subject several times before our association, and I do not think there is any one of us satisfied with the system. We have thought of breaking through it if possible.

7302. Speaking generally, I suppose you know the class of woman worker in the textile industries in your part of England ?—Yes.

7303. Knowing their habits, do you think that if fines and deductions were absolutely swept away the work done would be as good—that they would produce as good work ? —Yes, I do think so. I do not think any place could be better disciplined than our mill, but there is no friction whatever. We think that the system to which I have taken exception tends to make boys and girls untruthful and dishonest. I know of cases where young people have been fined, but have not told their parents about the fine. They have told an untruth about the amount of their wages in accounting for the absence of what they have had to pay out to defray the fine.

By Mrs. Tennant.

7304. Has there ever been within your knowledge a system of fines at the mill where you are employed ?—No.

7305. Do you know of any firms who have had a system of fines, and who have abandoned the fines ?—No, they seem to stick to the system, and we cannot fight it down, but we try to recover the amount in cases of obvious injustice affecting our own members. I have known of workers having to stop their loom in order to push up cops, whereas the employers might have introduced means of doing that if they were only willing to incur a little expense.

7306. Does that system prevail now ?—No. The society took it up. We had it pretty well organised then. One weaver objected to be stopped this 2s. and the firm told her that if she did not pay the fine she must leave. The young woman had never worked anywhere else. She did not like the idea either of paying the fine or being discharged. It was reported to the union and the weavers were so aggrieved about this state of affairs that they all tendered their notice to turn out on behalf of this weaver and fight down that system. The firm was determined either to have that 2s. fine at that particular time or the weaver must leave. For the sake of settling the matter and stopping the friction the society agreed to pay the fine in that particular case, but since then the system has ceased.

7307. Can you tell the Committee of any other firm besides your own who do without a system of fines?—I do not know of any other in Oldham; they all seem to have that system of fining more or less. F 4 is really a good firm but there is a little fine, although very little. You have to do good work or else get outside, and you know that. There might be an odd time when there would be a fine of 6d. or 1s., to a weaver as a kind of caution, but it has not to occur very often. Then there is H 4. He is called a generous sort of employer, but the fining is in existence there.

7308. In the case of F 4 have the fines you mentioned regard to discipline or bad work?—Bad work.

7309. Have they any disciplinary fines for being late, or matters of that kind?—No; it is a very comfortable firm. It does not matter whether you have a big or a little week's wages, there is no trouble whatever.

7310. Do you know whether the fines have been diminishing in amount?—They never have been practised very much.

7311. Do you remember in 1896 when there was a talk of a new Truck Act, an amending Truck Act, the feeling in the association at that time? Were you one of those who were interested in the application of the 1896 Truck Act to Lancashire?—I could not say but, I know that our people were never very much in favour of this fining being in existence, so far as my knowledge goes back. I do not put down the particular years these things came about.

7312. I gather then that you were not one of these who took any part in the representations which were made to the Home Office and to Parliament about the application of the Act?—No.

7313. Did it come officially before your branch?—I daresay it would do because if they did not submit things like that to our committee or members in general there would be great grumbling. They have to have some knowledge I expect.

7314. On the question of beams; do you pay for any other services in connection with your work?—They have a man at the place. We have not to carry the cloth into the warehouse, simply because we have some steps to mount. There are boards fixed in two parts of the shed where a weaver can carry the cloth without very much trouble on to the boards, and the man is paid by the firm to take it on trolleys and carry it into the warehouse. It is a rather big shed. Where the cuts are very heavy and the weaver is unable to carry them the short distance to the cut-boards, she is expected to pay. She pays the man. It is a little extra for him, who is paid by the firm to carry the other cuts, which are light enough for the weavers to carry the short distance, into the warehouse. If the cuts are heavy the weaver is expected to pay the man. The weavers object to that because the material is so heavy that they cannot carry it from the looms even a short distance.

7315. Has an objection ever been made officially on behalf of the organisation?—No, but we have it under our notice. We think our wages are little enough without either having to pay for beam carrying or for cut carrying.

7316. Could you say what the average wage would be in your shed?—We differ a lot on account of the width of the looms. I could give you my average, but I cannot give you the average of the place.

7317. Will you give us your average?—Yes. It is between 22s. and 23s. a week. That is a full week and working hard, not losing much time.

7318. You have two pretty wide looms?—Yes, 115 inches, and I make up 104-inch cloth.

7319. Are you anxious that the practice of charging either for the carrying of the cuts or for the putting in of the beam should be stopped?—Yes.

7320. Would you anticipate its affecting your wages if it were stopped? Do you think you would be paid anything less for your cuts?—No; we have a list of work up, by which the employers have to pay certain prices for a certain pick according to the width of the loom—a uniform list.

7321. And you would take care that the list was not affected by this change?—Yes, we would watch that.

7322. Can you answer for the general impression among the other weavers with regard to the abolition of fines and the alternative of dismissal?—I think myself—I am speaking on behalf of my fellow workers—that they would feel rejoiced if fines were entirely abolished from all firms. I think in a lot of cases fining creates carelessness. I have worked at places myself where I have been subject to these fines, and if I could have unwoven a thing, and could perhaps have made a little better job of it, I would think, "Oh, I will let it go; I can get off for 3d. or 6d." You see, it caused me to be careless where I could have rectified it, and I do think it creates carelessness in some cases. I am always in touch with the weavers who work at Rhodes, Blakeley, Middleton and Middleton Junction, where they are subject to these fines, more or less, and it is a very sore point with them that oftener than not at those firms they have to toil with bad material and then be fined into the bargain, and then perhaps be as long again over a particular piece than they should be on account of the material they have to contend with. They are expected to make good work or be fined 5d., 6d., or 1s. as the overlookers think fit. Miss Devine. 12 Dec. 1906.

7323. Would you hope that the abolition of the power to fine would lead to the use of better materials?—I think they would try better if they thought they were likely to be discharged.

7324. There would be better effort on the part of the weavers; but do you think the employers would supply better material if they felt they could not fine, and the material made bad work?—It depends whether they could get it cheap enough. They are not particular about producing a good cloth for the weaver. I do not know about that.

7325. Do you happen to know as to whether the defects in the cloth for which the weaver is fined have any influence on the price of the cloth when it is sold?—Of course the employer or the manager or the cut-lookers tell us that it has to be sold as second-class or third class, but we do not always feel inclined to believe them. I have known cases where experienced weavers have considered their work to be good enough for any market, considering the material they have had to contend with. Of course the masters do not take that into consideration; they do not seem to think of the poor material they furnish us with. We have thought many a time that the work has been good enough for any market, but if there happens to be a small fault which has not just suited them, I think they make it an excuse to get a little bit more out of us than they generally do.

7326. It has been put to us that it would be a mistaken kindness to all classes of workers, not to weavers alone, if fines were abolished, because the alternative of dismissal would be a greater hardship to the workers than the opportunity which they have at present of atoning for faults by paying a fine: what is your opinion about that?—I think it would be much better if the fining system were abolished entirely. I think if a weaver valued her place she would try to make the best work possible. But I do not know of any other section of the cotton industry where fining is in existence, only the weaving department. It has never come within my knowledge that it exists in any other section but that. It all seems to be forced on to the weaver's shoulders; she seems to be held responsible for everyone's good or bad work, whichever it may be, in the weft or the warp. It might be bad spinning, bad winding, slashing, carding, or it might start from the very beginning in the mixing of the cotton. It goes through different processes before it goes to the weaver, and then she is held responsible if that work is not turned out to the satisfaction of the master. They do not seem to consider the previous processes it has gone through. If you go to some managers or cut-lookers and tell them what you have had to contend with, they simply say, "Well, we shall have to fine you 3d."—or 4d., or whatever they think fit. We think it better that the system should be abolished, and put everyone on one level. I think that as it works well at C 4, where they have a good class of weaver, good, clean, steady girls, it would work well at other places. Only a few weeks ago a weaver applied at our place to our weaving manager for work. It is the usual thing to ask where you have worked before, in order to know what class of weaving you have been in, and she was asked, and she said she had worked at I 4, a place where a lot of fining exists; if you open your mouth they fine you; you do not know when you are doing right. The manager asked her what she left for, and she said, "Well, they are always fining us." He said, "We do not fine them here; we sack them." That weaver knew what she had to contend with when she got a job at our place.

7327. Was she taken on?—Yes. If it works well at our place, I think it will work elsewhere, if masters know that they are compelled to use that system instead of fining. We have a good name on the market for turning out a good cloth, and we have a good steady class of weavers, taking them on the whole. There may be a few untidy ones among 500 or 600.

7328. Do you think this weaver knew the reputation of your firm?—Yes; they all know it.

7339. She preferred the prospect of being sacked to the prospect of being fined?—Yes. Our manager is a Lancashire man, and he takes his own way. She knew what to expect when she was taken on at our place. Of course a weaver who comes from another place, and has been used to a rough trade, has to learn. We weavers are never so bad to a stranger, but we try to put it in their way, and do what we can to show them the system of working. And they do it at other places, I know, because this is not the only weaving place I have worked at.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

7330. I understand that C 4 is the only place where there are no fines so far as you know?—Yes, in Oldham, so far as I know.

7331. And the district, I suppose?—Yes.

7332. Do you say that C 4 has the reputation of being a well-managed place?—Yes, it has. If they were all like that we should have no cause to grumble. Of course there are odd little bits of things.

7333. It is a good managed place from the point of view of the hands, in so far as there are no fines, but has it the reputation in Oldham of being a well-managed place?—Yes, we never have a bother. At odd times there is a little grievance. Some time ago they did not supply us with hand brushes to sweep the machinery. But that is nothing. On the whole we consider it a well-managed place, and there is not a weaver in Oldham but knows that when she gets employed at C 4, she is expected to make good work. Of course they will caution them two or three times; they do not discharge them straight off and give them no chance.

7334. I understand that one weaver has two of these wide looms?—Yes.

7335. You work in partnership, more or less?—Yes, on the wide looms.

7336. Supposing a certain number of weavers are late every morning, does not that interfere with the work of the others who are there?—In what way.

7337. I am asking you. I do not know anything about weaving. Suppose there are a certain number of girls who do not come till a quarter past six, we will say, do not they interfere with the other girls who are there? Can the others earn the same wages? Can they go to their work straight away just the same as if those who are absent are there?—Yes; it does not interfere. You are not forced to set your partner's looms on. Sometimes when we go for weft, and we are anxious to get a particular cut on one of our looms, we will tell our partner "Put me a bobbin in till I come back." But your partners are not compelled to set your looms on.

7338. It is only in extraordinary cases such as you name where it would be any hardship upon those who come in time that others should be late?—Yes. It is not often that they come in so late. If they do, the manager knows them all; he can spot those who often come late, and he pulls them up, and of course that will satisfy them for a time. They will not come late again until the fear has worn off.

7339. I understand it does not interfere with the earnings of the girls that others should come late: the only person who loses is the employer, because the looms are not being worked?—But they do not allow it very much.

7340. That is another point. Do the girls attend as punctually at C 4 as they do in those mills where there are fines for being late?—Yes; they have to do.

7341. You say you think they do?—I am sure they do, because from where I am situated I can see the majority of them come in.

7342. You have worked in a mill where they fine for being late?—Yes, and the fining is in existence at the present day.

7343. And your experience is that in C 4, where you work now, the punctuality is quite as great as in those mills where they are fined for being late?—Yes.

7344. Are the bulk of the weavers in the union?—We have about 3,000 weavers in our society, and I should say there are about 6,000 others that are in other sections—reelers and winders. And there are plenty that are not in the society.

7345. Are there many weavers who are not in any society whatever?—Yes, there are plenty. In some firms in Oldham we have the majority; in others we have not half of them in; and in some places we have none.

7346. Practically half the weavers in the Oldham district are not in any union whatever?—I should say about half.

7347. In case they are in a union and there is an unjust fine, I understood you to say that is taken up by the union?—Yes.

7348. And the secretary or someone in authority in the union goes to see the masters and enquires what the fine is for, and very often gets it either taken off or modified?—Yes; and sometimes the firm will not return it. They will up with the trouble of suing them in court for it; they will let it go to the day of its being tried and then pay it into court. If a weaver was not in a society, where would she be?

7349. I am speaking now of those in societies. Those who are fairly well protected by the union?—Yes, but I may say that in places where fining is in existence it causes our society more trouble than any other business we have to contend with. The weavers contend that fining is an injustice. It is very hard to be responsible for everyone's work.

7350. What do these fines amount to? Supposing they had fines at C 4 how much do you think it would come to every week to an ordinary weaver? How much do you think they are fined per week?—It just depends upon the firm; it might only be 3d.

7351. But you have some sort of idea how much it comes to off the weekly earnings?—It is not so much the fine; it is the principle, and the loss to the weaver.

7352. What I should like an answer upon is how much does the fine come to off the wages in a week, or how much in a year? I am asking you to tell me as nearly as you can how much an ordinary weaver would have to pay in fines in a mill where fines for bad work existed?—I could not say how much it would amount to in a year's time. That would depend on the class of work she had to do, and what the cut-looker might think fit to stop her. She would have to submit to that. Some weavers would have little and others more.

7353. Will you tell me the most you ever knew a weaver to be fined, say in one month?—I can take this case in particular where a weaver was stopped 19s. 4d. out of a month's earnings on one loom.

7354. Is not that very extreme?—Yes, but there are cases where a firm has stopped 10s., 11s., 12s., and even 18s. out of a month's earnings.

7355. That is for velvets?—Yes.

7356. That is an extraordinary trade is it not? It is not like the trade you are in?—That is all the more reason they should supply a good material for the weaver to contend with, and not inflict fines when they know it is bad.

7357. Cannot you give me some idea of what the fines amount to for a woman's wages in a year in the case of an ordinary mill weaving ordinary calico? What do you think they would amount to in a year?—I could not reckon the amount up, but where the cuts are what we call short pieces and they have many pieces in a week off that particular loom, and they are fined 2d., 3d., and sometimes, 6d. perhaps off every loom they have running, it will mount up in twelve months, will it not ?

7358. I should like you to give me an idea of the aggregate, but if you cannot it does not matter ?—In those firms where fines are in existence they are pretty heavy in some weeks on the weaver's earnings.

7359. How much do you consider to be pretty heavy ?—I think 2s. or even 1s. off a weaver's earnings on one loom is a lot.

7360. That is 1s. in a week off their wages ?—Yes.

7361. That you would call pretty heavy for a fine ?—Yes. If that came every week that would amount to 52s. in the year, would it not ?—It is not exactly the amount of money they are stopped, but it is the amount of time a weaver has to lose on those particular faults that she has to try to mend before the cloth is passed into the warehouse. It is not only the loss of money that she has to submit to. As I stated in my evidence before they may have what we call a smash and many other things in connection with a loom which brings about some sort of damage to the cloth, and the weavers are expected to make the best they can of it, and try to do so oftener than not It may take two, three, or four hours to rectify a fault, and then on the top of that, in firms where fines are in existence, they clap a fine on. They do not take into consideration the loss the weaver must have had in piecing up all those ends. And they know when you have had a smash, because the knots show it, and it is not the fault of the weaver. It reflects on a lot of different people in different departments which the work has had to pass through. As I said before, it might be bad spinning at the beginning.

7362. This particular kind of fault can easily be seen by the over-looker or anyone else, and it could easily be seen that they were caused by bad material ?—If they want to.

7363. It can easily be seen by any experienced person that the fault is due to bad material ?—Yes.

7364. The union would take up a case like that ?—If they are in the union.

7365. And somebody would come from the union and the thing would be arranged ?—Yes, but there are lots of cases where even our members will not trouble to come to the office and report. They will only grumble among themselves.

7366. With regard to putting in the beams, that is not in any way a fine or deduction, but it is one of those things which you would like to see altered ?—Yes.

7367. Because while you are doing that you could really be going on with your loom ?—No ; it is when we have emptied the loom. When we have finished one warp the empty beam has to be taken out and another put in.

7368. What would you be doing ?—We are standing by the empty loom. They do not pay us for the loss from empty looms. That is our loss again. This man I referred to is in there to assist the over-looker to take out the empty beam and put in a full one. It is more than one man can do to lift those beams, and the weaver is expected to pay that man 1d., 2d., or 3d. according to the width of the loom. The man makes his wages up from the weavers. That has always been an agreement with the firm.

7369. That has always been the custom ?—Yes.

7370. When the uniform list was arranged between the association of masters and the association of weavers it was done subject to this, that you had to pay for putting the beam on the loom ? It was known perfectly well by your Association when the rate of wages was arranged that this work had to be done ?—I am sorry to say that it was not. It has only lately come under the notice of our association that such a system existed. It seems to have been an oversight on the part of the members, but they did not report it, and it has only lately come under the notice of the association. Every firm has a different system, and we do not always get delegates on the committee who represent each of those firms, and therefore we do not always get to know the system which exists. This matter has been overlooked, and it is only of late we have got to know. Though I worked there, I did not think of mentioning it.

Miss Devine.
12 Dec. 1906.

7371. It has always existed ; it is not a new thing, and it is not in the way of either a fine or a deduction ; it is only part of the work which you would like to get rid of ?—Yes, but I may say this, that at D 4 that was the system, to pay for empty looms, but the weavers protested against it, our association took it up on their behalf, and it is abolished now. The weavers have got out of paying for beams in that particular firm. It had been the system there for thirty-five years, but it has been abolished

By Mr. Walsh.

7372. In the mills of which you have knowledge are there any lists of these fines ?—No, none whatever.

7373. You are not aware of any of the mills in which a list is posted up containing the nature of the offence and the amount of fine which would be inflicted ?—No.

7374. What is the process adopted when a worker is fined ? Does the cut-looker say, "I will fine you 6d. or 1s.," and the worker sign for it ?—No.

7375. There is no signing ?—No. They stop it out of their wages.

7376. They simply stop it out of their wages ?—Yes. I have known firms where the cut-looker has had so much authority that he has stopped fines from the weavers' wages and never had them up for that particular thing. When they have come to draw their wages they have been stopped 2d. or 3d. and have gone into the warehouse to know why they have been paid short. They have been told they must see the cut-looker. They have gone to the cut-looker, and he has put it down the weaver's throat whether or not. When the weaver tells him, "You know you have not had me up, but you have stopped 3d. ; you have never brought me into the warehouse ; you know you have not," he says, "Well, you had such and such a thing in the cut, and you will have to stand by it."

7377. The worker would hardly be in a position to prove that those fines had been made ? I mean, supposing you yourself had been fined, seeing that there is neither a list in the mill nor a receipt, so to speak, for the money taken, you would have a difficulty in proving your own fine against the company ?—Yes. I do not know whether the cloth-looker puts it down in a book.

7378. I suppose you have been an organiser ?—I have taken an active part in the union for some years.

7379. Have you come across this very great difficulty of proving the fines deducted from the workers ?—No, they seem to admit that a fine has been deducted whenever anyone has gone to inquire from our association. There seems to be no difficulty in regard to proving that a fine has been inflicted.

7380. Have you been able to find any record of it in the books of the company ?—I understand that the cut-looker has to send in a certain list of fines which he has deducted from the weavers into the office, and then they are deducted from the weavers' wages. You do not go into the office and pay the fine to the cashier ; you have so much less when you draw your wages, if the cut-looker has fined you. He must let them know in the office in some way.

7381. Are we to understand that there is an idea in the workpeople's minds that the amassing of a heavy list of fines is, so to speak, an understood condition of the cut-looker's employment ?—Yes.

7382. That in order to retain his position he must amass a heavy list of fines ?—Yes. In some firms the more fines a cut-looker returns into the office at the week-end on making-up day the better he seems to be liked. The cut-looker has a great deal of authority in his hands. I have worked alongside of weavers and been surprised that their work has been passed into the warehouse without them being sent for, and I have done work myself which I have considered much better than theirs and yet have had to go into the warehouse. You see I have not been a favourite.

7383. This fining seems to produce a sense of injustice in the minds of the workers because of the caprice of the official ?—Yes.

7384. It seems to be according to the whim of the official at the moment ?—Yes.

Miss Devine.

7385. A similar offence committed by another worker might possibly be excused altogether, and not be fined for, in the same mill and under the same conditions?—It is as I have pointed out; the cut-lookers have it in their power to make out there are faults when there really are not faults in the case of some weavers, while other weavers are allowed to send in whatever they like.

7386. A similar offence might not be visited with any punishment at all?—Yes, and even worse than that. You might consider your cloth perfect, and you might be standing alongside of other weavers—you can see the work of the weavers on each side of you—and, seeing the work they are letting go, think to yourself, "My word! She will have to follow that." Not a word. And you have to follow yours. You could see what she has let go, untidy cloth with lots of little things that you would not let go. You have to follow yours, when you do not think there is a fault in it.

7387. Are we to understand that that which causes the sense of injustice in the minds of the workpeople is the quite casual and uncertain nature of the fine?—Yes.

7388. And of the conditions under which that fine may be inflicted?—Yes. We think it is very unjust to weavers, and that is the general feeling among them.

7389. With regard to putting in the beams, are we to understand that the workpeople believe that the amounts paid by them exceed the total of the assistant's wages?—It has been given to the weavers at different times that we have been paying over that particular man's economy. They average over £2, and it is all gathered from the weavers.

7390. It is paid by the pennies and twopences and threepences, according to the width of the loom, which comes from the weavers?—Yes, we pay. The man comes to us each pay day, and if we have had beam out we know what we have to pay him.

7391. Are we to understand that the sense of injustice with regard to that arises from the idea that the workpeople entertain that the amount paid by them in the aggregate is greater than the wages of the assistant?—Yes, we think it is a great amount. I might have two looms empty in one week, and that means 6d. out of my wages for that week.

7392. I am not quite sure whether we mutually understand each other. The point that I want you to address yourself to is this: have you the idea that the amounts paid by the workpeople for this particular work is greater than the total amount of the assistant's wages? How much does the assistant get?—He gets nothing. He has to gather his wages from the weavers. He goes round collecting his coppers each pay day.

7393. So that he really is not in the employ of the company in a certain sense?—He is employed, but the weavers have to pay the wage. We cannot say, "We shall not have such a man; you will have to bring in someone we like, some one we know of." We have no voice in that.

7394. After you have paid these amounts to the man, is there any system by which the firm takes any part of that?—No. We simply pay the man.

7395. You believe that the cost of putting in beams should be a standing cost of the mill itself?—Yes.

7396. You think that the mill itself should pay that cost?—Yes. We think that if the men, who get a bigger wage than we do, cannot do without this assistant, they ought to pay him, or else the firm should pay him.

7397. You think the over-lookers should pay him?—Yes, or the firm. We do not think the firm ought to hold us responsible for paying the man's wages.

7398. It ought not to be a matter for which you should pay?—No.

7399. Inasmuch as you think it should be one of the standing charges of the firm, it ought not to be paid for out of the workpeople's wages?—That is so. Of course the manufacturer has to make according to his orders, but we think that if a piece is made of a certain weight which is above the strength of any woman to remove from her loom, that ought to be done at the cost of the employer, even if it is only 1d. per cut.

7400. You spoke of F 4 as being a place where there was little or no fining?—The fining is not worth speaking of.

7401. You said it was a very easy place?—Yes, it is.

7402. Has the discipline lessened at all, within your knowledge, or is the discipline equally high?—They can get a pretty good supply of weavers.

7403. But the discipline is good?—Yes.

7404. It is equally high?—Yes.

7405. There is no complaint of lessened discipline?—No; it is very seldom there is a complaint from F 4. They can almost go in when they like and come out when they like. They are not particular about a quarter of an hour or half an hour there.

7406. In the case of coming late would the high standard of the workers themselves make it a little bit unpleasant for the person who came habitually late?—No, it has nothing to do with anyone. Each is on her own responsibility. The managers scolds you a time or two for coming late. But a weaver is on piece work, and most weavers like to have a decent wage at the week-end. It is against herself to be late. The more time the loom is standing idle the less chance she has of getting pieces off at the week-end. When they come to 5s., 6s., 7s., or 8s., she does not like to lose that for one particular week, and only have 17s. to take home when she ought to have 8s. more. The more the loom is stopped the more money is going out of her pocket.

7407. Apart from the question of earning a lesser wage would the fact that one was an habitual laggard not be treated with some contempt in the mill? Would there not be a feeling of contempt excited among the other workers against her?—We do pass the remark sometimes of odd ones who come in a few times late, "I should be ashamed to come in at such a time," but we never say anything to them. Should the manager catch them coming in ten minutes late or so they may say to us, "The manager was rather short this morning," and we say, "It serves you right; you ought to be in in time."

7408. You gave us to understand that the abolition of fines would not result in any lessened discipline, because the workers would always have the fear of dismissal hanging over their heads?—Yes.

7409. Which you believe would be a sufficient incentive?—Yes.

7410. And in those places where the fines have been abolished, the standard of discipline has been in no way lessened: are we to understand that?—Yes. I do not think there has ever been any better discipline than they have in C 4 to-day, though we do grumble a little over paying for the beam and paying for heavy cuts. But beyond that good discipline prevails at the place.

By Mr. Maddison.

7411. I have only one or two questions. First of all, with regard to the organisation generally of C 4. Apart from the particular question we are discussing, namely fines, is the discipline good? I mean, is there anything allowed there which would not be allowed in a well-ordered mill?—No; it is only the ordinary run of mill life.

7412. The discipline is not lax in other respects?—No.

7413. Now with regard to the payment for beams, and the carrying of these cuts for which deductions are made, I take it those are really trade matters with which your society has to deal from time to time, and that you object because you believe that system reduces your wages?—Yes, it does.

7414. Have you to pay for cleaning the looms?—No.

7415. You clean your own looms?—Yes; we clean our own looms, and it sometimes takes half a day to do, but we do not complain. Some weavers devote more time to cleaning their looms than others.

7416. You have no system by which the looms are cleaned for you and the amount deducted?—No. We also bring our own weft and take our own empties back. The only thing we do not do is to carry these heavy pieces, which are beyond a woman's strength.

7417. Where do the fines go to?—Into the master's pockets—where else? Or else to pay the cut-looker's wages. I know a firm at Middleton Junction where the weavers are supposed to be in at six o'clock: perhaps the manager might allow five minutes grace, till five minutes past six, but if it gets a minute beyond that, according to their time, though you may have a watch correct by station time, they stop you. They can turn the hand round you know, if they want to make it their time. They make you responsible, and shut the door in your face, and stop you 1d. They pretend to return it every twelve months for a picnic or tea party, but they do not give you any voucher that it comes to that amount. They do not show what it amounts to in the twelve months. You have to take their word. We have all often doubted whether we have got the amount back.

7418. Your experience is that these fines are not even devoted to picnics ?—That is so.

7419. Supposing all these fines were devoted to a trip each year for the operatives, would you still object to fines ?—Yes, I should. We will pay our own. Let fines be abolished and the worker's wage not reduced, and we can pay for our own little picnics if we want them.

By Mr. Delevingne.

7420. How long has this system of fining been in existence in the Lancashire weaving industry ?—All the years I have been a weaver, and that is twenty-six years in different places.

7421. Have you noticed any increase or decrease in the last few years ?—No; there seems to be just one standard.

7422. I gather that the point which you chiefly felt as a grievance was the fact that deductions were often made for damage which was due to causes not under the weaver's control ?—Yes, oftener than not.

7423. If that was eliminated, if deductions were only made in cases where there was some actual fault on the part of the weaver—and you tell us it is always easy to assign the damage to the right cause—would you see so much objection to that ?—I should object in any case, because it would allow them to have a loophole. They might object to you saying, "Well, it is the fault of the loom." They might also say, "You ought to have found it out before it made such a mess." They would still make you responsible in some way or another, and I think it better that the system should be entirely abolished. I would favour discharge before a fine. I am not fond of moving about, nor other weavers either; we like to stop at one place.

Miss Devine 12 Dec. 1906.

7424. Would you say the class of girl at C 4 was of an appreciably higher standard ?—No. They have a few careless ones, like at other places. I have found out in my experience that in places where they produce the worst material, and where the most fining is in existence, they get a worse class of workers, because they are workers that they will not have at other places. They are always changing about.

7425. Do you think that in most cases where they get the worst class of workers some means of maintaining discipline is not required ?—It is their own fault, through the fining.

7426. With regard to the deductions for hot water which you have mentioned, I think your grievance was that the workers were made to pay even when the hot water was not used ?—Yes.

7427. Do you see any objection to a deduction being made when a worker uses the hot water ?—No.

7428. It is a convenience ?—We think we might pay for that, but I do think it unfair to charge every weaver alike, whether she stays in to her meals or not.

By the Chairman.

7429. We are much obliged to you for your evidence.

Mr. THOMAS GREENALL, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

7430. You come from Pendlebury ?—Yes.

7431. What is your county ?—Lancashire.

7432. You are President and Agent of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners Federation ?—Yes.

7433. And have held that position for sixteen years ?—Yes.

7434. Will you tell me what is the membership of the association ?—About 40,000.

7435. And the pits they work in are in Lancashire ?—Lancashire and Cheshire. We have a few in Cheshire, not many.

7436. You know of the passing into law of the Statute of 1896 with regard to fines and deductions from wages ?—Yes.

7437. Does your memory carry you back beyond that ?—No, not very much previous to that.

7438. What has been the practice with regard to fines and deductions in the mining industry even since 1896, notwithstanding that statute ?—The practice has been this. Generally speaking when a man is employed at a colliery, he has to sign what are called conditions of employment, chiefly with regard to deductions, not in connection with fines.

7439. Have you any samples of those fines with you ?—I have a sample which we have at one colliery. (Handed to the Chairman.)

7440. This is K 4. Where is their place of business ?—Near Manchester.

7441. The contract is as follows: "I agree to your making the undermentioned deductions from my current wages: rent, if I live in the company's house; lamp, oil, and trimming, 4d. per week; pick sharpening, 2d. per week. And I hereby authorise and request you to make the following payments on my behalf out of the sum due to me for wages, namely: accident fund, 4d. per week; mutual improvement society, ½d. per week." I observe there are no fines there at all ?—That is so.

7442. It is the ordinary system of deductions ?—Yes.

Mr. T. Greenall.

7443. Have you any cases in which there are any list of fines enumerated in the contract ?—No; I do not know that we have any case at all where there is any list of fines. 12 Dec. 1906

7444. Nothwithstanding there being no contract with regard to fines, are fines extorted ?—Yes.

7445. Will you give the Committee samples of the fines which are imposed ?—The fines vary. In some places they will fine a man from 2s. 6d. to 5s. for carrying his lamp in the mine on his belt. The system adopted with regard to the fine is that he is told he will be fined 2s. 6d. or 5s. and he is asked to sign his name to a document drawn up by the employers agreeing to that fine.

7446. What I am anxious to get at is this: is that document drawn up when he enters the employment, or is it drawn up after he commits the offence ?—The document is drawn up after he commits the offence, stating what he is fined for.

7447. Is there any general knowledge in the pit founded upon any document available to the men as to how much they will be fined for each particular offence ?—No; we have none anywhere that I am aware of.

7448. Now give us some other cases ?—We have fines for what we consider very trivial offences, such as men losing what they call their bow. That is a piece of iron perhaps 18 inches long and probably a quarter of an inch thick with hooks on it, so that they can put it on a tub or wagon when they are drawn along the road where the road is low, so that their hands will just be a little below the top of the tub or wagon. For losing one of these, in a good many places they will be fined 6d. or 1s., which will be taken out of their wages. Fines are imposed in some places for losing or mislaying what we call a scotch, a piece of iron about 12 inches long which is put into the wheel of the wagon to check its speed—a sprag to check the speed going down hill.

7449. Are those things specified in any contract beforehand ?—No, none whatever. Of course, in addition to that we have fines if men travel in the haulage road when officials say they ought not to do so, and for spragging, propping, and timbering generally. Fines are imposed for many little things which, of ocurse, the man knows nothing at all about until the alleged offence has been committed.

Mr. T. Greenall.

12 Dec. 1906.

7450. You evidently belong to an organisation of some power; have these things been reported to your society ?—Yes.

7451. What action have you taken with regard to them ?—We have them reported to us sometimes, not very often. Generally, they are only reported to us when the person whom they want to fine objects to its being imposed. For instance, I have a letter here from one of our large collieries in Lancashire. (L 4.) That is a case where a man was working at the coal face, and the under-manager came into his place and said that it was not sufficiently timbered—that there were not sufficient props or bars or sprags put up. The man maintained that it was sufficiently timbered, and was timbered according to the regulation distances of the colliery. The under-manager then said he ought to have put bars up instead of single props—that is, with timbers across and two props under them. The man said, "I have had no instructions to do that." Of course, it is understood in the mine that where bars are to be used special instructions are given to that effect.

7452. You mean the over-man gives those instructions beforehand ?—Yes, what we call the fireman. In this case no instructions were given. The man told the under-manager that he had been working in that place about eight weeks and had driven it about twenty yards and had never had any instructions to put any bars up. The under-manager then told him that he would be fined 10s. for not putting the bars up. The man said that he objected to the fine and would not agree to pay it and the result was that he was discharged.

7453. When did that occur ?—That occurred in November. It would be about the beginning of November this year.

7454. Can you mention the colliery ?—Yes, L 4 (a).

7455. Is that near Wigan ?—Yes; it is not very far from Wigan.

7456. Having got that report from the man and knowing he was discharged, did you report the matter to the inspector ?—No. The man was considered by our association to have been taken advantage of, and he was placed upon the funds and supported from the federation funds.

7457. I point out to you that you did not give the law a chance there ?—I am afraid there was not much for the law to do, because the man was discharged. Our association supported him because he refused to be fined.

7458. I am not reflecting in any way upon the association, but I just point out to you that probably if you had reported the matter to the inspector he would have seen what the legal situation was and might have been able to take certain proceedings. At all events, you did not adopt that course ?—No.

7459. Have you any other instances of fines without contract beforehand ?—Not to particularise. We have a number of cases which come to our association from time to time such as this, where people object to be fined for these things. In every case where they object to be fined they are put on the federation fund and supported.

7460. Has the federation formed an opinion upon the general question which those instances suggest ?—As to fines ?

7461. Yes ?—Yes.

7462. What is that opinion ?—The matter has been considered by the committee and officials, and they are of opinion that the fines ought not to be imposed, that they do not achieve the object which we expect the mine officials have in view, namely discipline and the carrying out of the rules of the Mines Regulation Act, and also it rather lends itself to undue advantage being taken of the man by under-officials.

7463. That is the opinion of the workers. Now the next thing is with regard to the employers. Could the discipline be maintained at as high a standard without fines, do you think ?—Yes, I am of opinion that it can be; I rather think that discipline could be better enforced without fines.

7464. Of course the ultimate sanction to use the legal phrase, would then be dismissal ?—No, I do not think so. If a man has committed an offence under the Mines Regulation Act or in any way done anything which he ought not to have done then they have the right to take him before a magistrate, giving them an opportunity of proving it and giving him an opportunity of disproving it.

7465. But so far as the employers are concerned, apart from appealing to the law their ultimate sanction would be to dismiss a man if they were not satisfied with him ?—Yes.

7466. With regard to discipline, do you think that discipline in the pits would be maintained by the ordinary process of warning the men for trivial offences and dismissing them for repeated or for seriousoffences ?—I would not say that I am of opinion that dismissal would achieve that object.

7467. With the liability to prosecution ?—I am certainly of the opinion that dismissal and the privilege of prosecuting a man, if they wish, would achieve that discipline which is desirable in the mines.

7468. And that is the opinion of your class generally ?—Yes; it is the opinion of the officials and of our Committee and of the miners generally.

7469. I will put to you the converse view; I want you to consider it. Some time ago it was represented to this Committee that there may be a preference for fining rather than the somewhat cruel alternative of men being reported to the authorities ?—That is possible with some of our miners. For instance, we all know that a man does not like to go before a magistrate in court. That in itself would be beneficial to the employer.

7470. That would be a deterrent ?—Yes, at least it would assist. Perhaps I ought to say that most of the men working in our mines are paid by results. The more coal they send out the more money they get. It is possible that through that some of the men may get careless sometimes, and probably through that they may leave undone something which they ought to do, being in a hurry just at the moment and so on, and no doubt mistakes may have been made in that way. We are of opinion that even if they do make mistakes in that way, the best way of enforcing discipline in that direction would be to take them before a magistrate. They do not want to go there. Then again, probably some of our men agree to fining rather than to be discharged. For some years now we have found it is not very easy for a man to get work at a colliery once he has been discharged, and therefore rather than be discharged and run the risk of being out of work for some time these men agree to the fines. We are of opinion that many of these fines are imposed for very trivial offences, and in many cases, such as that I have mentioned, where a man is of opinion that he has done nothing wrong and therefore ought not to be fined.

7471. When the fine is imposed and he is made to sign for it, substantially he signs compulsorily ?—He signs compulsorily.

7472. Because otherwise it would be a question of dismissal ?—Exactly.

7473. I understand there is great dissatisfaction on the part of the workpeople in connection with fines ?—Yes.

7474. Now we will come to the question of deductions, and I will take this case of K 4, which you have given us as a fair sample—rent, lamp, oil, trimming, pick sharpening, accident fund and Mutual Improvement Society ?—Yes, that is a fair sample.

7475. The case of the rent is specially authorised by the Statute ?—Yes.

7476. Have you any observations to make upon that ?—With regard to the men being compelled to live in the employer's house, a large number of our men resent that occasionally. First of all they are compelled to live in the employer's houses and then the rent is taken from their wages, through their signing this agreement when they commence working.

7477. Are you right in saying that they are compelled to go into particular houses ?—Yes.

7478. If they are in the neighbourhood of a town can they not select their residences ?—No. If there is an employer's house vacant they will see to it they have a tenant in it.

7479. Of course if the houses which are the property of the employers are all filled up then the other workers go to ordinary tenancies ?—Yes.

7480. And there, so much a week is not taken from them for rent ?—That is so.

7481. Now take the other side of it. Suppose a suggestion were made to make deductions for rent illegal, that would fave a very disorganising effect, would it not ?—I do not think so.

7482. I want your view about that ?—All that would be necessary then would be this: when the man got his wages he would pay over his rent weekly to someone who was there to receive it, or the company, as other property owners do, would have an agent to go to the houses and collect the rent weekly from the men. That is what everybody else does, and I do not see why employers of labour ought to be put upon a different footing to any other property owners in connection with that matter.

7483. The next deductions are for lamp, oil, and trimming: that is practically for working utensils ?—Yes.

7484. That is legitimate if it is part of the contract ?—I suppose it is legitimate according to the employers' construction of the Act. It may be questioned, as we all know.

7485. I would like you to put any point you have upon that to the Committee ?—We understand it is an agreement. Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis was the gentleman responsible for having this agreement drawn up and signed by the men when they begin working. I understand he is of opinion that it conforms to the Truck Act because of the last words in subsection (a) of Clause 2: "Or the contract is in writing signed by the workman." We are of opinion that that scarcely complies with the Truck Act.

7486. In what respect ?—With regard to deductions, Clause 2, subsection (a) says: "Unless the terms of the contract are contained in a notice kept constantly fixed at such place or places open to the workmen and in such a position that it may be easily seen, read, and copied by any person whom it affects, or the contract is in writing signed by the workman." Well, we are of opinion there also that materials which the men are supplied with by the employer ought to be paid for in the ordinary course as they pay for anything else. For instance, if they go to buy explosives anywhere they pay for them to the ordinary tradesman.

7487. But in the case that we are figuring would not they be free to buy their lamp oil anywhere else ?—No; they do not ask to be free to buy their lamp oil. They think that the system we have is the best that can be arranged, where the lamp is purchased by the employer and kept at the colliery, cleaned, and refilled with oil, but they object to the cost of that being deducted from their wages. What they suggest is that they ought to be allowed to pay for the oil, and of course the cost of cleaning as well, and the same with regard to other materials.

7488. You say the workmen ought to be allowed to pay for them ?—Yes, and that it should not be deducted from their wages. For instance, as you know we have check-weighmen on our pit banks. The Mines Regulation Act provides that the check-weighmen are to be paid by the workpeople. It can be arranged for the money to be stopped in the office, but it is the exception where that is done. The men go to the colliery office and receive their wages. Then they go to the collector on behalf of the check-weighman—it may be the check-weighman himself or another person—and they pay their proportion of the check-weighman's wages and costs. We suggest that that ought to be the system with regard to oil and other material supplied by the employer.

7489. I fancy the existing system was originated from motives of mutual convenience ?—You will see that 4d. per week is deducted for the club. We have had information of men who have objected to joining that society.

7490. That of course may be subject to other considerations. You can imagine a man being a very good collier although not belonging to the club, but you could not imagine a collier without his lamp and his oil ?—We are of opinion that there is no difference in the principle. It is a question of paying or being stopped.

7491. You think it would be a cleaner job if the wages were paid in a fixed sum and that then you had to bargain and traffic for the materials requisite to enable you to perform your labour ?—Yes; or, put in another and more simple way, our men are of opinion that they ought to be allowed to pay for everything that they are supplied with, even by the employer. The amount would be arranged probably very largely in the way it is now, but they are of the opinion that it would be an advantage to them if they paid the money, because they would then know better what they had to pay. I have a case with regard to the question of explosives. In regard to this same company, who are very good people, we have had a question recently with reference to the cost of the explosives in a particular mine. The workmen there were of opinion that they were paying too much for the explosives which they were using. We negotiated with the employers with the result that they supplied us with a list of their charges and gave us the details as to how they arrived at those charges. They gave us certain charges for certain weights. But in addition to the explosives they also include a number of sundries, which the men have taken exception to.

7492. Like management expenses, and so on ?—Yes. I will hand this list in. (Handing same to the Chairman.)

7493. I see here "batteries and cables ?"—Yes, which the men have nothing to do with. They have to be used by the shot-lighter down in the mine and are entirely in his charge. He has to light the shots. It has nothing at all to do with the purchase of the explosives.

7494. Then I see that "labourers" is also a heavy item ?—Yes; we do not know exactly what that means. It is stated that it means lifting the explosives into the cart and taking it from the general store room.

7495. I see there is a heavy item for the "horse and cart" taking them to the pits ?—Yes.

7496. And also for the driver and the clerk's time ?—Yes.

7497. You would probably yield the point that the payment made for the explosives should be at least plus the carriage ?—Yes. Our men are of the opinion that it ought to be the actual cost of the explosive, and that the cost of these sundries ought to be borne by the employer.

7498. Except probably the carriage ?—Yes.

7499. The clerk's time and such things you think should be part of the on cost of the pit ?—Yes.

7500. And the same with regard to batteries and cables ?—Yes.

7501. Now may I illustrate your point in this way, that if lamp, oil, and trimming, and all these other things were put upon the basis of independent purchase, the same as explosives, you would then be able to judge as to price on a more independent footing ?—Yes, that is the opnion of the men. That is the main reason why they suggest they should be allowed to pay for it.

7502. You think it is a sounder principle, although it might not come to very much in regard to money ?—Yes, the principle is much better, and the men are of opinion that they would then be able to know better what was being charged, and if it was excessive, they could deal with it.

7503. Then the pick sharpening ?—That is another matter which we have had to meet several employers upon. We have a difficulty sometimes in ascertaining the correct amount to be paid. Some employers will only ask us to pay for the wages of the man who is sharpening the tools, and will find the shed, the sharpening coats as we call them, and the bellis and the coal, making those a charge to the firm. Others will include so much for the sharpening coat, the bellis, and the coal, and the wear and tear. So that we have different prices taken from the men for sharpening their tools at different colleries.

7504. There is hardly a check upon that, except what the Statute says, namely, that the charge shall be fair and reasonable and not in excess of the actual cost?—We had a case on Saturday last which illustrates my point. We met the employers and asked them to reduce the charges from 4d. to 2d. We contended that the 4d. was too much. They suggested 3d., but we pointed out that that was too much. It included the wages of the sharpener, the coal that was burnt, which they estimated, the cost of the upkeep, and a certain charge for the sharpening coat.

7506. Supposing the Committee were of opinion that some of these things can be worked best for both parties under the form of a deduction from wages—pick sharpening is a fair instance—have you any suggestion to make as to whether there should be a committee of the workmen to arrange with a committee of the employers as to what would be a fair deduction?—Yes, I think that would help the men that representatives of the workmen with the employers should go into the question as to what should be included in the cost of the sharpening. I think I ought to say that generally the men prefer to have their pick-sharpening and repairing of the tools in their own hands—to pay the men themselves, and then they contribute towards the expense collectively and have it entirely in their own hands. The difficulty we have in connection with that is that the employer in many places refuses to allow us to have a man whom he does not employ upon his premises.

7507. Supposing there was not total abolition, you would certainly favour both parties being represented with regard to the price that was to be charged?—Yes.

7508. And suppose they differ—it is conceivable that your Committee and the employers' committee might differ—I assume you would be quite willing to take the local inspector as an umpire in such a case?—I do not think there would be much objection to the mines inspector. I think our side of the committee would be able to show him what was reasonable in the matter.

7509. I mean some cheap and expeditious system of that kind would be preferable to the existing sense of grievance?—Yes. I think I ought to say that a large number of our men are not very strongly in favour of the mines inspectors in Lancashire dealing with these matters, because they seem to think that when the inspectors have been appealed to, which I understand they have upon a time or two, they rather took a liberal view from the employers' side. They think ½d. or 1d. per week is not much, and that they can afford to be rather liberal to the employers in the matter.

7510. I think that exhausts the question of deductions except those for bad work?—There are the deductions for Relief Societies, which I mentioned.

7511. I will come to that later. We have dealt with deductions for rent, lamp, oil, trimming, pick sharpening, and explosives, and now we come to bad work?—With regard to the lamp and oil, I would like to name a particular case. We have a very large colliery where a man, when he starts to work, gets a brass check for the number of the lamp which he uses. For that check the firm insists upon 6d. being paid by the man. The men contend that that is not in accordance with the Truck Act. The firm insist upon the men paying 6d. When a man leaves, if he returns the check his 6d. is returned. If he loses that piece of brass which is not worth a farthing, he has to pay another 6d. for another check.

7512. What is done with these moneys?—The money goes to the lamp and oil account, and, so far as we know, goes into the pockets of the employers.

7513. Now we come to deductions on account of bad work and material, such as dirt in coal?—That is in connection with the Mines Regulation Act. Of course, as you know, there is a provision in that Act which states that agreements are to be made with regard to foreign substances other than the coal contracted to be got, and at most collieries we have those agreements. But in addition to that, at many of our colleries the management will sometimes insist upon the man losing a tub altogether. For instance, if a wagon of coal is sent up weighing 9 cwt. or 10 cwt., if in their opinion there is dirt in that tub they will many times insist upon the man signing away that tub altogether, which means his giving up 1s. or 1s. 3d. as the case may be simply for a small amount of dirt or inferior coal which he has in the tub. Our men are very strongly opposed to that.

7514. Have you any idea of the way in which the remedy could be got for that?—We have the agreement under the Mines Regulation Act. We suggest this should be made illegal. That again is signing away a man's right. The deductions are determined according to the agreement under the Act, and we contend that ought to be sufficient in connection with this matter. There again, of course, the employer might say, "I shall discharge this man unless he will do this," which the man understood would be the result.

7515. What is the men's view in face of that alternative?—As I said before, the men do not like the idea of being discharged for this kind of thing, but they are certainly of the opinion that that ought to be prohibited, and then they would take the risk of being discharged. The men are of opinion that if the employer was prevented from doing this under the Truck Act they would not have the threat hanging over their head of being discharged unless they signed away their right to this tub.

7516. Generally speaking, I gather your view is in favour of the total abolition of fines and deductions in so far as that could be accomplished?—Yes.

7517. Does that represent the opinion of your class?—Yes; that represents the opinion of the Lancashire and Cheshire miners.

7518. Do you think that discipline could be maintained as well in a mine in which there were no fines for that very dangerous thing which you referred to, namely, carrying lights?—Yes; I believe the discipline could be maintained better if fines were abolished, and the course which the employers have under the law were taken.

7519. You mean the remedy under the Mines Regulation Act of reporting to the authorities, and also dismissal if necessary?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

7520. It has been urged that discipline could not be secured in a mine without the aid of fines, although it might be in a factory, because a worker in a mine is working out of sight: what is your comment on that?—I do not agree with that at all, because although the workman is out of daylight he is not very far out of the sight of an official of the mine. We have a large number of officials in the mine who are constantly coming in contact with the workmen and who see them very often during the day, and therefore they are not out of sight so far as discipline is concerned.

7521. It was in that sense that the workman was represented to us as being out of sight—in the sense that he was very seldom seen by an official?—First of all we have the firemen in the mines who are supposed to visit the men's places, their workings, twice at least in one day. Many places they have to visit more than twice. Then there is the under-manager who is going through the mines every day. Then there is the general manager who goes into the mines as well. They are the officials who would generally report. In addition to that, all these three classes of officials have assistants who have the workmen constantly under their eyes.

7522. The manager and the under-manager would be responsible officials: would you say the same of the firemen, and the assistants of those three classes?—Yes.

7523. They are all responsible officials?—Yes.

7524. To turn to deductions rather than fines, I gather you do not object to the charge for materials in itself; you object only to the method in which it is exacted?—That is so.

7525. Now how do you distinguish in principle between the charge for an explosive and a charge for some action which is necessary to the proper use of that explosive, such as the moving of it? You say that in some cases it is too heavy for the miner to move himself and that he has to pay for its removal from one place to another?—It is not quite so much a question of its being too heavy as it is of convenience both for the employer and the workman. A man could carry his own explosives very easily from the general stores to his working place in the mine, but it is convenient to the employer and the workman that the employer should supply the whole of the explosives, because there are certain explosives only allowed to be used in certain mines, and the employer would always know that the explosive which was allowed according to the rules and regulations of the Home Secretary was used in that particular mine, through his purchasing it in bulk. Therefore that is a convenience to him and of course it is a convenience to the men to be supplied with their explosives at the mine rather than at the general stores.

7526. It is admitted that it is advisable that the explosives should be supplied by the employer; but how do you distinguish between the justice of the charge for the explosive itself supplied by the employer and the justice of a charge for something in relation to the explosive which is just as necessary to the process of mining as the explosive is?—I do not know that I could, except for the advantage and the convenience to employers. I understand that what you have in your mind now is the matter of the horse and cart for conveying the explosives from the general stores to the colliery. I do not see that I can justify the difference except that it is to the advantage and convenience of the employer as well as the workmen that he should supply these explosives. But the men are of opinion that the charge other than the actual cost of the explosive, should be a charge upon the concern.

7527. What you have just said would be an argument against the colliery charging for the explosive, would it not? You say it is a convenience to the employer that he should supply it?—No, I do not think so. So far as our mines in Lancashire are concerned it has always been the rule that the men pay for their own explosives. We used to use ordinary powder. Generally, that was purchased by the men themselves at the different stores in the district, and they carried it from their homes to the colliery. There are very few places where that happens now, but even now there are a few where they purchase at the stores. A change has taken place, and generally speaking the employer supplies the explosives. So that the charge for the explosive itself has always been paid by the workmen, but not the matters in connection with its supply; the men were never called upon in the past to pay for batteries or for storing it in the store house, and so on.

7528. My difficulty is this: I see a distinction in custom but not a distinction in principle. But I do not wish to press the point.

By Sir F. Cawley.

7529. You say some of these things are looked upon as grievances. I suppose they are debated in the union, but do they lead to any serious discontent? Is there any real discontent with regard to any of these deductions?—Oh, yes. For instance, with regard to the list which I have just handed in, the men working at that mine were charged for explosives and were discontented with the price, and brought the matter up to our association and asked that we should deal with it with a view to the price being reduced. They were of opinion that they were being charged too much, and they were very discontented.

7530. Your association is very strong, I take it? Practically all the colliers in the district are in it?—Yes.

7531. Are not you able to treat with the employers on an equal footing in regard to all these matters?—We try to do so, but I should not like to suggest that where we do not agree we should have a strike at the collieries. We try to avoid that.

7532. Do you want the law to come in and help you?—No; I do not think it is so much a question of asking the law to come in and help us as it is asking that the law should be so defined that these deductions should be prevented, so that there would be no trouble between us.

7533. Is it not really the fact that you are asking the law to come in, I do not say to give your men better wages, but to make the conditions under which they work more to their advantage?—No. We prefer to pay for our materials, as I have said, but we ask that we shall be allowed to pay for them rather than have the amount taken out of our wages.

7534. As regards the oil, I think it was?—And the other material, the explosive.

7535. I did not quite gather what advantage it was to you to pay for the oil direct. Instead of having the amount deducted from your wages you want to receive the money in hard cash and then to pay it back in hard cash?—That is so.

7536. What would be the advantage of that? I did not quite gather what you think it would be?—In considering that no doubt our men have had in mind, in addition to the question of the lamps, the fact that many times they are compelled to pay to clubs when they do not want to do so.

7538. Is the subscription to these clubs taken out of the oil fund?—No, it is taken out of the men's wages, in addition to what they pay for the oil.

7539. I will take the oil: the men do not suggest that they are paying more for it by the amount being deducted from their wages than they would do if they received the money and then paid it back?—Yes; they suggest they do.

7540. Why?—Well, we have a system of paying for oil. The system varies. At some collieries they fix it at 1d. per day—for the days that the men work they pay 1d. for the oil and the cleaning and everything in connection with the lamp, per day. At other collieries they pay 4d. per week, whether the pit works five or six days per week. We have an instance of one colliery in the district where I live where the men paid 5d. per week and another colliery where they paid 6d. per week. The firm found out over a period of a few years that they had saved, by this 5d., between £600 and £700; they had between £600 and £700 of the men's money. They then suggested that they should reduce the amount to 4d. per week. They thought that that would scarcely pay for the oil at that time, but it would allow the amount, between £600 and £700, which had been paid over and above the cost to go back again to the men who were working at the collieries at that time. The men were of opinion that if they paid this money direct for the oil they would have a better chance of ascertaining whether they were being overcharged or not.

7541. That is my point. I cannot quite see how they would be able to ascertain that better if they received 5d. and paid it back, than they would if they had the 5d. deducted?—In regard to paying back, it is more the principle that our men go upon there.

7542. They want to receive every penny they earn?—That is so. When they have earned their wages, they are of opinion that the wages ought to be paid to them, and that if the employer has supplied them with anything then they should pay the employer for that material out of the wages which they have earned.

7543. You do not suggest for a moment that the taking it out of their wages is any hardship to them so far as the cash is concerned: it is only that they think they ought to have their money paid in hard cash and then pay it back again?—Yes, with regard to the oil and material.

7544. There is no suggestion of any fraud?—No.

7545. Will you tell me with regard to the deductions for clubs?—We have several clubs, at different collieries.

7546. What kind of clubs?—Accident clubs. They are clubs arranged to pay men for accidents which they meet with at those particular collieries. They are managed by a committee appointed by the men and the officials jointly. The men object to the deductions being made for those clubs because they have found from experience that they have been compelled to subscribe to them when they do not want to do so. In some instances they will stop contributions to the club from the men's wages whether they have agreed or not. The men find out that it has been stopped from their wages when they are not members, and they object. They go back to the colliery office and ask for the money back, and it is returned to them. The same thing will be done again the week after, and they go back again and have it returned. Then in many cases the officials will go to the men and say, "I suppose you are not a member of our accident club?" They say, "No, I pay to sufficient clubs." Then the official says, "Well now, you know very well it would be much better if you were a member. All the men working in this district where you are working are members of the society, and it would be better if you were a member." Then the contribution will be stopped again. If the man demands it back again they will cease deducting the contribution for a time. But we have had case after case brought before us where, later on, the contribution has been been stopped again, and the officials have gone to him again, until the man has thought to himself, "Well, I can see that unless I become a member of this society I shall have no work here."

7547. What other society is there?—This is chiefly with regard to the accident societies.

7548. I mean what other clubs are there deductions for in the collieries? Do they have to subscribe to hospitals?—Yes; we have collieries where the men subscribe to hospitals, but I have never heard of any complaints made by the men for subscriptions to hospitals.

7549. Really, your contention comes to this, broadly speaking, that your members want to receive all their money in hard cash, and if they wish to belong to any club, or if there is anything they have to pay, they want to put their hand in their pocket, and pay for what they have received, and not have it deducted in the office?—Yes.

7550. With regard to the inspectors, you do not care to appeal to them very much?—Our men do not seem to care very much for the inspectors being called in. As I have said, they think they are rather too lenient with the employers.

7551. They think they are not quite impartial?—That is with regard to these deductions. With regard to the Mines Regulation Act they are very pleased to call the inspectors in.

7552. But not with regard to deductions?—The inspectors do seem to lean to the employers' side with regard to the amount, and some are very favourable to deductions being made from the wages.

7553. I have only one more question, and that is with regard to the explosives. When a man accepts a situation, practically he agrees upon certain wages, and to find his own explosives. If he had really to find his own explosives, if he had to buy them delivered to him on the spot he would have to pay all the charges which he now grumbles at having to pay; warehousing, cartage, and everything that he now has to pay he would also have to pay if he bought the explosives himself, delivered to him in the mine?—Supposing he bought from a dealer in the district, the dealer, of course, would put that on the price which he charged for the exlposives.

7554. He has to pay what he would have to pay if he literally fulfilled the terms of his contract of employment; that is, if he bought his own explosives and had them delivered to him where he has to work?—I do not think he would have to pay all the charges he has to pay now. There is the battery and the man and the horse and cart. Of course the employers must have paid this to these men, but we cannot conceive how it can have cost the money that it has cost in that case.

7555. Do you suggest the employers are making a profit?—Yes; we are of opinion that the employers have been making a profit out of it in this particular case, and they are no doubt covering that by including charges which the men contend ought not to be put upon them.

By Mr. Walsh.

7556. I notice you speak of the fines not being imposed according to the Truck Act?—Yes.

7557. It is not necessary for me to ask you the particular district in which you conduct your operations, because I know it perfectly well; mainly it is south-east Lancashire?—Yes.

7558. Having Manchester as its centre?—Yes.

7559. Are there no schedules of fines, i.e., the amounts and the offences, posted up in any of those collieries?—In none of the collieries that I am aware of.

7560. And there is no contract in writing before the offence is committed?—No.

7561. In every case to your knowledge if there is a contract in writing that contract is entered into after the offence has been committed?—Yes.

7562. The amount, of course, being one which has not been known at all by the workman previously?—No.

7563. It is simply fixed by the officials themselves?—Yes.

7564. You say in your précis that freedom of contract cannot obtain under such conditions: how would you develop that?—What I mean with regard to that is this: a man is alleged to have committed an offence. It is said he will be fined. He has an idea that, although he may not have committed the alleged offence, unless he agrees to a fine it will possibly lead to his discharge, and he agrees to the fine rather than be discharged.

7565. So that you have put it that there is no freedom of contract, inasmuch as a man has either to agree to a fine or else risk dismissal?—Yes, for something which in his opinion he has not done at all, or something which he is alleged to have left undone. That is the case although he has committed no offence at all.

7566. As has been very well said, coal mining is entirely different from many of these other industries. Is there a good bit of fining in that part of Lancashire?—I do not say there is a great deal of fining in that part of Lancashire. I am of opinion that Mr. Twist, who speaks for the other portion of the county, will tell you that there is more fining there than in the district with which I am directly connected.

7567. If fining did conduce to a higher standard of discipline, would that be shown in the statistics of accidents of the mines?—I should think it would if it did, but I am of opinion it does not.

7568. That is to say if fining brought about the result that the owners themselves desire, you believe it would show itself in the Accident Tables?—Yes, I believe it would.

7569. Is there a lower ratio of accidents in your own district of recent years?—No.

7570. Accidents have not fallen appreciably in number?—Very little indeed.

7571. So that in that sense, so far as accidents are concerned, fining has not produced a higher standard of discipline?—It has not.

7572. Or at least it has not shown itself in a diminished table of accidents?—No.

7573. Of course we know that there are both serious offences and minor offences in mines; for the serious offences, as you know, the general and special rules of the Act of Parliament and of this office have provided?—Yes.

7574. Would you say that the proper course is to prosecute for a serious offence for a breach of the general or special rules?—Yes; the proper course would be to take the offender before the magistrate.

7575. And for minor offences, what would you say? Caution?—For minor offences, yes. If caution was not sufficient, then the employers have the option of discharge, or even of taking the offender before the magistrate for minor offences.

7576. Of course they can take them before a court of summary jurisdiction for misconduct which does not actually amount to a breach of rule?—Exactly.

7577. You have spoken of living in the employers' houses as a condition of obtaining employment: that of course you have proved. Am I to understand that if they wish to retain their employment under such circumstances they must live in one of the employers' houses?—Certainly.

7578. So that both to obtain employment and to retain employment when got they must, if necessary, live in the employers' houses?—Yes.

7579. Could you give this Committee any cases where the operation of either of those conditions has led to serious hardship ?—I could not speak of any in that particular district.

7580. Mr. Twist who speaks for south-west Lancashire will give evidence upon that subject ?—Yes.

7581. You spoke of L 4: Are you aware whether that is a condition of employment there ?—I do not know that it is.

7582. As you know, they do possess a good many houses in the vicinity to which you referred some time ago ?—Yes. I could not speak as to that company particularly.

7583. You have spoken of deductions from men's wages on account of bad work and materials, such as dirt in coal ?—Yes. "Wages" of course mean that when the man has filled a tub of coal it goes over the machine. It is his wages in that sense.

7584. That certainly does represent the wage value, undoubtedly. Are you aware of any deductions from actual wages for this dirt in coal ?—Do you mean in the colliery office ?

7586. When a man has sent a dirty box up, are you aware whether, in addition to losing the weight of the box (or, perhaps, without losing that) he has had to agree to a money fine because of the fact of having sent up a dirty box ?—I have heard of them; they have been reported to the Committee, but I have not a case in mind. I take it Mr. Twist will go into that part of the case from our county.

7587. As you are probably aware, the decision in the higher courts have made it illegal to deduct from money under the Mines Regulation Act: the deductions must be from weight ?—Yes.

7588. And therefore if there were any deductions from wages, from money, those deductions would be illegal ?—Yes.

7589. You are not aware of any cases in your own district ?—I am not aware of any case at all in my own district.

7590. The deductions which you refer to are deductions under the Mines Regulation Act ?—Yes, in addition to what has been agreed to under the clause in the Act.

7591. And sometimes in default of any agreement?—And sometimes in default of any agreement.

By Mr. Maddison.

7592. Your general evidence has been in the direction of objecting to deductions from wages for various things ?—Yes.

7593. I gather so, and I shall be glad to know if I am right, that the reason of that objection is that you want the law to leave the miners free to make an ordinary bargain in an ordinary way ?—That is so.

7594. And that while in the main it may leave things the same as they are now with regard to cost, there are some things which might be altered in favour of the miners by them being left free ?—I believe there are things which would be altered.

7595. Just take oil and material: do you think that you always get them at market price ?—No; our men are of opinion that they pay much more than they ought to do.

7596. Therefore you think, if no deductions from wages were made and, instead, the men made payments, they would be likely to make fairer bargains for the things they use ?—Yes, that is our opinion.

7597. So that as a matter of fact, there is more than a mere sentimental basis to your objection ?—Yes.

7598. That is to say, speaking as a good Lancashire man, there is money behind this ?—Yes; there is money behind it, in the opinion of our men.

7699. Now take the case of explosives. I think you have already stated that there are a few cases where the men buy their explosives at a dealer's ?—Yes.

7600. Have you any means of comparing the price of the explosives so bought with those got at the pit-head or colliery office ?—The quality of the material used is so different that I do not think it would help us. Where they purchase the explosives from a dealer they use ordinary powder, which is much cheaper than the higher explosives.

7601. With regard to the tenancy of employers' houses being made a condition of employment, and deductions from wages following therefrom, would you say that the rent paid for the accommodation is about equal in the case of those men who have to go into their employers' houses and those who do not go in because there are none to let, and therefore go elsewhere ?—No; I think that the men who are compelled to take employer's houses pay higher rents than those who go into an ordinary house, so far as Lancashire is concerned. Mr. T. Greenall. 12 Dec. 1906.

7602. So that it is compulsion plus higher rents ?—Yes, plus higher rents. I might say not only higher rents, but not equal accommodation. That is perhaps more the case than higher rents.

7603. So that it comes again to the point that by this method of deduction a man is deprived of making so good a bargain as he could otherwise make ?—Yes.

7604. Just a concluding question about fines. I think we have had it put in evidence before, very strongly, that a mine differed very materially from a workshop, inasmuch as mining is a dangerous employment because a man can destroy a lot of lives, and so on, and, from that consideration, the view was that when an offence has been committed one must either prosecute or fine, that offences cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed because if this were done discipline would become lax. Do you agree with that ?—No, I do not.

7605. You think that a serious caution in the case of minor offences and a summons in the case of the major offences would be a better method ?—I do.

7606. Followed eventually, in the minor cases if the man did not take the caution, and in the more serious cases, by discharge ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

7607. It has been suggested to us that, if in all cases the owners prosecuted for breaches of special rules instead of fining, that would to some extent disorganise the work of the mine, because it would involve the taking off of an official—one official at least, if not more—from the work of supervision, to go to the justices' court for a whole day. What do you say as to that ?—Of course it would mean in most cases that one of the officials would have to go to the court. But as I mentioned before these officials have assistants, men who are training themselves to become officials, both the firemen, under-managers and managers, and when these officials are in court the assistants take their place. They are certainly a man less at the colliery, but there is no danger in that; the work will go on just in the same way as if the manager was there during that particular day.

7608. You do not think the safety of the mine is in any way prejudiced ?—Not in the slightest.

7609. I gather the men have not been in the habit of appealing to the inspectors on questions arising under the Truck Act ?—No. My friend Mr. Twist will tell you more about that next week, because in that particular part of the country where he is coming from I understand they have appealed to the inspector. The report to us was that it was with very poor satisfaction. We have not appealed very much to the inspectors in connection with deductions.

7610. I suppose you could not tell me how many complaints have been made to the inspectors ?—No.

7611. You said in answer to Mr. Walsh that the owner had the power of bringing a man before the Court for acts of misconduct which did not involve any breach of the special or general rules. Is that so ?—Yes, I think so. If a man misconducted himself in the mine the owner could take the ordinary course of bringing him before the justices with a view to his being punished.

7612. Can you tell me under what power ?—I have not thought of that point. It has not occurred to me to look the matter up as to what power it would be under. Therefore I could not answer that satisfactorily just now.

7613. Is there any practice of suspension in the mining industry for offences ?—Oh, yes.

7614. To what extent does that prevail ?—They what we call "grass" them occasionally for a day, or even as much as a week, for a little offence.

Mr. T. Greenall.
12 Dec. 1906.

7615. What view does your union take of that ?—Whevever a person is suspended for something which he is alleged to have done, enquiry is made and if it is found that the man has committed the offence our Association take no note of it whatever ; the man has to take the responsibility of his actions. When we find a man has been wrongfully suspended of course we try to get him back to his work and we support him for the time he is away.

7616. Supposing that all fines for minor offences are abolished as you suggest, do you see any probability of the managers adopting a wholesale system of suspensions for the same things ?—No, I do not think so.

7617. There is the alternative of suspension as well as that of prosecution, and the management may think it is an easier and more convenient method just to suspend a man for a day ?—I do not think so, because when a man is suspended he is not earning any profit for the employer who has engaged him.

7618. Do the men often exercise their power of audit with regard to deductions for sharpening tools, and other matters ?—No, they do not ; it is very seldom.

7619. You are aware there is that power ?—Yes, it is in the Act, but we very seldom put that into operation.

7620. Can you give me any reason for that ? Is it not a useful power ?—The only reason I can give for that is that when men are paying something near what they think they ought to pay, they are not very particular about it ; they get careless.

7621. Is not that a very valuable power in checking these additional items which you have been complaining about ? —Oh yes, it certainly is a valuable power. In the instance which I gave, where the company had made over £700, the men knew nothing at all about that. I think the company themselves mentioned it.

7622. Would not that have been discovered if you had had a system of audit ?—Yes, it would.

7623. With regard to deductions for rent and oil and so forth, you appreciate the convenience it is to the employers as a matter of bookkeeping ?—I do not see it at all.

7624. You do not appreciate the convenience it is to them to deduct the amounts when they pay the wages rather than to institute a system of collection from the workmen afterwards ?—I do not see where the advantage comes in. When a man goes on Friday night for his wages they could have a collector in the next room, as there is for our check-weighman's money, and it could be done in the same way. In my opinion it would be much simpler for the employers ; there would be less clerical work than going right through the wages and making deductions therefrom.

7425. I understand your suggestion to be that the workmen should repay the amounts at once on the spot ? — Exactly.

7626. I have already asked you generally with regard to complaints to the inspectors, but would you say Yes or No whether those matters of the deposit of 6d. for the brass checks and the men signing away a tub of dirty coal have been brought to the notice of the inspector ?—No ; they have not. We have written to the employers about them, but we have never brought them to the notice of the inspector.

7627. Do you not bring complaints about check-weighing to the notice of the inspector ?—No ; we generally deal with them ourselves with the employers.

THIRTIETH DAY.

Tuesday, 18th December, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., (Lord Advocate for Scotland) (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN. WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. THOMAS R. FERENS, M.P., called and examined.

Mr. T. R. Ferens, M.P.
18 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

7628. You are member of Parliament for East Hull ? —I am.

7629. You have been associated with Messrs. Reckitt & Sons, Limited, who are starch and blue manufacturers, Hull and London ?—Yes.

7630. I believe you have been associated with that firm for nearly forty years ?—Yes.

7631. During a large proportion of that time you were managing director ?—I was.

7632. May I take it that you know the working and administration of the business thoroughly ?—Quite intimately.

7633. What number of hands does the company employ ?—2,500 to 3,000.

7634. And where are they employed ?—Mainly in the city of Hull. We have factories elsewhere.

7635. What is the proportion of females ?—I should think 1,500 females.

7636. Is there a separate factory under which all this is conducted ?—We have factories in Australia and America, but the greater proportion of the women are empldoye in the city of Hull. We have two buildings where they are employed, but they are only five minutes' walk apart. Nearly all are under one roof, so to speak.

7637. Your recollection of course goes back far anterior to the 1896 Act ?—It does.

7638. You are aware generally speaking of the system of fines and deductions from wages which has been so much discussed in industrial circles for many years ?—Yes.

7639. And I believe your firm did address itself to considering the discipline, and how that was affected by the system of fines ?—That is so.

7640. Take a period of, say, about twenty years ago, would you kindly tell me what was the nature of the fines? I understand a system of fines was then in vogue ?—Yes, for being late. This mainly applied to girls, but it applied to men to some extent. They were fined 2d. For doing bad work, careless work, they were fined 1d. to 3d.

7641. Will you give me some detail about that ? We should be rather interested to hear about it ?—We employ young women for packing up starch and blue and other things, light work, and we as manufacturers think it of the greatest importance that our goods should be put upon the market in a very neat form, for example, that the labels should be straight and properly put on.

If the girls were throwing the labels on all askew, and not closing up the packets tightly, and so on, then the packets would "dust," as we call it, and get dirty, and bring the firm into bad repute for sending out goods which were not well packed. It was carelessness in those directions which was termed bad work.

7642. Had you anything for damage, for wasting labels or anything of that sort ?—Yes. I have seen instances myself from my own observation scores and scores of times of such wastefulness. Perhaps a girl may have a lot of labels brought out, and have the paste on them, when the bell rings; and instead of cleaning off the paste and leaving those labels available for after dinner, she will tear them up and put them in the waste paper basket, in order to save herself the slightest trouble. It was to prevent that waste, which was a very serious matter in our case when the things were being used by the million, that a small fine was imposed—only a few coppers, varying according to the seriousness of the offence.

7643. Were there other errors committed ?—Yes, in the wrong weighing of goods. I may say that as we send out thousands of tons of stuff, packed in small packets of from 1 oz. up to 1 lb., if they gave a little over-weight in every oz. it would be a very serious matter in the course of a year, and the consequence was we had to be particular.

7644. What was the fine imposed ?—3d. for wrong weighing, if it was pretty general. Of course little things were overlooked. I may say that the amount of fines never amounted to much.

7645. I will come to that. I am taking you by steps so as to get it systematically. Will you give us the remainder of the catalogue of fines ?—There is gadding about—girls going into the wrong work rooms and taking up the attention of other girls, gossiping, and so on, which had to be checked. They were fined from 2d. to 4d.

7646. Suppose they stayed away from work without permission ?—They were fined from 3d. to 6d. according to the nature of the offence.

7647. Let us see if we have the catalogue right. Of course, all these things have reference, I understand, to a period of twenty years ago at the nearest ?—That is so.

7648. There was lateness or absence from work ?—Yes.

7649. There was bad work ?—Yes.

7650. There was waste of material ?—Yes.

7651. And there was bad discipline, where the girls went where they should not have gone, upsetting the organisation of the place ?—Yes.

7652. These were substantially the categories ?—That is so.

7653. Under bad work you include such things as wrong weighing and the like ?—Wrong weighing was a separate one. Under bad work I should put down careless and indifferent packing. What happened would be this: perhaps a girl might have a hundredweight of work on her table, and if the foreman or forewoman came round and found a number of those packets badly packed, it meant they had to be opened out, and the firm lost a great deal more than the fines imposed, because we would not send out the bad work, and therefore the labels, and the paper boxes in which the goods were packed would be all wasted to the firm.

7654. What I wish to get from you is this: in nearly all those cases there was something to show in defence of fines, inasmuch as you lost time, material, or work ?—Of course that is so.

7655. That was at the back of the system, as the defence for it ?—Yes. There was no compensation. I do not mean to say that these fines were in any degree compensation for bad work.

7656. That state of matters was taken into account by your firm ?—It was.

7657. Was it then a limited concern ?—Yes; it has been a limited concern since 1879. It was both a private company and a limited concern during the period that these fines were in vogue.

7658. Were you in the position of managing director about that time ?—Yes, I was.

7659. I suppose you submitted the matter to the directors and they considered it carefully ?—I do not think so. I think it was a matter which the management undertook. It was left very much to us.

7660. The directors took the advice of the manager ?—No; I do not think they ever interfered with it. It was left to us. We were in a responsible position, and we did not refer matters of detail of that sort to them.

7661. You were not merely the manager; you were managing director ?—Yes.

7662. What was the result of your consideration of the matter ?—We found this, that these fines and deductions from the wages were very obnoxious to the workpeople. In my experience they disliked intensely any deduction from their wages. The annoyance to them was far more than was represented by the amount deducted. That was our experience. We found it was causing so much dissatisfaction that we concluded at any rate to try the entire abolition of fines and to adopt other means.

7663. At the time, did these fines and deductions amount to very much in the gross ?—Very little.

7664. But still, it was a thorn ?—It was always a thorn, yes. But the amount that we received was never serious. I have not a clear recollection, but my impression is we used them for some purpose to the benefit of the workpeople. I know we had a library at the time, and I am not sure that the fines were not used in some way for their benefit. But the amount was small; it was quite insignificant.

7665. But however they were disposed of, even though they went to the workmen's benefit ultimately, the dissatisfaction rankled and remained ?—That is so.

7666. Did you then resolve to rely upon good management and sound discipline ?—Yes, with the imposition of certain punishments in case of serious offences. For smaller things they were talked to by the foreman and the forewoman, and so on.

7667. In the smaller things they were given a warning and a talking-to ?—That is so.

7668. Of course you have to be careful that you get people of clear head and sound sense to manage them ?—We are particular to have people of good character and reliability to manage them. I may say that all the forewomen are chosen from the best conducted young women in the place. We never go outside for a forewoman; we always promote them.

7669. Would you mind telling us the average wage of males and females ?—We pay the standard rate of wages to the workmen. I mean to say, we pay them more than the average rate, but the minimum wage is the standard rate of wage for saw-millers, fitters, joiners, and bricklayers, and we have a large number of all those men employed. I suppose in the fitting department we should have eighty men employed for our machinery, repairing it and so on, and they are all paid at least the standard rate of wages. With regard to young women's wages, three or four years ago our young women were coming at half past six in the morning; they had half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner, and I think they were working at that time fifty-four hours a week. We thought it was not very nice for the young women to be trudging through the streets in snowstorms and so on and we said we would try the experiment of letting them commence work at 8 o'clock in the morning, and have their breakfast before they started. We thought they could not work so well before breakfast, especially in cold weather, and we thought that as nearly all of them were paid on piece work probably they would be able to earn as much if they came at 8 o'clock in the morning and worked altogether forty-seven hours a week. They left at the same time in the evening as they had been accustomed to leave, and I think they worked till 12 or 12.30 on Saturdays. To our surprise and delight, when we took their average earnings after the alteration we found that they were earning more than they had been before the alteration was made.

7670-7671. That is very gratifying ?—Yes.

Mr. T. R. Ferens, M.P.

18 Dec 1906.

7672. Now you have told us about the warning that is given in the case of minor offences. What is the system adopted in the case of more serious offences ?—For serious misbehaviour or serious rudeness they are suspended for one day. For persistent neglect, and bad work, they are suspended for a week. That is not in the case of the first offence, but if they get into a chronic state. For bad language, about which we are very particular, they are discharged. Employing so many young women, we are particular about the language, and in my forty years' experience I have perhaps not heard bad language used more than twice, which is a very small number of times in a great factory. Of course they do not use it if we are about, but still, one would incidentally hear it if it were a common practice. As I say, for bad language they are discharged, but there has only been one case during the past two years, so our manager tells me. Only managers or assistant-managers are allowed to put these rules into force. No foreman or forewoman is allowed to send workpeople home.

7673. So that a case of even temporary dismissal is a matter which is seriously considered ?—That is so.

7674. And as far as possible they are freed from what might be called the region of caprice or animosity ?—That is quite so.

7675. What is the result ? We are anxious to know the result of the abolition of the system of fines and the introduction of the method of discipline which you have just described ?—I consider that the discipline and organisation of the factory are better than they were in the old days. One is rather chary of saying that, because one was managing director at that time, but, honestly, I never knew the factory in a better state of discipline and organisation than it is now.

7676. Is there greater contentment among the workers from the fact of the system being abolished, do you think ?—I do.

7677. Do you find traces of discontent on the score of unjust dismissal, or do you think on the whole that is accepted as a reasonable punishment ?—It is very seldom resorted to. I have not heard complaints of it, and I think we should have heard complaints if it had been serious. I do not know whether it bears upon the subject at all, but our workpeople are very content to stay with us, and do stay, because we have a Pension Fund to which the workpeople contribute nothing, but which entitles the men, when they come to the age of sixty or sixty-five (according to the time they come to us) and women when they come to the age of fifty or fifty-five, to be pensioned off at half the highest rate of wages that they have earned during any five years. They contribute nothing to the fund, but they must have been fifteen years continuously in our service before they are eligible for the pension.

7678. Now there is one matter which has bothered the Committee a good deal, namely chronic lateness : will you tell me what regulations you have actually introduced in respect to that ?—The men and boys start work at 6 o'clock, and they have a licence or grace of three minutes. If they arrive at the works more than three minutes after 6 o'clock they are admitted, but they do not begin to work till half-past 6 o'clock, and they are paid from half-past six. If they do not begin work by 9 o'clock in the morning they are not permitted to begin work that day.

7679. Then the women ?—The women come at 8 o'clock. If they come within five minutes of that time they are allowed to enter. But the same rule applies to them ; if they do not begin by 9 o'clock they may not begin in the middle of the day. As Mr. Maddison knows, we have a great many bridges over the river, and one great excuse for lateness in Hull is that the bridge was up. If a few girls or men come late and say that the bridge was up, and we happen to know it was high tide, we excuse them.

7680. And they are allowed to start at once when they arrive ?—Yes, because we know it is a legitimate excuse.

7681. I want to clear up about those hours. I gather that you find the product of the forty-seven hours, beginning at 8 o'clock, better than that of the fifty-four hours ?—Yes.

7682. What was the system before ?—The girls began at half past 6 and had half an hour for breakfast.

By Sir F. Cawley.

7683. I only want to ask one question about being late in the morning. Do you not consider suspension to be even a heavier punishment than a small fine would be ? I think you say they are suspended until breakfast time if they are five minutes late in the case of the girls, or three minutes in the case of the men ?—It was the same before ; we had the same rules existing then. There was a limit as to time ; they were not allowed to come in at any time they liked.

7684. But you had fining then ?—I mean if anyone presented himself at a quarter past 6 in the old days, he was not allowed in.

7685. Was there a fine besides that ? You had fines in the old days for coming late ?—That is so.

7686. Do you know how much it was ?—2d. Up to a certain time—I am sorry I cannot give you the precise time—they were allowed in and might go on with their work, and were fined 2d. But still, there was a limit of time beyond which they were not allowed to begin work.

7687. Now you have done away with fines and you trust entirely to suspending them till breakfast time if the men are three minutes late and the girls are five minutes late ?—Yes.

7688. That is quite as severe as you had before ?—I think so.

7689. But you find the system of suspension better than the system of fines ?—Yes, because from my experience I know they hate any deductions from their wages.

7690. Do you think you would maintain equal discipline if you had nether fines nor suspension ?—No ; I do not think so How can you ? You must have some laws or you would have no organisation whatever.

By Mr. Walsh.

7691. Much of the evidence which we have had before has seemed to consist, speaking roughly, of matters with regard to which the workmen have complained that they have little or no control but in your case it seems that the workpeople had control over those particular acts for which they were fined. For instance, the labels which were improperly affixed ; that would be a matter well within the competence of the workpeople ?—Certainly. It was a question of carelessness.

7692. And the waste of labels also ?—That was wilful.

7693. Wrong weighing seems to have been one matter for which they were subject to fines, but sometimes, even with the best intentions, they might weigh wrongly, might they not ?—No, it was not just a little thing ; it was wilful carelessness.

7694. It has to be a substantial matter of complaint ?—Yes. Nearly all our people are paid by the piece, and under those circumstances there is a temptation to rush the work through the scales and not give the scales proper time to adjust the weight. Of course it would pay them to give half an ounce extra in half a lb.—let the scale bang down.

7695. In order to get the work done more quickly, and add to their pay ?—Yes, at the expense of the employer.

7696. The only point I would like to bring out is this, that even these matters (which do seem to me to have been well within the control of the workpeople) have largely disappeared with the disappearance of fines ?—Yes.

7697. Do you find now that the fines are abolished that the labels are affixed better and that there is nothing like so great a waste of labels ?—I do not know that one would be consequential on the other. I think it is merely a matter of efficient oversight and so on. For, any persistent neglect, or bad work, there is suspension for one week, and so on.

7698. I was going to ask you—of course it is rather a metaphysical question—as to how far the irritation which is produced by fines would conduce to bad work ?—Not at all.

7699. You do not think so ?—No, I do not think so for a moment. If they were fined they would not go and punish themselves more by doing other bad work.

7700. Not necessarily punish themselves more, but does not irritation produce a lower standard of conduct, so to speak ?—Not to that extent, I think.

7701. You think really it is an increase in efficiency of the foremen and forewomen ?—Yes, I think so.

7702. Better oversight ?—Yes, I think so, generally speaking. I do not know that I could say that the abolition of fines had affected the work so much. It was more a question of the irritation week by week when the amount was deducted on the Friday night. I do not think it rankled in their minds during the week. I do not know that I could say that.

7703. Only at the particular time when they came to draw their money ?—Yes, week by week.

7704. You feel positive upon the point that the infliction of fines did lead to a lower standard of discipline, I suppose ?—I cannot say that quite. I do not know that I would say it led to it. Why we abolished fines was because they caused so much irritation and dissatisfaction.

7705. You are a politician, and must have felt irritated many times: do you think that irritation stops at that point ? Has it no other results ? Does not irritation almost always conduce to something like inefficiency ? Does it lead to a higher standard of conduct ?—It is quite possible it might have an effect in a small degree, but I could not conscientiously say that it conduced to bad work.

7706. Do not you think that the fact that fines have not been inflicted now for a long time would lead to a better standard of conduct on the part of the workpeople ?—I do not know that I could say so.

7707. You think it is mainly a matter of increased efficiency on the part of your officials ?—Yes, and of course we work under very much better conditions now. In the old days we had low rooms and cramped conditions; our factories are now better equipped; the rooms are larger and better ventilated, and the conditions are better in every way. We do a good deal of social work. I do not know that it comes within your reference, or else I could mention the social work we are doing.

By Mr. Maddison.

7708. Of course I know your works fairly well. Though you cannot trace out the positive effects of the abolition of fines, you are quite clear that fines have not been necessary to the higher discipline of your works ?—That is so.

7709. Because you never knew them in a better condition than they are now ?—That is so.

7710. And you get the same sort of girls as you did then ?—Well; they are improved. I must say we improve with regard to that. In order to get a better class of girls we have an educated lady who visits the homes of the work girls we are going to employ. We are always trying to improve the type of our girls.

7711. So that there are various contributory factors, but you think the abolition of fines has been one ?—Yes, I think so.

7712. Take a concrete case; how do you stand with regard to lateness ? Are the girls more punctual now than they were before ?—I cannot say that they are without enquiring.

7713. Have you more suspensions or less than you used to have under the fining system ? I do not mean for lateness, but the other suspensions ?—They were not so much suspended under the fining system. They were fined instead of being suspended.

7714. But you still had suspensions for greater things ?—No. Suspensions are in place of the fines.

7715. Have you more dismissals now than you had before ?—No, I do not think so.

7716. You have no more dismissals than you had before ?—I do not think so.

7717. Not even among those younger girls ?—No, I do not think so.

7718. Would you say from your experience that the abolition of fines would in any way cause more dismissals amongst the younger girls and the sort of labour which you can get more readily ?—No, I do not think so.

7719. With regard to hot water, the cook, and so on, are there any deductions for those things ?—No. We began a dining-room in a comparatively small way between thirty and forty years ago—I should think nearer forty than thirty. We put on cooks and charged the girls 1d. or 2d. a week—some small sum. From memory, I should think that for the last thirty years and more we have found three or four cooks for them and never charged them a cent. We find dining-rooms and hot water, and we do their cooking for them. They bring their chops and steaks and things of that sort, and they are cooked for them; and we find them hot water and so on, and charge nothing. We have recreations for them, and charge them nothing for that. We give them the time. We take batches of young women, and have a physical instructor from the Young People's Institute of Hull, a properly qualified man, who comes down and puts them through their gymnastic performance. We take them in batches day by day.

7720. Apart from recreation of that kind, would you say, as a man who has had experience in this kind of labour, that the cleaning of water closets, the provision of hot water, and so on, are reasonable things to expect a firm to provide ?—Most reasonable, and we do make such provision.

7721. I am right in assuming that in your firm you have no deductions for anything ?—None whatever, except for their sick club. The women contribute 1d., 1½d., or 2d., according to their standing in the works, and to every penny they contribute we contribute another penny, and they derive all the benefit.

7722. Are all compelled to contribute ?—Yes, they are.

7723. It is a condition of employment ?—Yes.

7724. Do you think that is right ?—I do. We contribute half, and the women get twice the benefit of their subscriptions, because they get every penny of it. There are no charges for management. Our cashier is the treasurer. Suppose they contribute £500 a year to the fund, we contribute another £500, and it all goes to them in benefit, because if funds accumulate then so much per week is deducted from their contributions.

7725. Is this fund of yours approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies ?—I do not know that we have ever applied. I may say that the men also have a sick fund to which they contribute a larger amount and get a larger benefit. We contribute half as much as they contribute.

7726. Is that a condition of employment ?—Oh yes, certainly.

7727. A man cannot work there unless he joins the club ?—I do not think so.

7728. Do you think that is right ?—I do.

7729. Suppose a man has made provision, or thinks that he can make provision, better outside and is not disposed to contribute to both, do you think you should dictate which he should contribute to ?—He gets the benefit from both then. Many a time when a man is off work he gets more than when he is at work. He gets his benefit from both.

7730. You think you have a right to dictate to the workpeople where they shall make their provision for sickness ?—I do. We are giving half as regards the women and a third with regard to the men, and that gives us a right. We do so because we wish them to have provision in case of sickness.

By the Chairman.

7731. I wish to put to you some things, not connected with your works; in view of your experience, I think the Committee would be glad to have your evidence upon them. We have had evidence given before us with regard to a charge made for power by employers upon their workmen; you have nothing of that kind ?—No; we have nothing of the sort.

7732. And you would wholly disapprove of it ?—I should indeed. I should say the wages ought to be regulated so as to be quite independent.

Mr. T. R. Ferens, M.P.

18 Dec. 1906.

7733. We have had evidence of a charge being made for lighting ?—The same answer would apply to that, most certainly.

7734. We have also had evidence with regard to a charge being made for overalls required by the workmen?—We give our young women in the dirty departments overalls, and they are sent out week by week to be washed by people outside. We stand the cost of the overalls and the cost of the washing ; we do not charge them a cent.

7735. In all these cases you think the cost should be part of the on cost of the works ?—Certainly.

7736. So far, you avoid all possible causes of friction as to the amount of the charges and their fairness and so on by taking the burden of it as part of the disbursement of the business ?—Quite so.

7737. We have had evidence that deductions are made from, or fines imposed upon, a particular worker, who takes part in one process of the work only for any defect there may be—the hammer falls at that particular stage, so to speak, which is the last stage before the work is turned out—although the responsibility for defect may have been due to the work done at an anterior stage. You can quite gather that there would be an acute feeling of irritation there ?—Yes.

7738. Of course you have no experience of anything of that sort, and I gather you would disapprove of such a system ?—I should.

7739. As Mr. Walsh elicited from you, your fines really were imposed for matters for which a work person was personally responsible ?—That is so.

7740. But this is a harder and grosser case of a fine or deduction being made where the personal responsibility might not attach to the person suffering it ?—I should consider that most unjust.

7741. You are not surprised at there being a widespread feeling against such a system ?—I should be surprised if there were not.

By Mr. Maddison.

7742. May I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call Mr. Ferens' attention to the second section of the Shop Clubs Act which requires any shop club or thrift fund to be registered under the Friendly Societies' Act.

By the Chairman.

7743. Do you happen to know about the Shop Clubs Act ?—No, I do not, but if Mr. Maddison gives me the reference I will have it enquired into.

7744. I think it is quite possible that your clerk or book-keeper, who no doubt will be a skilled man, may know the provisions of that Act of Parliament and have complied with them. If you find anything which you think would be necessary as a supplement to your evidence, will you please make it in writing to the Secretary ?—I will. I will let you know if we are registered or not. I do not think we are.*

*The Secretary has since received a letter from Mr. Ferens, in which in regard to Questions 7722-30 and 7742 he writes as follows :—

"On further inquiry in regard to our Sick Clubs being registered, I find that our workpeople are not now compelled to join our Clubs....It is only, we believe, where it is compulsory for the workpeople to join the Clubs, that registration is necessary, and we prefer to keep the management of the Clubs in our our own hands."

Mr. EDMUND WALKDEN called and examined.

Mr. E. Walkden.

18 Dec. 1907.

By the Chairman.

7745. You come from Brynn, I understand ?—Yes.

7746. Where is that ?—Near Wigan—about four miles out.

7747. What position do you hold with regard to the Miners' Organisation ?—I am Secretary of the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society.

7748. What is the membership ?—About 13,500 now.

7749. What are the objects of the society ?—The objects are to provide accident pay when a man meets with an accident, and to provide for widows and children in the case of fatal accidents.

7750. Of course all that is over and above what the law would give ?—Oh yes, certainly.

7752. We want you to tell us frankly what you think of the system of what I might call compulsory contributions. When a man enters certain employment, the system is this, let us say: he is told "You will get so much wage, but remember, you must belong to our sick club, and if you do not belong to it, we cannot have you." We want your evidence with regard to a system of that kind ?—I should have to go back a considerable number of years in order to give you a fair idea of what has taken place in Lancashire during that period. I should have to go back to the time when I was a young man. I was then a member of the trade union, and my remembrance of the thing is pretty vivid. That was in 1881, when the Employers' Liability Act came into force. At that time we had a strike in Lancashire, which was brought about by several things. Amongst them was the Employers' Liability Bill, as to whether we should have the Act when it came into force or whether we should not. There were also questions of weekly pay and other things which it is not necessary for me to mention now. At that time we were compelled directly to pay to the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society, and we forewent the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act. The employers at that time agreed to contribute 25 per cent., but unfortunately instead of doing so, some of them paid 10 per cent., some 15 per cent., some 20 per cent., some 25 per cent., and some paid nothing at all. It worked out on the average for the whole period to about 17 per cent. that the employers paid. To give you figures, so that you will understand what it means, the workmens' contributions worked out to something like £48,000, and the employers' contributions were rather over £9,000. Contributions to this Society was a condition of employment then, in the whole of the collieries that I am speaking of, in fact you could not go down into a mine unless you signed a printed form in a book to that effect.

7753. We might call that a wholesale system of contracting out ?—Yes. That worked from 1881 down to the coming into force of the Workmen's Compensation Act in 1897. During the whole of that period I was working in the mine, and I was also secretary to the Ashton and Haydock District Miners' Association, which had a membership of 14,000. I was secretary for thirteen years, so that I should have a fair knowledge of what took place in the labour world.

7754. Since contracting out in that way has been abolished, that is, since the Act of 1897, there has been a certain system in vogue with regard to these sick and benefit societies ?—Had I not better explain the system a little further before I come to that ?

7755. Certainly. Take your own course ?—In connection with the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society, in the period which I have referred to—that is, previous to the Workmen's Compensation Act coming into force—I may say that the composition of the society, so far as the board of management was concerned, was that the honorary members numbered ten as against twelve from the ranks of the ordinary members. The colliery company's representatives came under the heading of honorary members. Any person could be an honorary member, whether he was in the mine or not, by paying a guinea a year. Those contributors had ten members on the board of management—that is the general board. The ordinary members, that is those who paid workmen's contributions, had twelve members. But in 1881, and during the whole of the period down to 1898, although the workmen contributed, as you have seen from the figures I have given you, very much more than the colliery proprietors or the honorary members, yet amongst the ordinary members on the Board of Management there were several colliery officials. My point is this, that the system was in vogue for the period I have mentioned, and now, singular to say, although the workmen's contributions, according to the 1905 report, amounted to something about £49,000, while the employers or honorary members contributed only £62—not £62,000, but £62—yet the composition of the board of management is the same to-day as it has been all over the period of which I have given you the history.

7756. What is the number on the board of management ?—Ten honorary members and twelve ordinary members.

7757. So that they have 46 per cent. of the management and only contribute an infinitesimal percentage of the funds ?—That is so. But we can go further. I think it is essential that you should know this because it may lead up to something else later on. At the colliery itself you have a local committee composed of six members and a president and secretary. In those cases I should say, from practical experience of them, that in 95 per cent. of the collieries those committees are composed of a least four colliery officials and two workmen. That was the case from 1881 down to the time of the Workmen's Compensation Act coming into force, and it is the same to-day, and it has been a puzzle why this system of control should continue considering that they have dropped off in a sense in contributing to the society. The only feasible explanation that can be put forward by anybody who knows what workmen are is the fact that we are now under the Workmen's Compensation Act and it is all important to the employers that they should have control of the workmen with regard to the number of the weeks they are on the fund. It is essential, speaking from the employer's point of view, that they should be able to get hold of the first information and should be able to continue it all along the line. Now, I will give you the system with regard to an accident so that you will understand it. A man meets with an accident in the mine. His first duty is to report it to the fireman. When he gets to the top of the pit there is generally a man in charge who gives out either tallies or lamps ; anyhow, he is a responsible official of the colliery, and to him, in the majority of instances, you have to immediately report your accident. He is the person who gives you a note to go to the medical man. In a large number of instances the medical man occupies a dual position ; he occupies the position of medical officer to the society to which the men contribute the money, and he occupies the position practically of referee to the colliery for the Workmen's Compensation Act. After the man who has met with a accident has gone to the doctor, the employers constantly get reports from the colliery as to how he is progressing. They have in the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society what is known as a medical board, which is composed of three medical men, two medical men who are outsiders, and the doctor on the spot. Speaking now for Wigan and the surrounding district, the chief medical man of that part is the man who has the largest number of collieries under his control as medical referee for the colliery owners. He along with another outsider, and the medical man on the spot, have to decide. Suppose a man was in the union, and there was a dispute about the continuance of his compensation on the ground of his fitness for doing his work, or for doing light employment, one would naturally think that the miners' agent to whom the workmen look to see after their compensation for them, would have the first information from the source that the men pay to, namely, the permanent relief society. But it is not so. The information is got constantly by the employers, and when the miners' agent comes along he knows nothing whatever of the examination which has taken place, and in a sense, he is on his beam ends, and the information is all in the possession of the employers.

7758. Of course that is very interesting from the general point of view, but our duty here is confined to what has been remitted to us, namely, fines and deductions from wages. We cannot examine the conditions of your trade union. But I will put this to you : Is the system which you have just described practically one of compulsory deduction from wages for membership of that society ?—Yes ; either directly or indirectly it is compulsory.

7759. Is it directly compulsory ?—Chiefly so.

7760. A man in going to a colliery is refused employment because he does not belong to the sick society ?—Generally so.

7761. Do you approve or disapprove of that ?—I disapprove of it, certainly.

7762. That of course would be direct compulsion ?—Yes.

7763. I gather from your statement that the indirect compulsion is in this way : to begin with, there is a certain influence brought to bear to make a man join like the rest of them ?—Yes.

7764. The next point is that, having joined, he finds himself in a position of inferiority so far as information goes ?—Yes.

7765. I do not see how that should induce him to join. I should have thought it would rather induce him not to join ?—I will give you the situation, so that you will understand it from a practical point of vew. A man goes to a colliery to get work. He may probably have been out of work for a great number of weeks ; he may have been in some dispute, and he is cornered, as the saying is. He knows the conditions of employment that he has to accept, and he signs the conditions willingly in a sense, because he knows if he does not there is no employment. After working there for some time, and he is on his feet, and thinks he is in a safe position, he tells the underlooker, " I want no more deductions from my wages for the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society." The reply is, " Well, you are the odd man." " It does not matter whether I am the odd man or not, I do not want any deduction to be made." The result is this : when he draws his wages the deduction is made. He goes in to the office for the money, and in a good number of instances the money is returned. The week following, when he draws his wages, the deduction is made again. He goes into the office again and gets it back. That may go on for a dozen times, until the man is heartily sick and lets them make the deduction. The difficulty is to get men to go into the colliery office and face the colliery officials.

7766. That is what you referred to as indirect compulsion ?—Yes.

7767. Since the 1897 Act is there so much necessity for the sick and benefit clubs ?—No. As a matter of fact, since the Act you may take the general average of the compensation which is paid as from 12s. to 15s. a week. That is more than they used to get from their permanent relief society.

7768. And now that contracting out has been forbidden, really those sick and benefit funds are in addition to what the law compulsorily gives them ?—Yes, certainly.

7769. So that the same reason does not exist now, even from the employers' point of view ?—Only on the lines which I have put forward, namely, for the supervision of the men when they are receiving compensation, which, to the employers, is all important, but which the workmen ought not under any circumstances to pay for.

7770. In view of your evidence, I am inclined to ask you this, broadly assuming that those benefits are desired by the working people and can only be achieved through those societies, could those societies thrive under a voluntary system as well as under the existing system ?—Certainly.

7771. Will you give us your experience upon that subject ?—I am the Secretary of the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society, which, as I think I pointed out at the onset, is a voluntary society. Take off the pressure from the employers, and there is not the slightest doubt but what that society could go on quite as well as the Lancashire and Cheshire Society has done. As a matter of fact, during the whole period from 1881 down to the Workmen's Compensation Act coming into force, that society was in an insolvent condition. It cannot be worse than that. It was insolvent during the whole period of its existence and is insolvent to-day. I do not say that the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society is solvent, you understand, but we can carry on quite as well without the pressure as we can with. It would be more to the interest of the workmen if the pressure from the employers were removed.

18 Dec. 1906.

By Mr. Walsh.

7772. You have spoken of direct and indirect compulsion : you stated that direct compulsion took the form of conditions of employment at the collieries ?—Yes.

7773. You also mentioned the case of a man who might have it in his mind a few weeks later to free himself from that compulsion and to cease contributing to the society ?—Yes.

7774. Do you often find that the money is returned ?—No, it is not general at all. It is in a few isolated cases.

7775. The official to whom he would have to apply for the money to be returned would be the under-manager of the mine ?—The man who took him on.

7776. The same man who practically superintends every action of his in the mine ?—Yes.

7777. And who, so to speak, keeps a regular survey over him from day to day and from week to week ?—Yes.

7778. Now what do you think would be the effect upon that official's mind of a man's constant application for the return of his contribution ?—If there were such a thing as being able to get rid of the man he would do it ; and it is done, commonly enough.

7779. Do you know of any cases where that is done ?—The difficulty is to say directly that that is so. Indirectly, of course, it is done. There are so many ways of doing it.

7780. Have people constantly complained to you of these moneys being stopped and not refunded ?—Constantly. In fact, I may go a little bit further and say that at several collieries we have had special notices printed, a small slip of paper for the men to sign to say they want no more deductions from their wages, and although those notices have been sent in, signed by the workmen themselves, in a very short period the same deduction has been made from those particular men.

7781. Have complaints been made to you by the men that inasmuch as the money has not been returned after repeated applications they have been a little afraid to make further applications ?—Plenty.

7782. Why ? Because they were afraid of the officials ?—Because they were afraid of being taken advantage of and dismissed from their employment.

7783. You spoke of indirect compulsion : of course there is indirect compulsion in that case ?—Yes.

7784. Do you know of any cases where the men pay the money themselves to this society where it is not deducted ?—Yes, in connection with L 4, which is a very large firm in Lancashire ; they have a system of not deducting it in the colliery office at all, but it is collected on the colliery premises. They have an office close to the colliery itself ; it may be ten or a dozen yards away, or even less that that, where, generally, there is the underlooker or the head fireman, who takes these contributions from the workmen. They are bound to pass that particular point. There is no getting out of it. They fix it so that they are bound to pass it. So that in that instance, although there is not the same deduction, there is the same pressure from the employers, indirectly.

7785. That is to say, the head fireman, who, of course, is one of the leading officials in the mine, or the under-manager, still retains a list of the names of people contributing to the society ?—Yes, and I may give an illustration which may be worth something on that point. A few months ago we had under the consideration of the board of management of the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society this question, in connection with one of the large collieries of this particular firm, of the pressure that was being brought to bear by the employers, or the colliery officials (which is as broad as it is long to us), to make them join the Lancashire and Cheshire Society. We appointed a deputation, of whom I was one, along with the miners' agent and several of the workmen in connection with the place. We met the manager, and he said there was no compulsion at all. But he said, "I will put it to you in this way : supposing there was not much work knocking about, that we were not busy, and a man came along whom I knew, and out of pure sympathy I took that man on, if I found that he would not do what I wanted him to do, well, you may naturally come to a conclusion as to what would take place." I said, "That would not be compulsion at all, would it ?" He said, "You can put your own construction on it." That is generally the case all over Lancashire.

7786. I gather from you that you are of opinion that the Workmen's Compensation Act has largely supplanted the necessity for the employers' contributions ?—Oh yes, certainly.

7787. That is to say, in lieu of their liabilities under the Employers' Liability Act, they paid varying amounts to this relief society ?—Yes.

7788. But in 1898, when the Workmen's Compensation Act came into force, they really had to come under a very much greater obligation ?—That is so.

7789. And, as I understand, they ceased to pay to this society altogether ?—That is so. I think I may hand in these reports of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society for the years ending 1898 and 1905. They may be interesting. They show what the contributions of the workmen are, and also the percentages paid by the employers at the times I have stated. In 1898, which is practically within the period which is under review, it shows the employers' percentage totted up to £11,829 7s. 4d. Then in 1905, it shows the honorary members' subscriptions only tot up to £62 3s. I submit that these reports speak for themselves. (The Reports were handed to the Chairman.)

7790. Inasmuch as the employers had, and have, a much larger obligation, and one which they of course are fulfilling, namely, payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, they felt themselves entirely relieved of the necessity of paying further contributions to the permanent relief society ?—Yes, and I understand that they told the Board of Management of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society that in effect at the time.

7791. Since then they have ceased their contributions ?—Yes. The figures which I have put in show that.

7792. What object could they have in still retaining membership in the society, even if it is only an honorary membership ?—The only object that anybody can see is in order to have control of the management for the purpose of looking after their compensation and seeing it is so much less than it otherwise would be.

7793. You put it that inasmuch as the officials in the mines are the people to whom accidents must be reported, therefore, by controlling the machinery of the permanent relief society they can more effectively control the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Act ; is that it ?—Yes.

7794. And you put it that that is really why they still insist, directly or indirectly, upon payments being made to the permanent relief society ?—Yes, and I believe no other reason can be put forward.

7795. You have made a statement as to the continued insolvency of that society ; are you aware of any complaints that the workpeople have made as to this society being insolvent and yet they are compelled to contribute to it ?—No, and it is scarcely possible for that to arise, because, as a matter of fact, the whole of the local meetings in connection with that society are held on the colliery premises, and the large firms, of which there is a good number in Lancashire, have a pretty good number of colliery officials, who always feel it a duty, in a sense, to their employers, to turn up at those particular meetings. Very few of the workmen take advantage of attending the meetings at all, and those that do are naturally afraid of asking anything. But what I have stated with regard to its insolvency is a fact. I have here a Report issued to the members themselves for the year ending 1896, when there was an alteration of their contributions and also of the payment. It says : "Mr. Nelson further points out that there is a deficiency every year of £2,358 in respect of every 10,000 members, which means that on a membership of 45,000 the society is going wrong to the amount of £10,611 every year. In addition to this, provision has to be made for the expenses of management, formerly paid out of the contributions of colliery proprietors, which ceased when the Compensation Act came into operation." The previous paragraph says : "In this connection it is important to remember that the widows and children have never had more than was originally set aside for them; and it was in their interests that the society was founded, for it seemed cruel that while the dependents of men killed in great disasters should be provided for, those who lost their bread winners one by one should be left penniless. But it was never contemplated that the Fund should be absorbed by aged and infirm men, and this is what is taking place. The sum required for the widows and children on June 30th, 1899, was £110,700, and as the funds in hand were £110,800, it is clear that the disabled members must be independently provided for, or they will speedily use up the money belonging to the dependents left by the men who have lost their lives by accident." That gives you an idea of what the insolvency was. In fact, they state that the insolvency at that time was over £54,000, and they do not even put their disabled members in at all. They do not count them as liabilities. But anybody can see that they are.

7796. A previous witness, representing a society very similar in principle to your own, said that if the work of the society was left to voluntary payments, the cost of collection would be so great that it would be impossible to continue the society: is that your experience ?—Certainly not.

7797. Your own society depends entirely upon voluntary contributions ?—Yes.

7798. Upon payments made by the men themselves ?—Yes. There is no compulsion at all. There cannot possibly be.

7799. There is no compulsion of any kind ?—No.

7800. A gentleman who gave evidence recently stated that the cost of collection in their own case can be put at about 16d. in the £; that is, apart from other clerical expenses; he said the cost of collection alone was nearly 7 per cent. Can you tell the Committee what your own cost of collection and administration is ?—We do it in this way. We put the cost of collection and the salary of the local secretary and treasurer all together, and we pay them on scale. Ours works out roughly at about 8 per cent. all round.

7801. That is the cost of collection plus the treasurership and secretaryship: putting all together it works out at an average of 8 per cent. ?—Yes.

7802. Have you those figures to put in ?—I do not think I can put them in to-day. I can forward the scale of commission. But if I put in one of the balance sheets it would prove that, and I can put in one.

7803. The witness to whom I have alluded said that a number of representatives of the various permanent relief societies had met in May last and had declared unanimously against any alteration of the Truck Act so far as deductions from wages for these relief societies are concerned: was your society included in that ?—Certainly not. As a matter of fact, in the whole period of our existence we have never once been invited to any of their meetings. I am aware that a meeting was held in Wigan on May 27th 1906, but I only got that from the newspaper after the meeting was over. It was in consequence of seeing that in the newspaper that I submitted the report which appeared in the Press to our board and they at once passed a resolution contrary to that to which you have referred and appointed me and the president, if required, to come before this Committee and give evidence. We had never had a notice of the meeting before.

7804. Your society commenced in July 1898 ?—That is so.

7805. So that now you are about eight and a half years old ?—Yes.

7806. How many members did you commence with ?—We commenced at the very first onset with about 6,600 in the first six months.

7807. Your fortunes have been very fluctuating ?—Yes. We went up to about 12,000 in the first eighteen months, and at one time we had over 17,000 members.

7808. It is quite correct to say that you have been in existence eight and a half years upon a system of entirely voluntary contribution ?—That is so.

7809. And that your cost of open collection has at an rate been such that you have continued to live ?—Yes. As a matter of fact, I think it would be advisable if I give you the position of our society. I have the figures here.

By the Chairman.

7810. Will you give as an illustration—the latest available ?—We have about 13,500 members. We have paid to disabled members £63,000; to widows and children over £8,000; and in death claims, over £900. We have now a balance of £7,500.

By Mr. Walsh.

7811. You had a quinquennial valuation a couple of years ago ?—Yes, which I can hand in.

7812. You have gone through those figures ?—Yes, many a time.

7813. Does that show any greater insolvency per 10,000 members ?—Practically about the same as the other up to the time the Workmen's Compensation Act came into force.

7814. About the same as the other, although that has a system of deduction from wages, while yours is a system of voluntary contributions ?—That is so. This is the first valuation. (Document handed in.)

7815. So far as the statement which you make is concerned, that the object of your society is the relief of distress caused by mining accidents, the statement made by a previous witness does not refer to your society ?—No. I think I might hand in a copy of the rules of our society. (Document handed in.)

7816. Are you entirely opposed to deductions from wages for relief societies ?—Certainly; and I think if the workmen were left alone, without pressure from the employers, they would not submit to deductions.

By Mr. Maddison.

7817. The Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society is conducted on entirely voluntary lines ?—It is.

7818. And the Lancashire and Cheshire is on compulsory lines ?—Practically so.

7819. I am interested to know whether you come into conflict there; do they insist upon your men joining the Lancashire and Cheshire Relief Society, if they belong to the Wigan and District Society ?—Practically nearly all the collieries in Lancashire force our men to belong to the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society.

7820. If the men were in your society would they force them to belong to the Lancashire and Cheshire ?—Yes, they would.

7821. They insist upon them joining the Lancashire and Cheshire whether they are in your society or not ?—Yes.

7822. Therefore a man who might prefer, and who obviously did prefer, to join your society, conducted on voluntary lines, would be compelled to pay another contribution to a society to which he did not wish to belong ?—That is so.

7823. I think you have given in evidence that in your opinion there is not the same need for these relief societies as there as before the Act of 1897 ?—That is so.

7825. You do think these relief societies, if on a voluntary basis, have some value from that point of view ?—Yes.

7826. Sufficient value to justify their existence ?—Yes.

7827. Supposing you could ensure the perfect non-compulsory character of these relief societies, would you object to the subscriptions being paid through the colliery office, purely as a matter of arrangement ?—The men would object to the money being paid through the colliery office under any circumstances whatever, because you could not free their minds from the idea of officialism in connection with it.

7828. You are aware from your wide experience that in Durham and Northumberland the men do not take that view ?—That is so.

Mr. E. Walkden.

18 Dec. 1906.

7829. Would you think there would be any hope of getting the men in Lancashire into the frame of mind of the men of Durham and Northumberland ?—It puzzles me as to why there should be a different view on the part of the men in Durham and Northumberland from what we have in Lancashire upon this particular question.

7830. And you think from the experience of your own society that there is not this great saving in the cost of collection which we have been told there is, as probably you know ?—There is not at all. There may be another point, with regard to our efforts to bring these two societies together. Some years ago the board of management of the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society recognised that it was not necessary to have the two societies. A deputation was appointed to meet the board of management of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society, with a view to the workmen themselves taking over the management of the Permanent Relief Society in its entirety. But, unfortunately, we met with a rebuff. They refused to meet us. Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis, who, as is pretty widely known, holds the position of secretary to the Coal Owners' Association, and who is also the law officer, the man who gives advice and deals with all the cases in connection with the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society, asked us, "What are you prepared to offer us in order that this shall be done ?" He was speaking on behalf of the employers, of course. We could not offer the employers anything.

7831. What are the respective payments to the Lancashire and Cheshire Society and to your society per week ?—As far as the contributions are concerned, they are alike.

7832. And the benefits also ?—No. Speaking from memory—but I think my memory is good enough—the payment from the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Society for the first two weeks is 10s. a week; from the Lancashire and Cheshire, since that adverse valuation, it has only been 9s. a week. That is so far as weekly payments are concerned. They go further. If a man unfortunately meets with an accident when he is fifty-six, say, and he is on their funds until he is sixty-one (it is rather unfortunate that we get old, even in connection with this society) according to the altered rule which they are now working under, the payment to him would drop down to 5s. a week. We continue the 7s. a week all through.

7833. Yours is generally better ?—So far as the payment to disabled members is concerned, yes.

7834. Not as to death ?—The death claim in both instances is £5. There is a difference so far as widows are concerned. We pay widows 2s. 6d. a week, that is providing they get compensation. If they do not get compensation—we have four or five of such on our funds now who have not obtained compensation on account of "serious and wilful misconduct" or some other cause—then, instead of 2s. 6d., we pay them 5s. a week. So far as the children are concerned, the Lancashire and Cheshire Society pay 2s. per week per child, and we pay 2s. 6d.

7835. You are generally better ?—Generally speaking, I should say we should be better all through.

By Mr. Delevingne.

7836. You said the employers had an interest in continuing their hold on these funds in order that they might keep a check, as it were, on the duration of an injured man's disablement ?—That is so.

7837. Do I understand that your society and the Lancashire and Cheshire Relief Society pay compensation after the first two weeks ?—Neither of the societies pay compensation. What we do is to continue payments. Say a man gets hurt and is laid up for two weeks, for those two weeks he receives 10s. a week. If he is laid up longer, he would receive from our society 7s. a week for every week after the first two weeks, so long as he remained unable to follow some employment.

7838. So that an injured man is drawing compensation from the employer and benefit from the relief funds ?—Yes. We have men in our society now who got hurt in the first month after the Act came into force, and they are still on our funds, and probably will be as long as they live. They are permanently disabled.

7839. Is it the same with the Lancashire and Cheshire Society ?—Yes, with the exception of the alteration of the weekly amount given at age sixty when a man has been on five years.

7840. Is it to the employers' interest that their men should be drawing benefit from two different sources ?—I do not think so.

7841. I mean, if a man is drawing benefit from two different sources, the two benefits together may nearly equal the amount of the wages ?—I know of plenty of instances myself where the compensation and the amount from the permanent relief society, and amounts from an odd sick club or two, tot up to considerably more than what the man's wages were. It would not be to the advantage of the employers.

7842. Are the employers in Lancashire generally insured either with an insurance company or with a mutual indemnity society under the Workmen's Compensation Act ?—For compensation, yes.

7843. They are insured ?—Yes. There is what is known as the Northern Indemnity, which covers the collieries surrounding Wigan, and some portions of Leigh. Then there is the south-west Lancashire which covers St. Helen's and Prescott and Haydock, and a number of collieries in Leigh. Those are practically insurance companies got up by the employers themselves. A number of colliery proprietors have clubbed together and formed an indemnity society. Then there is the Law Accident itself, which is a general insurance company, and which, as everybody knows, insures a number of small collieries. I do not know that they have any big ones.

7844. An individual employer, being insured, has hardly the same interest in keeping watch over the disablement cases ?—It makes him take greater interest in the cases where they are in the Northern Indemnity or the South-west Lancashire, because they are looking after their own business. I do not say there is the same interest where they are insured in the Law Accident.

7845. How is the collection made in your society ? Do you appoint collectors and pay them a commission on the amount they collect ?—Yes. We have two collectors appointed at each colliery to do the collecting. I may say, in order to give you an insight as to the position, that in one instance, when our society had been going some months, the police were requisitioned in order to force our men off the premises of a certain colliery altogether, and we have to-day, in connection with that colliery, which belongs to a large firm in Lancashire, to employ insurance agents to collect the money on the colliery premises.

7846. Your collection is done on the colliery premises: it is not a house to house collection ?—No; it is generally on the colliery premises.

7847. Who elect those local committees in connection with the Lancashire and Cheshire Society ?—It is supposed to be the men, but when their annual meeting is held those present consist chiefly of colliery officials. That is when the local committees are appointed. There may be an odd workman or two, but only one or two, who dare go to attend at the meeting when they appoint the committees.

7848. Nominally, every contributor has a right to attend and to vote ?—Yes, if they would attend; but you see the tendency. I may go further. Quite recently, in connection with the same firm where I mentioned the colliery called in the police some years ago, during the last twelve months the men appointed, on their own initiative, their own medical man the medical man that they would like—as the sole man to attend their members. Immediately after, certain men in connection with the firm got together—I honestly believe they were led by the employers—and another medical man was appointed. I want you to understand that the medical man who was appointed is the same man who is appointed for the sick club in connection with the same society, in which the employers themselves have the sole right of appointing the doctor.

7849. Who elect the ten representatives of the honorary members on the board of management of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society ?—Those members are elected at a delegate meeting. They are called agencies at the colliery. Each agency appoints a representative, and he attends the annual meeting. That meeting has been held in the mining school, and now it is held in the Technical School, at Wigan. About 90 per cent. of those who appoint the representatives of the honorary members are colliery officials. As a fact, they appoint both the honorary and the ordinary members of the board of management.

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY TWIST, called; and Examined.

Mr. H. Twist.
19 Dec. 1906.

By the Chairman.

7850. I understand you are agent to the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Federation ?—Yes.

7851. How long have you occupied that position ?—About ten months.

7852. Did you know the federation in its working before that time ?—Yes, for nearly twenty years.

7853. Were you yourself a miner ?—I worked in the mine for twenty years.

7854. What is the membership of the federation ?—About 40,000.

7855. You know, of course, that this Committee is enquiring into the question of fines and deductions from wages ?—Yes, I understand that.

7856. Please state to us the points you wish to put before the Committee. You are, of course, aware of the Statute of 1896 ?—Yes.

7857. And of the necessity under that Statute of there being either a posting up of lists of fines and deductions or a special written contract with the workmen concerning them ?—Yes, we understand that that ought to be complied with.

7858. Is there a system of that kind in operation amongst the members of your federation ?—No, so far as I know the requirement is absolutely unobserved.

7859. Do you mean that there is no such list posted up at the pit head or elsewhere ?—There is no pit that I know of which puts up such a list stating what are the offences and what are the amounts which men will be fined if found guilty of committing these offences.

7860. Then is there any such thing as a private contract with the men on this subject ?—I know of no condition of employment of that kind or any contract with the men upon signing on which sets forth either the nature of the offences or the amounts the miners will be fined if they commit these offences.

7861. Where fines are imposed or deductions exacted from the wages is that set forth on the men's pay ticket ?—Sometimes the offences will be described on the pay ticket and at other times they are not.

7862. Can you give us any samples of such tickets ?—I produce one (ticket produced) which does not describe the offence, but states the amount of the fine.

7863. I observe that there are certain small deductions noted such as 1d. for the infirmary, 2d. for the sick fund, and 4d. for the Permanent Relief Society ?—Yes.

7864. These together only amount to 7d., and the net wages are apparently £1 7s. 5d., but then there is this note "Less fine 10s." reducing the amount to be paid to 17s. 5d. ?—That is so.

7865. Can you tell us the date of this transaction ?—It is dated 2nd January, 1905.

7866. Do you know the workman in question ?—Yes.

7867. Can you explain the circumstances under which that exaction of 10s. was made ?—Yes. I had the duty of interviewing the employers upon this man's behalf in order to see why this amount was being deducted from his wages and to inquire into the nature of the offence. It was the case of a brakesman who had a leg accidentally taken off and he was put into the lamp room to perform light labour. He was not acquainted with the nature of that work and only received very brief instructions before being left to it. A lamp went out owing to the gauze containing two or three broken wires. The foreman examined the lamp, found this defect, and the man had to submit to that fine for the offence.

7868.—Did you bring that circumstance under the notice of the inspector ?—No, that was not done.

7869. Why not ?—The man wished the matter to drop, as he was afraid that advantage would be taken of him.

7870. Does the case you have mentioned stand alone or is it a sample case ?—I only quoted it to give the Committee an idea of what is done.

7871. Does it represent a practice ?—Yes, it is the practice at a good many collieries that I am acquainted with.

7872. Where ?—In Lancashire.

7873. Can you give the Committee any reason why that practice, which appears on the first blush to be so contrary to the law, has not been reported to His Majesty's inspector ?—I cannot give any other explanation than that when the suggestion of reporting to the inspector is made to the men they hold up their hands in most cases and beg that that shall not be done, believing that they would receive dismissal in one way or another sooner or later

7874. I gather from you that this 10s. fine was a case of a single offence of the nature of what might be considered neglect ?—A little lack of supervision and in that case perhaps some lack of knowledge.

7875. I assume it would be placed under the heading of neglect or something like that ?—Yes.

7876. You have told us that there is no written contract with the men as to fines and deductions nor any posting up of lists and that this document which you have shown us is a sample of the pay tickets. Notwithstanding the absence of posting up or of contract, I would now like to get from you other samples of fines that prevail in the pit—the nature of the offences and the amount of the fines ?—The nature of the offences varies a great deal.

7877. Just give us as careful evidence as you can in enumerating them, taking the fines to begin with ?—To begin with, in some collieries (although this does not prevail universally) a man is supposed when he goes to his work in the morning after he has obtained his lamp and got down the mine to indicate that he has gone to the far end of the working by hanging up a tally with a number to it. If he goes to his working place and omits to hang up the tally bearing a number registered to him he will in almost every case be fined 6d. or 1s. or even 2s. 6d. and by at least one firm 5s.

7878. Is there any danger attached to such an omission owing to the fact that the overlookers do not know who are working in particular parts of the pit ?—There is absolutely no danger that I know of.

7879. I suppose that offence would come under the category of discipline ?—I cannot characterise it as being for any other purpose than simply as a record of who are at work and who are not.

Mr. H. Twist.

7880. I suppose these men work on piece under the ganger system?—Yes, mostly.

7881. And now you may give us another example?—The same fine would be repeated if the man should omit to take the tally off when he leaves at night. Another case is that of a man coming a few moments late. The men are usually instructed to get their lamps not later than 10 minutes to six o'clock. If a man comes a few minutes late he may be subject to being sent home again, and if being late he by any means should secure a lamp and go down a pit he will be subject to a fine. We have had cases where youths have seen men coming away from the collieries where they have been working on the night shift and rather than go home and lose a day's work these youths have sometimes borrowed a lamp and gone down into the mine. The boy or man would be fined for that offence a 1s. or in some cases 2s. 6d. The latter is the highest fine I have known for that offence.

7882. Are there any other offences you wish to mention?—The colliers usually wear belts, and if a man hangs his lamp about his person on the belt he may be fined 1s. or other amounts up to 5s.

7883. Perhaps that might be characterised as accompanied by some danger?—In the case of drawers it is stipulated that they must have their lamps round their neck or on their arm, and I should think there is no more danger in a man hanging the lamp upon the belt that encircles the middle of his body.

7884. It is not the business of this Committee to enquire which is the better method. We have nothing to do with that; but I suppose it would be suggested by employers that some danger accompanied the offence in question?—They would suggest that.

7885. Then take another case?—I may quote the case of a man who plays a day and stops off work. In many instances he will be fined 1s. or 2s. 6d., or in some instances even 5s. for that. We have had cases of men who could show an unbroken record for the whole of a year who were fined 5s. for playing a day, and I know of one who was dismissed rather than subject himself to that penalty. Either fines or suspensions are rather common for playing a day. A man when he comes may be told to take another day or to stay at home for a week, just as the manager may feel disposed to order.

7886. Any other point?—There is the case of drawers in the mine using an iron bow to clutch on to the top of the box so that their fingers may get below the box top. Here the employers urge that there is great danger, but where the section of the mine itself is from 6 to 8 feet high, the use of bows is often insisted upon when from the miners' point of view there is no necessity for it.

7887. What is the amount of fine inflicted on such a case?—One shilling for each offence.

7888. Any other case?—If a miner sends a small quantity of dirt in a box of coals he will be fined. If in a 10-cwt. box there is 30 lb. of dirt, a fine of 2s. 6d. is quite common, and there is even a fine of 5s. in some cases, but in many cases the fine is only 6d. or 1s. I might also mention the case of men who draw timber from the mine. That occupation is dangerous, and men may occasionally leave a prop or support which, according to the best of their experience or judgment, they think it unwise to take out. Then if an official comes round and sees this prop left, the men will be fined for leaving it, although it may be an old and broken prop. The miner may be fined 1s. or 2s. 6d., or even as much as 5s.

7889. I presume the withdrawal of timber is from the disused portion of the mine?—Yes.

7890. I suppose the category under which the leaving of props would come would be that of impeding the proper administration of the mine by permitting the sinkage of the seam?—No doubt that would be argued.

7891. Is there any other case?—Yes, if a miner, in bringing a tub from his working place into a shunt, should neglect when going through a cloth to whistle or shout, he would be fined 2s. 6d. I have known this to be neglected where there are only two or three men working on a road, and where there was absolutely no danger, there being nobody in the way.

7892. I suppose that would be considered an undisciplined and possibly dangerous practice?—Yes.

7893. Without asking you to go into many further details of the same kind, may I assume that you have by no means exhausted the list of the offences?—Quite so; there is a great variety.

7894. Can you give the Committee any explanation why that system that ramifies in the way you have described should not have been brought under the notice of His Majesty's Inspector?—I cannot give any explanation other than that I have already given.

7895. The fear of dismissal which you have already described?—Yes.

7896. Do you know many cases where the workman's wages have been impinged upon to a serious extent like the one you first quoted where there was a fine of 10s.?—Yes, I have known cases where £1 has been taken in fine.

7897. For a variety of offences or for one offence?—Practically for one.

7898. What was that?—The sending of a little small coal in a round coal box, or a little small coal in a box of cannel, or a little dirt in a box of coal.

7899. Do you know any collieries which have no fines?—I only know one, where an arrangement to do without fines was fixed up between our officials and the manager some little time ago.

7900. How long ago?—Perhaps about twelve months since.

7901. Are you free to name the colliery?—Yes, it is B. 11.

7902. With regard to the system of having no fines, how does it work?—So far as I know it is working all right.

7903. What is the opinion of the men you represent with regard to fines?—They very much resent them.

7904. Would they favour their abolition by law?—I am quite sure they would.

7905. We must put to you the alternatives that have been submitted to us. The natural alternative would be this, probably more supervision would be required. I suppose you agree to that?—Yes.

7906. Then there would be a system of warning given followed by dismissals for a period if comparatively trivial offences were repeated, or by total dismissal on a repetition of bad cases?—Yes, I quite follow that.

7907. Now as between a system of that kind and the present system of fines, what is the opinion of those whom you represent?—Their opinion is that dismissal after warnings, or, in the case of a bad breach of the rule, prosecution, would be preferable. That would have a more salutary effect, and would be acceptable rather than a great variety of fines which are often excessive in amount.

7908. Suppose that Parliament were to adopt that system, do you think there would be no feeling of hardship on the part of the men but rather a feeling of relief?—Yes, a feeling of relief.

7909. Of course you admit the seriousness of the position that a man would then be confronted straight away with the risk of dismissal without any half-way house on payment of a fine. But I understand you think that on the whole discipline would be better maintained under such a system and less sense of injustice?—Yes, I believe so.

7910. Do you think that the alternative system of ultimate dismissal which we have been dealing with would increase the number of dismissals or would the very fear of dismissal have a salutary effect?—I am quite sure it would have such an effect.

7911. Substantially the men would be as sure of their employment, if they were well-doing men, as they are under the present system?—Yes, I look at it in this way. Take the case of a man who is doing exceedingly well and earning plenty of money. That man would take greater precautions against committing any offence if he knew that dismissal was the penalty, than if he knew that he could get off by the payment of a 1s. or even of a 2s. 6d. fine.

7912. Are wages paid fortnightly?—Weekly.

7913. Are they paid to a ganger who distributes the money amongst his gang?—In most cases there would be one man, a contractor, and a man working for him as a drawer—that is two men together, and a pay ticket to each two men.

7914. Take the case of an ordinary working miner come to manhood, a strong fellow and a regular worker, what would be his wages ?—On an average about 6s. a day.

7915. That would mean about 33s. for five and a half days' work ?—I scarcely think it would average that in our part of the country.

7916. Are there two days off in the week ?—In the summer time two days and in the winter one, namely Saturday.

7917. You mean by a day, a full day ?—Yes.

7918. Of course the money earned fluctuates according to the state of the market ?—Yes.

7919. We will now come to the question of deductions. I see there are deductions for materials supplied to the worker, viz., explosives, oil, lamp, etc. What have you to say with regard to that ?—We are often in negotiation with the employers upon these questions of stoppages from the men's wages for lamp, or oil, or explosives, or tallies, or other materials supplied to the workmen. In some cases where we had good reason to complain that the charges were excessive we have had them reduced. But in other cases we have not succeeded in that. Take, for instance, the cases of stoppages and deduction for sharpening of picks.

7920. That would come under the heading of services performed. Better deal with materials first ?—Well, as to the provision of powder, the usual price now charged is 1s., but there are places where as much as 1s. 8d. per lb. has been stopped for the same kind of explosives. In one case we succeeded in getting it reduced by 8d. in the lb. after an interview with the employer. The payment or deduction for tallies supplied is not a very important matter. For oil our men have to pay usually 6d. per week. In many places, however, we have succeeded in getting the employers to reduce that by nearly one-half, to 3d. or 4d.

7921. Do you think it would be possible to abolish the system altogether or do you not go so far as that ?—I think it would be better if the supply of the lamps were left in the hands of the manager and if the deductions for oil and for the use of the lamp conformed absolutely to the requirements of the Act.

7922. That would apply also to powder ?—Yes; I mean if the employer did not make a profit out of it.

7923. Is it your opinion that there must be a good many cases in which there is a certain fringe of profit left to the employers ?—Yes, I should say it is so in almost every case.

7924. Have you any suggestions as to that. Of course you are aware that under the statute it would be very difficult to establish that in a court of law on account of the apportionment of general items such as management, etc., to a particular small article ?—Yes.

7925. Have you any suggestion for a less circuitous method of dealing with this matter than the method of moving your organisation in the matter and interviewing employers ?—I think deductions for lamp and oil would be all right if any surplus accruing to the employers from the charges levied on the men was periodically distributed among the men.

7926. And similarly with explosives ?—Yes.

7927. What we are anxious to get at is this. Can you suggest any way of calling somebody's attention to it at once and getting their verdict on the spot as to whether there is an overcharge—say the inspector; might the inspector's opinion be taken on the subject ?—Yes, but there is one thing that I think ought to be made much easier, and that is access by the men to the books in order to ascertain whether their complaints are well grounded or not. We are often at a loss to know how much the employer is making in profit on an article. We feel pretty certain he is making a profit, and we can approximate the profit, but we have no exact data.

7928. Do you demand an audit ?—We have demanded an audit, but I must confess that that is pretty generally resented by employers as interference.

7929. Of course if you applied to the inspectors they would have access to the books ?—Yes.

7930. I am not suggesting any method to you, but we are anxious if possible to find some prompt and effective remedy for this system. Your evidence comes to this, substantially, that it may be quite unintentional, but in the result of the workmen are defrauded to a certain extent of what is their due by this overcharge ?—I am not quite sure that in many cases it is unintentional. When you bring to the knowledge of the employer that he is taking 50s. from the men's wages in respect of work for which he is only paying 17s. 3d. for the work to be done, you rather regard it as intentional. Mr. H. Twist. 19 Dec. 1906.

7931. Are you citing a case within your own experience ?—Yes.

7932. Intentional or unintentional the result is to deprive the men of their due. What we want to get at from a man of your experience is this: have you come to a conclusion as to what would be a better system ?—To cease taking deductions for the sharpening of tools, etc.

7933. I am coming to that, but in regard to material, what is wanted is some kind of effective check against overcharge: that is really what you are after ?—Yes.

7934. Then we come to the next head, "Service performed," such as sharpening or repairing of tools. Now that system, of course, is very general. Do you propose any alteration of that ?—I think that the men ought to be permitted to employ their own sharpeners. We have many cases at many collieries where the employers have agreed to that and it works very satisfactorily, the men paying the employer a rent for the smithy, say, and for the fuel supplied, and the men contributing to that fund voluntarily upon a scale arranged and fixed by themselves, any accumulated funds being their own property.

7935. And even although it was permissible to make a charge of this kind, you think it should always be optional to the men to have their own sharpeners ?—Yes, we cannot depart from that, that it would always be the best for the men to employ their own sharpeners.

7936. Now there comes the serious question of the deductions for the rent of houses. There, again, I gather that you admit that rent ought to be paid, but the question is whether they are not charged too much in the way of rent: is not that so ?—Perhaps I ought to answer that question in this way, that I think the employer, in the first place, like any other property owner, should collect the rents at the houses from the workmen. I think the system of deducting rent from their wages lends itself to imposition and hardship.

7937. So that you would take that out of the category of deductions altogether and say the employers must collect their rents ?—Yes.

7938. Now come to sick and accident societies. There are contributions in nearly all the collieries for those, are there not ?—Usually each colliery has a society of its own to which the men who work at that colliery pay. When they leave the colliery they are no longer members of it. There is a separate society for each particular firm or colliery existing as a sick and accident society

7939. Do you think that those contributions should not be by way of deductions, but that the organisation should be independent and the collection voluntary: is that what it comes to ?—The contributions ought to be taken voluntarily from the men.

7940. Are there any cases of direct compulsion, that is to say, that a man will not be employed unless he joins that sick society ?—The most striking case that I can note is one where, perhaps, one would not be warranted in saying that there is absolute compulsion, but we know of no man who does not pay, and we know that some men who have refused to pay have very soon lost their work.

7941. Do the masters contribute to those sick funds ?—In some cases they do and in others they do not.

Mr. H. Twist. 19 Dec. 1906.

what do you say to that system ?—That system is not at all agreeable. We find that very few men would pay to these sick societies at the colliery if there were not either direct or overt compulsion. I could give you, if it would not weary you and take up your time unnecessarily, the case of a society which was started immediately after the passing of the Compensation Act.

7943. Of 1897 ?—Of 1897. The whole of the men at the collieries as they were leaving their work and coming out of the pit were individually called into the colliery-office and asked to sign an agreement that they would pay to this society which was being formed. A petition was got up by those workpeople and signed very extensively, by at least 90 per cent., or more than 90 per cent, of the men employed, but the firm refused to accept that petition.

7944. What was the nature of the petition ?—Appealing to the company not to make any deduction on behalf of that society, and protesting against becoming members of it. The firm demanded an individual notice in writing from every man and boy about the place, the result being that a very large number caved in and allowed the deduction to be made. Others did not pay, and for a time there was turmoil and trouble, but now I should think there is scarcely one man out of 5,000 working about the place to-day who is not in.

7945. Of course the general object of having a sick fund is a good one ?—I do not think so in this case.

7946. It is a good thing to have a sick fund, is it not ?—There is ample provision for the men outside 7947. That is the point I am coming to. But you admit it is a beneficial object ?—Quite so.

7948. But so far as regards procuring that object, is it your opinion that voluntary arrangements independent of the employers would effect it ?—Yes, and much better.

7949. Is that the opinion of the membership of your association, speaking generally ?—Yes, it is.

7950. I gather that with the exception of these deductions for materials, services and rent, as to which you have given your evidence, everything in the nature of fines should be swept from the Statute Book in your opinion ?—That is so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

7951. You gave as an example a 10s. fine in respect of the three broken wires in connection with the lamp; could that have been a subject of prosecution ?—I do not think it could.

7952. What danger would be attached to the breakage of that number of wires ? Is it a matter of danger ?—Yes ; the gauze in the lamp should be perfect.

7953. Is it a considerable danger ?—Well, I should say in that case it was a very trivial danger, a very small danger indeed, if any at all.

7954. Not one contemplated under the special rules of the mine, you think ?—Yes, if the lamp, was damaged to a much greater extent than that 7955. It is because of the smallness of the damage that you think it would not have been within the jurisdiction of the special rules ?—I do not think it would have been within it.

7956. Have you any opinion upon the practice of housing workmen in employers' houses ? Do you dislike the practice, apart from the fact that you dislike deductions in respect of rent ?—I believe that it is not good for the people to live under the employers ; I believe that it takes away from their freedom and their independence a good deal.

7957. Could you give any examples of cases in which it has operated badly ?—Yes. At the present time under one firm, houses which have been bought by the colliery company, which previously belonged to private owners for which the workpeople were paying, say, 2s. 6d., 3s. and 3s. 9d. per week, have, within a short period from the time of the colliery company obtaining them, been raised to 3s. in the case where they had been 2s. 6d., and so on ; briefly put, 6d. and 1s. per week were added to the rents. When the people move from one house to another under this particular firm, through their family growing, or through preferring another house which becomes empty to that which they are in, they have to pay 10s. They are subject to a payment of 10s. for removing from one house to another, although it might be only next door.

7958. What advantage or service does the employer give in respect of that 10s. ?—I do not know any service he gives at all. A house becomes empty ; somebody has to go into it ; a particular tenant of his says, " I would like that house." " Very well, it is yours ; pay 10s. and go in."

7959. Is that charge of 10s. entered upon a pay ticket ?—Yes ; it is deducted from the wages.

7960. Is it entered under any heading ?—I have not been able to secure a ticket, though I know that the practice is general. I have not been able to secure a sample ticket.

7961. Do you know if the men have felt able to make any protest against that system ?—They might protest, but I am rather afraid that here also the idea is that some unpleasantness would follow, and they do not protest.

7962. Your association has not taken it up ?—No ; there has been no particular request asking us to protest against that. The grumbling is individual, very largely. The people walk about with their own burden and grumble and growl, and say it ought not to be so, but that is all.

7963. What would happen if a miner, finding a house too small, chose to go to a larger house, which was not owned by the colliery owner ?—If he went to live under a private property owner, he would have nothing to pay, but the rent when he had been in a week.

7964. And what would the colliery owner say ? Would any representation be made to the man upon the point of his having left a house in the ownership of his employer and gone to a house in private ownership ?—Under this particular company, it would be considered a very serious offence on the part of a man to do that.

7965. I suppose you would say he would be a marked man ?—I am quite sure he would, under this firm.

7966. Now generally, could you give an opinion as to what would happen if he did it elsewhere ? I am not dealing now with this firm, but with an ordinary firm ?—The management would resent it, particularly if that house stood empty.

7967. Have you any comment to make upon the state of repair of the houses which the miners usually rent from their employers ?—Yes ; they are not so well attended to ; they are not so often cleaned and renovated as the property of private owners.

7968. In the case of the 6d. and 1s. increase in rent on the houses being made by the colliery owner, have you any means of instituting a comparison between those houses and other houses ? Was there any corresponding increase in the rent of the property in the neighbourhood ?—Not equivalent. There might be 2d. increase where the employer charged 6d. extra. In some cases there would be none at all.

By Sir F. Cawley.

7969. With regard to this question of rents, are the houses higher rented than others in the neighbourhood ?—For the same class, yes.

7970. The collier could get a better house for the same money if he was a free agent ?—Yes, quite so.

7971. With regard to fines, of which you gave us a list of a great many, how much per week do you think the total average amount of fines is on a man's wages ?—Spread over what period.

7972. Over a week, or a month, if you like, or a year—say a year ?—A man might go a month and have no fine.

7973. Say a year ?—And he might have three or four fines in one month. So it would be difficult to approximate what the average would be.

7974. There are such a lot of fines that I want to know how much you think would be taken off a man's ordinary wages in a twelvemonth ?—I do not know that I could answer that question as to average.

7975. You must have an idea, approximately?—It is difficult to approximate. A man in one twelvemonth might be subjected to half a dozen fines, or a dozen or more ; another twelvemonth he might not have more than one or two, or perhaps none at all. So it is a difficult matter to give you any figure upon.

7976. Do you think that the fines deducted from an ordinary man's wages would amount to 10s. in the course of a year ?—In some cases they might, but in other cases I should say they would not.

7977. In the case of an ordinary careful workman they would not, I suppose ? It must be a careless workman, or a workman who is negligent in some way, where the fines will amount to even 5s., I presume ?—I should say in the case of an ordinary careful workman it would not exceed what you say.

7978. 5s. in the year ?—Well, perhaps it might exceed that.

7979. Therefore the percentage in the case of an ordinary workman who is neither very careless nor negligent, is almost infinitesimal compared with his total wages ?—I do not think it is infinitesimal.

7980. Perhaps it depends upon what we consider infinitesimal, but you do not think that an ordinary man, who is not very careless or very negligent, would have to pay very much more than 5s. per annum ?—No, I do not suppose he would.

7981. I suppose some might get off without paying anything—a careful man would never be fined ?—It is difficult to say, because a man might be as careful as he could possibly be, and yet be fined. For instance, take the case of a man who comes a little late, or the case of a man who has omitted to hang up his tally, or to take it down at night. A man might be as careful as he could be and yet make a little omission, and then there is 2s. 6d. or 5s. gone.

7982. I presume you do know men who practically are never fined ? There are plenty in every colliery who are never fined at all are there not ?—Yes ; there are men who are not subjected to many fines.

7983. Where do all these fines go to ?—I only know one colliery company where they go to any fund. In the other colliery companies, so far as I know, they go into the company's exchequer.

7984. They put them in their pockets ?—Yes ; they go into the company's exchequer.

7985. Has the question of fines and deductions ever been a subject of negotiation between your association and the employers ? Have you ever brought this question before them as a matter for consideration and negotiation ? —Are you speaking of the coalowners as a whole, or individually ?

7986. I will tell you exactly what I mean. You say your association feels a certain amount of resentment with regard to these fines. You, as an official, know of this great dissatisfaction in regard to the fines. Have you ever approached the Coal Owners' Association with the idea of getting any alleviation of them, or their total abolition ? Have you ever brought it before the masters, as an association, in any shape or form ?—Yes.

7987. And what was the result ?—So far as I know, the result was that it was considered unnecessary to hold a conference on that subject—that in the interests of discipline the thing was bound to go on.

7988. What I understand is that you have asked the masters to negotiate in this matter and that they have refused negotiation : is that so ?—I am speaking now from memory.

7989. Surely you are quite well up in this ? You know whether this has ever taken place ?—It is some years ago now, and therefore I cannot speak very definitely, but I believe—in fact, I could almost state it as a fact—that that is so.

7990. You cannot call any particular occasion to your mind when it was so ? You have an idea it was so but you have not any absolute knowledge of your own that such a thing ever took place in any particular case ?—In particular cases oftentimes.

7991. I am speaking of any particular occasion in which the men's federation have approached the masters' association ?—I would not like to swear to that, but I feel quite sure that it has been done.

7992. Do you not consider that fines act as a deterrent with regard to carelessness, and with regard to things being done which ought not to be done ?—There is no doubt they act as a slight deterrent.

7993. Do they act more as a deterrent, with some people who are apt to be careless, than a remonstrance from the employers would do ?—I do not think that the fining system has the effect which the employers think it has, or could desire. I really do not think that the system has a very great deterrent effect.

7994. But you admit that there are some people who are scarcely ever fined, and that is because they are neither careless nor negligent, and that it is really those exceptional cases where men are careless or negligent where fines prevail to any considerable extent ?—Well, we have many cases where the men resent these fines and where our association supports them, where we are absolutely certain that there has been no carelessness on the part of the men, and where they sacrifice work, and possibly many weeks' wages rather than be penalised for something that has not been done. We have a large number of those cases.

7995. When you get a flagrant case of this kind, do you ever approach the employers with a view of getting the money refunded ?—We always interview the employers in every case where a man has a grievance.

7996. And if it is unjust, does the employer give the amount back, or lessen the fine ?—Sometimes we succeed in getting the fine returned, but very seldom. The management set up their back and say, "Well, he can pay it, or he can get out of the road."

7997. With reference to the question as to the safety lamp, the wires of which were injured, I presume that such a fine was imposed because if it had been a little more serious it would have been a danger to the mine ? —Yes.

7998. An excessive fine of that sort is imposed as a deterrent, because the safety of the mine and of the men's lives depend on the faithful fulfilling of his duty by the man who has the charge of the lamp ?—Yes. But the harshness of it in this case was due to the fact that the man was new to the work ; he was much overworked, and had not time to examine these lamps. And at most places, a fireman, an experienced official of the mine, is provided, and here there was not one provided.

7999. I gather from you that in this particular case there were contributory matters which made it an extreme hardship ; but my point is this, that providing those circumstances which you mention did not exist, the great fine would be imposed because of the danger to the people working in the mine through any negligence on the part of the men who had charge of the lamps ? —Yes ; the amount of the fine, possibly.

8000. Suppose this man had been an ordinary man perfectly accustomed to the work and knowing all about it, and that with all that knowledge he still let that lamp go in an imperfect state, would you consider that a heavy fine was an injustice ?—I should have said if the man was guilty, either dismiss him or prosecute him, if it is a question of the breach of a special rule, but do not take anything from his wages.

8001. You are for the severest penalty. You admit that it would be very difficult, perhaps, for a man under those circumstances to get a situation again, and it would be very severe to dismiss him, but your point is that the severe penalty is preferable to the lighter one ? —Yes, in the interests of everybody—in the interests of the safety of the men working in the mine. In a case like that our association would refuse to support him.

By Mr. Walsh.

8002. You are aware that Mr. Greenall, the president of your association, has already given evidence before this Committee ?—Yes, I know he has been here.

8003. And that much of his evidence was largely upon the lines which you yourself proposed to lay before us ? —I am not quite sure about that.

8004. He has not seen you ?—No.

Mr. H. Twist.

19 Dec. 1906.

8005. You speak upon two points : the schedule of offences not being posted up, and there being a particular form of contract ?—Yes.

8006. Will you tell us about that contract. You say here, " The contract should be in writing signed by the workmen specifying the acts or omissions." What form does the contract take when it does exist ?—The workman is called into the office as he comes out at night, usually, or when he gets on the surface. A form is put before him stating that he is guilty of committing a certain offence, and he is asked to sign his name to it. There are the provisions of the Truck Act before him, and he signs it or refuses to sign it as the case may be.

8007. I understand that this is after the offence, alleged or actual ?—Yes. After the offence, alleged or actual, as you say, has been committed. First of all, the man is reported to the manager for having committed this offence, alleged or actual, and subsequently he is called upon by the manager to go into the colliery office and sign this form.

8008. That form is simply an ordinary paper, headed " Truck Act " ?—Yes.

8009. Have you seen the paper yourself ?—Yes, it is a form giving the provisions of the Truck Act, and then there is a space where the offence is described in writing, and then there is the signature of the man at the bottom.

8010. So that this is distinctly after the offence has been committed, or after it has been alleged to have been committed ?—I know of no case where there is a contract beforehand.

8011. You speak here of the freedom of bargaining, and you consider that there is no freedom of bargaining under such conditions ?—There can be little or no freedom at all on the part of the workman.

8012. Why ? Would something result to the workman ?—Usually a man knows that he must either sign or else he must get ready to go.

8013. He must either go out, taking his tools with him, or else pay the amount that is on the form of contract ?—Yes. I only know one case where a man refused to be fined and would not sign and ultimately nothing took place. In the majority of cases the man knows that sooner or later, often sooner, he has to go about his business.

8014. So that in that sense you say there is no real freedom of bargaining ?—There is absolutely no freedom of bargaining on the part of the workmen.

8015. Is it your opinion that that is really a contravention of the spirit of the Act of 1896 ?—In my opinion it is a contravention.

8016. Of even its legal requirements ?—Yes.

8017. You spoke of the carrying of the lamp ; the management in many cases insist upon the lamp being carried suspended below the throat on a strap ?—Yes.

8018. Are you aware of any general or special rule which is applicable to such a case as that, which states as to how or where the lamp shall be carried ?—I know of no general rule, nor of any special rule. Only in one case is it printed in the conditions of employment that the lamp shall not be carried on the belt.

8019. That is to say, it shall not be carried upon a belt round the waist ?—That is so.

8020. Are you aware of any danger that would arise from the lamp being carried round the waist ?—I know of no danger which the man is subjecting himself to, or anybody else, by carrying his lamp on his belt round the middle of his body any more than would result from carrying it upon any other part of his body.

8021. These lamps are not the old Davy lamps ?—No.

8022. They are the Muesler and the Marsaut ?—Yes.

8023. They are new lamps which have come into existence with the changed conditions of mining ?—Yes.

8024. And they are not so easy to put upon the floor or to hang upon the box as the old Davy used to be ?—No ; usually the hook is not so large.

8025. And the light is a good deal more fickle and capricious ; it goes out much more readily, does it not ?—Yes, very easily.

8026. And so the man carries it suspended from his belt because he wants to preserve the light as long as possible ?—Yes. If he put it near the box it would shake out immediately.

8027. The merest jolt would cause the light to go out ?—Yes.

8028. So that on the one hand he is in constant danger of losing the light, and on the other hand he is in danger of being fined unless he carries it in a certain way ?—Yes. and there is this too, which arises out of that, that if he should happen to have the light go out, and an official saw him going along the road without a light he would be fined for travelling with a box without a light.

8029. Is the Committee to understand that the conditions of mining are such now that a man may go long hours in the mine without any light at all if he once loses it ?—Oh yes, he may go long hours.

8030. He may go long hours without any light at all ?—Yes.

8031. Is that conducive to safety ?—Not by any means.

8032. You spoke of the drawing of the timber. Of course this Committee knows that that is one of the most difficult businesses in the mine. When a man leaves a bar or prop in the worked-out portion of the mine, what would be his general object in doing so ?—Safety.

8033. The safety of himself ?—The safety of himself and of those about him.

8034. So that really it is not out of mere caprice, or because he is indifferent to the effective working of the mine, but because he feels that to draw that timber would be to imperil his own life and possibly the lives of his comrades : is that it ?—That is always the reason, so far as I know.

8035. So that he really chooses the lesser evil so to speak, of preserving his own life and those of his mates ?—I have known men of long experience to prefer dismissal to drawing a prop or a bar when instructed to do so, because they felt that to do so was endangering their lives.

8036. So that, on the one hand, they have to endanger their lives, or, on the other hand, to endanger their wages ?—Yes.

8037. And the endangering of their wages is the lesser evil ?—That is so.

8040. So that I should be right in saying that there are so to speak a thousand offences for which varying amounts may be deducted, and which are entirely at the caprice of the officials in the mines ?—One can hardly give the number of them, because an act which has not been considered an offence, which has never been dreamed of as an offence, becomes an offence one day or another.

8041. The infinite variety of conditions under which the people labour brings about an equally great number of offences, so to speak ?—That is so.

8042. For which of course varying amounts will be imposed, in accordance with the caprice of the official at the time ?—Very largely according to the temper the manager is in.

8043. With regard to the deduction of 10s. to which you have referred, of course the gauze is the most important portion of the safety lamp ?—Yes.

8044. And to turn out a defective gauze is after all a very serious offence, if it is an offence at all; that is, if it is not due to lack of knowledge, it would be a serious offence under the Coal Mines Regulation Act?—That is so; it would be.

8045. I take it the proper ground for the management of the colliery to go upon would be that this was an offence under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and should have been dealt with as such; is that your opinion?—Yes; it was so at the time when I dealt with the case.

8046. So that if there were any extenuating circumstances to be pleaded on the man's behalf, they ought to have been laid before the Court?—Yes. In this case I have not the slightest doubt but that a deep impression would have been made upon the Judge because of the occupation which this man had followed previously, and because of the very limited instruction he had been given, and the very trivial nature of the offence itself.

8047. Are we to understand from you that where men's lives may possibly be imperilled, it is not a matter which ought to be let off with a fine, even of 10s., but that if men's lives are jeopardised, that matter, in the interests of all, should be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction and dealt with on its merits? Are we to understand that?—Yes; in the interests of the mining community our Association would prefer that where a workman is in a position to be prosecuted under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, in the interests of everybody about the mine that ought to be the course taken.

8048. I suppose in the case of many of these fines, even if the man has been guilty of an offence the great bulk of people will not know that such an offence has been mitted at all?—Practically nobody but the man himself and the official.

8049. And that therefore there can be no deterrent effect upon other people?—No; it is not made known to them.

8050. Would the publicity which would be given to such a case in Court cause other people also to be more careful?—There is not the slightest doubt about it.

8051. Therefore, does the fine in your opinion defeat what is alleged to be the intention of the employer?—I think it does, by the very fact that it does not get to the knowledge of the miners generally.

8052. The necessary publicity does not result from the system of fining?—No, it does not.

8053. You have had a lengthened experience, as I know. Do you find that the more serious accidents, the accidents for which fines are often imposed, are decreasing or increasing in the mines? Take the case of improper timbering, or the improper use of the lamp and many things which do bring about accidents; do you find them increasing or decreasing? This is the way I wish to put it. If the fines themselves which are imposed by the employers are effective in carrying out the intention of the employers, do you think a higher standard of discipline, and consequently of safety would result? The employers impose those fines because they say they desire to maintain a higher standard of discipline?—Yes.

8054. Do you think that if the fines did bring about a higher state of discipline, great safety would result as a consequence?—Yes; if they did.

8055. Now do you find, from your experience as a miner, that greater safety has resulted?—No.

8056. Greater safety has not resulted?—No.

8057. Have the fines increased?—Yes.

8058. Then with an increasing number of accidents in mines you have had an increasing number of fines at the same time?—That is so.

8059. Does it seem to you that the fines have brought the result aimed at by the employers?—I am quite certain that they have not.

8060. They have not contributed to a higher standard of discipline?—I am quite sure the fines have not contributed either to a higher standard of discipline or to a diminution in the number of accidents.

8061. Nor to a greater ratio of safety?—Nor to a greater ratio of safety either.

8062. In the case of inspectors, the Chairman has asked you what action the Union take: do you know how many inspectors there are for your part of Lancashire?—There are two, one and an assistant. Mr. H. Twist. 19 Dec. 1906

8063. Of course there is Mr. Henry Hall?—Yes, and Mr. Matthews.

8064. Is there any other assistant?—I think there is.

8065. What area do these gentlemen have to work over? Could you give it to us briefly?—I could not give it to you, I think.

8066. Never mind about the area. Do you know the working population in and about the mines which these two gentlemen have to act for?—Yes; I should say 70,000 or more.

8067. They have to act for an enormous working population in and about the mines over a very large area?—Immense.

8068. Do you think your Association would get very much benefit from reporting to those gentlemen under such circumstances?—We do not at all feel that we should.

8069. I take it they have an enormous amount of work to attend to, apart altogether from the Truck Act?—Yes. My experience is that their time is almost absolutely occupied going about inspecting pits where there has been a serious accident, and attending Coroners' inquests.

8070. And of course doing their own special office work?—Yes. I am speaking now of their work outside.

8071. Is this Committee to understand that there is in the minds of your people the idea that if you were to report to the inspectors, you would have to report to two people already greatly overworked, with an immense range of duties to perform, and that the chances are there would be very great delay on such report?—We are quite sure of that. Reports of various kinds do go up, and it is often a long time before they get attention.

8072. May we understand that that is at least one reason why the Association has not taken action?—Yes; that may be taken as one reason.

8073. Now you say the men are very strongly opposed to these fines: do you know of any cases where the Association has supported the men when they have refused to be fined?—Innumerable cases.

8074. Does that occur week after week?—Almost every week we have cases reported to our Committee where men refuse to be fined. The whole matter is laid before the Committee. On the facts and merits of the case the Committee decide that certain men ought not to have been fined at all, and they support them and give them the benefit of the funds of the Association.

8075. That is to say, you as miners' agent, along with your colleagues, attend upon the various managers?—Yes.

8076. And investigate as well as you can the merits of the case, and if you are convinced that the man has a good cause to complain of the fine, and refuses to be fined, the Association give him the ordinary support?—Yes. And if on investigation the case is such as in the opinion of the agent, myself, say, and the Committee, that this man ought not to be supported, then he is not supported.

8077. But if upon the merits of the case you find a man has a good ground for refusing to be fined, even if he is dismissed from the works you support him?—Yes.

8078. Are we to understand that those cases are very numerous?—Yes, there are plenty of them. They are occurring almost every week.

8079. Would it be possible to supply the Committee with a number of those cases taken out from the records of your Association if the Chairman desired it?—Yes. I have here a few which I have taken out, some twenty or thirty, perhaps, just to give the Committee an idea.

By the Chairman.

8080. That might suit Mr. Walsh's purpose. It is a very good suggestion, and I think the Committee would appreciate that. Could you hand me in that list, or are there private notes on it?—I only made this as a rough draft for my own reference, but a long list of fines could be sent on to you, giving the date, the name of the colliery company, the name of the man, the amount, and all the particulars. I could give you a list of a hundred if you wanted them. I have nearly fifty here.

By Mr. Walsh.

8081. There is one case where you spoke of a deduction of 20s. from a man's wages for filling an amount of dirt in his coal tub ?—Yes.

8082. Under what agreement, or under what Act, was that possible ?—It was not possible under any Act, legally.

8083. From your own knowledge you are aware that that is not possible under the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—Not in money.

8084. Deductions, if at all, must be from the weight and not from wages ?—That is so.

8085. Had the man to sign for that 20s. ?—Yes.

8086. What did he sign ? Did he sign the Truck Act form, or simply an ordinary piece of paper ?—I think in those cases of which I have knowledge—I have a knowledge, of perhaps, half-a-dozen—that it was simply a written statement by the manager.

8087. Not the usual Truck Act form ?—No.

8088. Are you aware of any cases where this kind of deduction has been made from men's wages, where the contract form which you speak of here has been signed ?—I cannot speak positively. Though I know the system prevails absolutely at one firm, I cannot say what form the men sign. I do not know what form they sign, but I know we have hundreds of fines of 2s. 6d. in that particular firm in a year.

8089. Anyhow, from your own knowledge cases are continually taking place where these heavy fines are being made from wages, from cash, as opposed to the requirements of the Coal Mines Regulation Act which states that such deductions shall only be from the weight of mineral ?—That is so.

8090. Of course subject to an agreement between the employer and the workmen ?—Yes.

8091. You speak of employers' houses. Is the tenancy of those houses a condition of employment ?—Well, I should say it is.

8092. Is the retention of the tenancy a condition of employment also ?—Yes, equally.

8093. That is to say, if a man leaves an employer's house, he must also be prepared to leave his employment: is that so ?—There is no doubt about that.

8094. Do you know any cases where men have been evicted because of leaving their employers' service?—I cannot give you specific cases. I know of men who have been compelled to leave private property to go into the property of the company.

8095. I was rather directing your attention to the point as to whether men have been compelled to leave the houses of the company when they leave the employment of the company ? Do you remember any cases of that sort ?—I could not give you a specific case of that.

8096. Have you any objection to stating the particular company you have in your mind ?—Not in the least. The company I have in my mind is M 4.

8097. Speaking entirely from your own knowledge, what area do they cover, so far as their ownership of houses is concerned ?—Their collieries extend over an area say of half a dozen miles, taking in several villages. In some villages they are almost absolutely the sole owners of the property. In others they possess a very large number of houses, and in others not so many. At H., they are almost absolutely the owners of the village, so far as property is concerned, and at G. I should say quite 50 per cent. of the property belongs to the company.

8098. You are aware that this matter is one which has been referred to us because of a debate which took place in the middle portion of the Parliamentary session ?—Yes.

8099. This is an important matter, and we should be glad to have your information with regard to it. What population, roughly speaking, would be covered by those villages to which you have referred ? What is the population at H. ?—About 7,000.

8100. And G. ?—Another 7,000.

8101. And E., and round there ?—They do not get into E. They get more into A.

8102. Just give the Committee roughly what you think would be the population directly affected by the company's ownership of houses ?—I should say about 20,000.

8103. And a very large number of those people are really tenants of houses belonging to that colliery company ?—Yes, a very large number.

8104. Do I understand that they must be prepared to vacate that property if at any time they desire to leave the employment of the company ?—Yes. There is not the slightest doubt about it that if a man leaves the employ of the company he may get ready to leave the house and find another.

8105. You speak here of sick and accident societies being practically compulsory. Do you know of any sick society in connection with that colliery ?—Yes, I have very intimate knowledge of the sick fund associated with that company.

8106. Would you tell the Committee very briefly the conditions under which that sick club is carried on ?—The condition under which that club is carried on are very obnoxious. The men are compelled to pay to it. They pay 6d. per week. If they receive an accident, or fall sick, they get 9s. per week. But the society is used for the purpose of keeping the men from either claiming or obtaining compensation.

8107. How is that ?—If they claim compensation the payment from the sick society ceases, but if they do not claim compensation, they can continue to have the benefits of the society.

8108. What benefit does the society itself give ?—They give 9s. less 6d. contribution, 8s. 6d. per week.

By Mr. Delevingne.

8110. I understood you to say that in the case of breaches of the special rules, you think it is better all round that the punishment should be by way of prosecution in a court rather than by fine ?—Yes, we do.

8111. You are aware, of course, that many owners and managers are disinclined to prosecute their men on account of the time and trouble involved in taking proceedings in court ?—Yes; and also on account of the risk of losing their case.

8112. Whatever the cause, there is a disinclination on the part of the owners and managers to take proceedings in Court ?—Yes. I think they feel that to take deductions from the men's wages is an easier way.

8113. Do you think if fines were abolished managers would resort to prosecution instead ?—In some cases, for breaches of special rules, they would, no doubt. In the cases which are very trivial, and where the offence is very small, I do not think they would in the majority of instances.

8114. You do not think they would take proceedings ?—No.

8115. Do you think there is a danger of discipline falling between two stools ? A man cannot be fined, and is not prosecuted; might not that have the effect of lowering the standard of discipline ?—I do not think so. In those cases which did really affect discipline, and jeopardise the lives of the men, or the safety of the men employed generally, they would not hesitate to take steps to prosecute.

8116. I suppose every breach of a special rule is a matter which affects the safety of the men and of the mine ?—In some degree.

8117. There are differences of degree, of course ?—Yes.

8118. Apart from breaches of special rules, I suppose you would say there are a great number of matters occurring in a mine which are possible sources of dangers, but which are not in the rules ?—I think they try to cover as far as possible by their special rules, of which there are a very large number, every conceivable act or omission which would be likely to result in danger to life.

8119. You think the special rules at present do cover practically all the acts which can be committed by men which may be a source of danger ?—Yes ; I think they are very exhaustive.

8120. With regard to those cases to which you drew attention of contracts being made after the offence has been committed, you think that is illegal ?—As a layman I feel that it is.

8121. Have you ever taken steps to test that in the courts ?—I could not give you a case. Usually the employer will not let us. We go and interview him and point out that it is illegal. "All right," he will say, "Here is his money back ; let him go about his business."

8122. I understood from you, and we have understood from other witnesses, that this system of making contracts after the offence has been committed is very prevalent in Lancashire ?—Yes ; it is universal, practically.

8123. Yet I understand that no case has been taken into Court to test the legality of that system ?—There may have been one or two, but I cannot give you them now. I have a hazy idea that there have been one or two cases, but I could not speak positively.

8124. I want to ask you one question about those cases of improper filling. Improper filling is dealt with in the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—Yes.

8125. Regulations are made there with regard to deductions for improper filling ?—Yes.

8126. Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act no other deductions may be made except those provided for in the section which deals with the matter ?—That is so.

8127. Yet, I understand from you that the managers impose fines for improper filling which are outside the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—They do, very extensively.

8128. Have you brought that system to the notice of the mines' inspectors ?—I could not give you a specific case. In the cases I have in my mind, we have not.

8129. You know the mines' inspectors are charged with the duty of seeing that those provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act with regard to check-weighing and deductions are enforced ?—Yes. Our difficulty is this. The man says, "Look here, I have a good place ; I am making good money. For Heaven's sake do not say anything ! Do not give publicity to it. I would rather pay it."

8130. But the custom of imposing fines for improper filling is a general matter which ought to have been brought to the notice of the mines' inspector ?—Yes, I must confess it ought.

8131. It has not been done ?—No, not generally. There are cases where we have brought his attention to it, and he has come down and investigated, and put the thing right.

8132. As regards those deductions for oil and explosives, which you say are excessive, have those been brought to the notice of the mines' inspector ? There is no question there of any individual man having his employment endangered by the complaint ; it is a general matter affecting all the men in the colliery ?—Yes.

8133. Have you brought those matters to the notice of the mines' inspector ?—In very few cases.

8134. What officials impose the fines in the collieries ? Is it the under official, or the manager of the mine ?—Usually the under official will report a man for having done a certain thing which he considers to be an offence. Then the under-looker, the man between the foreman and the manager, will decide that he shall be fined so much. He will say, "All right ; we will fine him so much," or, "We will not fine him ; you must warn him," or, "Call him in to-night and ask him to sign for a fine of 2s. 6d. Tell him if he does not sign for it he can go about his business."

8135. Does that fine have to be approved by the manager ?—In some cases it is, and in others it is not.

8136. Is the man given a hearing at all ?—No ; he is simply walked into the office, and the form is put before him.

8137. In the case of B. 11, which you mentioned to us, where they have abolished fines, what is their system of enforcing discipline ? How do they deal with breaches of special rules and other matters ? They simply give the man a warning at once, if he commits a small offence : "The next time, you are either in the Court or in the street ; you are either discharged or else you go to Court."

8138. Do they have a system of suspensions there ?—No ; they used to do, but that also has ceased.

8139. What is your view of the system of suspension ?—I think it is cruel. A man may just sleep a little too long, and have a long way to travel, and therefore cannot get there in time, or he may be a little indisposed. He cannot send word, living out in the country, perhaps, at a distance from the colliery, and cannot see anybody going by whom he can send a message. For that, sometimes he is sent home for a day, or even a week, although he may have put in full attendance for five or six months. It is positively cruel.

8140. Do you think that if fines were abolished the suspensions would increase—that managers would resort to it as an alternative ?—I could not say whether they would or not. It would depend upon the attitude the managers took up. I hardly think they would, because they depend upon the men being there to keep up their output.

8141. As between fines and suspensions, which do you think is preferable ?—They are both very distasteful. I do not suppose there is very much to choose between them.

8142. The Chairman asked you whether you thought a system of dismissal, after preliminary warning, was better than a system of fining, and I think you said yes ?—Yes and I still say yes.

8143. Would your opinion extend to a system of suspension, as well as to a system of dismissal, as an alternative to fines ?—Yes ; for it is just as cruel to cause a man to lose a day's work as to fine him half-a-crown.

8144. You do not catch my point. You told the Chairman that dismissal after warning was in your opinion preferable to a system of fining, from the men's point of view ?—And I believe that.

8145. Do you also say that a system of suspending for a week or a day, whether after warning or not, would be better for the men than a system of fining ?—I cannot agree that one would be better than the other. It seems to me that they are both equally cruel and injurious, and I do not see how a salutary effect can be attained.

8146. On the question of rents, you said that the practice of making deductions from the wages for rent led to imposition ; will you explain very briefly what you meant by that ? In what way do deductions for rent at the office lead to imposition ?—Well, a man goes into a house belonging to a colliery company, and his rent is raised. He feels or he knows that if he gives notice to leave, although there may be a better house over the way belonging to a private owner for which he would not be called upon to pay so much rent, he would be dismissed. Therefore he has to suffer from the increased rent and he is no party to the bargain at all. He simply receives the notice that so much will be added to the rent, and it is deducted from his wages the following week. I think that in itself is tantamount to imposition.

8147. But suppose, instead of a system of deductions, the owner collected his rents in the way you recommend, that would not touch the employer's power to make it a condition of employment that his men should occupy his houses ?—He would still have a power over them, but not so great a power, it seems to me.

8148. He would have the power of raising his rent ?—Yes, upon giving notice.

8149. The question of imposition will arise just as much under a system of collection of rent as under a system of deduction in the office ?—I think it would be diminished.

Mr. H. Twist.

19 Dec. 1906.

8150. I suppose in many cases in the past, and possibly also in the present, when a colliery is started in a new district where houses are few, the colliery company is almost compelled to put up houses for the accommodation of its men?—I hardly think so. I do not know of any colliery which has been started so far out in the country that it has been necessary to put up any large number of cottages.

8151. I know of collieries being opened up in purely agricultural districts, near small villages where there is no accommodation for the men. Some accommodation has had to be provided, and in the past I think it has often been provided by the owners. That is a convenience to the men, of course?—Yes; perhaps that is so in some cases, but one usually finds that if a public works is going on, or a pit is put down, houses are built—perhaps slowly—and the need is met. Perhaps it is not met so promptly as it might be, but still the houses are put up by private owners.

8152. Do you object in toto to the owners leasing houses to their men?—Yes.

8153. Is the benefit scheme at the colliery which you mentioned (M 4.) certified under the Compensation Act as a contracting-out scheme?—No; the Registrar refused to certify it.

8154. Do you happen to have gone into the question as to what power the company has of deducting from compensation paid under the Compensation Act any sums paid out of the sick benefit fund?—It is here stated in the Rule.

8155. Have you ever taken any advice as to the legality of that?—Yes; we have taken a case into Court.

8156. What was the result?—The result was that we won, and the Judge told the company that they were practically compelling the men to pay their own compensation.

By the Chairman.

8157. With regard to suspensions, of course the term is one which covers the case of dismissal for a temporary period?—Yes.

8158. You see no way of compelling people to keep up the relation of employer and employed by force?—No, I do not.

8159. Suppose an employer dismisses a man, it is open to him to say either "You are dismissed altogether," or "You are dismissed for such-and-such a period"?—Yes, I suppose it is.

8160. And that is really suspension? You see it is a serious matter, either way. Do I understand you to say that you think it would be better for all parties that that serious view should be taken rather than this nagging system of fines?—I am quite sure of it.

8161. I should like to ask you about that case which you mentioned: could you hand in to us the rules of the Society which you referred to which compels the forfeiture of its benefits if compensation is received?—I shall have the greatest pleasure in doing so. I have a copy here. (Handed to the Chairman.)

8162. Will you point out the particular rule?—The particular rule is underlined. I have at the present time a case in hand where a man has been on the funds of the Society for sixteen weeks, and has not claimed compensation, and there is a dispute pending.

8163. The particular rule is Rule 21 on page 11?—Yes.

8164. You know of course quite well that under the Act of 1897 contracting out is forbidden?—Yes.

8165. That is to say, it declares against forfeiture?—Yes.

8166. Under this contract, apparently, a very opposite policy is pursued: it compels forfeiture?—Yes.

8167. It may be from the other end of the scale—not from the Statutory end, but from the Association's end of it—but the result is the same to the man, namely, that he is deprived, at one end, of the compensation to which he has contributed?—In that particular firm a good many men are being deprived of their compensation. There are more than we have knowledge of, but we know of a good many, and we feel that that company is saving thousands of pounds a year by that method.

8168. The last question I want to ask you is one which has been suggested to me by a member of the Committee. It is with regard to that case to which you referred in which a fine of £1 was imposed. What was that fine for?—In one case it was for a little dirt in a box of coal, and in the other case it was for a little coal in a box of cannel.

8169. The amount of the fine was a serious one?—Very serious.

8170. Do you know anything with regard to an attempt being made to get the opinion of the inspector upon that subject?—No. At that particular colliery, a fortnight ago, I arranged with the management that all fines and confiscations and suspensions should cease, and we entered into an arrangement by which in future deductions shall be made according to the Coal Mines Regulation Act. But this has been going on for some time.

8171. What I was trying to get at was a case in which they had attempted to get, in a handy way, the opinion of the inspector: do you remember any case of that kind?—I do not.

8172. Do you know the case of S—— B——?—I know that S—— B—— has written, but I could not tell you what the case was which he wrote on, or what the opinion of the inspector was in that case.

8173. Then you cannot testify as to that?—No. I have it from hearsay from others and also from the man himself that he did write, but I do not know the particulars of the case.

8174. You do not know the result?—No.

8175. Did the inspector interpose?—I believe he did.

By Mr. Walsh.

8176. What do you mean by saying "I believe he did"?—I am not sure whether he did or not. I am not acquainted with the particulars of that case.

THIRTY-SECOND DAY

Thursday, 21st February, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. EDWARD CADBURY, called; and Examined.

Mr. E. Cadbury.

21 Feb. 1907.

By the Chairman.

8177. Will you please state your position with relation to the well known firm whose name you bear?—My position is practically that of managing director; technically I am one of the managing directors of Cadbury Brothers, Ltd.

8178. What is the number, all told, of the employees?—About 4,200 at the present time.

8179. In what part of the country are they employed? They are practically all employed at Bournville, near Birmingham, with the exception of travellers and outside representatives.

8180. I suppose we may take it that in the main business the industrial part of the concern, you employ between 3,000 and 4,000 persons?—Yes.

8181. In the manufacture of cocoa, chocolate and sweet stuffs?—Chiefly cocoa and chocolate.

8182. Have you that number employed in one building or in a set of buildings?—They are in a set of buildings, grouped on one site.

8183. What is the extent of the site?—I believe it is about sixty acres.

8184. I suppose the buildings are graded according to the various departments of the work?—They are all one or two storey buildings spread over a considerable area.

8185. Does the number of work people you have mentioned include not only those engaged in making the articles sold, but also in packing, etc.?—Yes, and the subsidiary industries, inclusive of engineering and so on.

8186. How far back does your connection with the firm date?—My connection with it dates back about thirteen years.

8187. Has the firm been a limited liability company during the whole of that time?—No, only for about seven years.

8188. During the early part of your connection with the firm were you acquainted with the system of fines and deductions from wages?—Yes, I was.

8189. You are, no doubt, aware of the objects remitted to this Committee for enquiry and in that connection I should like to ask you what was the system which existed when you entered the firm?—There was the usual system of fines and deductions with various penalties for infractions of different rules, and there were deductions for spoilt work, etc.

8190. You have been kind enough to frame certain schedules or statistics for us—may I say, in view of these, that prior to the year 1898 there was in your firm a system of fines for lateness in attendance, badness of work or bad conduct?—Yes.

8191. Were these, speaking generally, the three principal categories?—Yes, that would be so.

8192. Will you please tell us now what was your experience of that system?—In the first instance, it was not in any way reformative. It had practically no influence upon the character of offenders. If a fine was imposed, the fine was paid and the matter was dismissed from the mind, with no remaining influence on the character of the delinquent. The payment of the fine was felt to have wiped out the offence and then the offence could be repeated on the same condition.

8193. From the point of general efficiency, apart from the individual fines, you secured substantially no benefit from the old system?—No. The system of fines did not necessarily weed out the worst offenders.

8194. Was it, roughly speaking, your experience that the habits of the workers were not improved by the system of fines?—I do not think they really were.

8195. Did that partly arise from a consciousness on the part of the offender that he or she had satisfied the demands made in regard to the individual delinquency?—Yes.

8196. And that they could then go forward as if nothing had happened?—That was largely the effect; not entirely, perhaps, but that was the tendency.

8197. Did your firm seriously consider that situation?—Yes, we considered the reorganising of our fines when that question came up on account of the passing of the Truck Act of 1896.

8198. It would be interesting to us to know exactly the lines upon which you proceeded, if you would be so kind as to explain them?—In the first place, we made up our minds to entirely abolish all fines, and then we had to substitute some system of discipline in place of fines.

8199. Before you go on to the substituted system, will you please give us in general terms, your reasons for the abolition of the system of fines?—I have already stated our main reason. The old system did not lead to efficiency and did not weed out the real offenders.

8200. So that, both from the workers' and employers' point of view, the effect was not satisfactory?—Not satisfactory compared with what we have been able to effect since.

8201. What was the system you substituted in 1898?—We abolished fines and the power of forewomen to dismiss. Previous to that they had power to dismiss workers.

8202. On the spot?—Yes. Now we leave the right of punishment and dismissal in the hands of the directors.

8203. Constituting yourselves as a sort of court of appeal?—Yes, foremen and forewomen could only report to us.

8204. With regard to fines for lateness in attendance, I may inform you it has been represented to this Committee that fines in respect of late attendance are almost a necessity. What do you say with regard to that?—Our time-keeping has very much improved since we established our present system and abolished fines, as will be shown by the figures which have been prepared—the effect has been a gradual improvement.

8205. You might now describe the system you substituted?—We began by having record books in which were entered the names of individual workers, cases of misbehaviour, or bad work, etc.; lateness of attendance was, of course, booked by the time-keeper, and afterwards recorded against the individual in the book which I have described; but latterly we substituted cards for these record books, and the cards form a much better system. I look after the girls' department; each month one of the directors sees the alleged offenders. In the case of the women, I see them, and I have present the offender, the forewoman of her department, and the head forewoman. If there is no doubt about the offence we settle what the penalty is to be, and the offender has the right to speak on her own behalf; so justice is done and a hasty decision is not taken. In the first instance, we are usually content with a caution, which is often effectual; a large proportion of those cautioned never come up again. If the offenders do come up again, it would mean suspension or might mean dismissal, but the offender would probably be sent home for a week. There is no hard or fast line, it depends on the nature of the offence, and the character of the offender. The whole system is designed to be purely reformative and not vindictive.

8206. You have mentioned a system of cards—have you got any samples of these cards? (see Exhibit No. 2 of Appendix IX.)—I thought some had been sent, and I am afraid I have not brought any with me. I may explain that after two years the card is destroyed in order to give the person to whom it belongs the opportunity of starting again with a clean record. After a clean record of two years we do not think it quite fair to keep a continual black mark against an employee for an old offence, so we destroy the record.

8207. So you have a complete record of the attendance and conduct of your workpeople?—Yes, except that we destroy the record after a period of good conduct.

8208. Would you please tell us how the general result of the system which you have adopted compares with the general result of the system of fines?—The general result is very much better. We have often found that the character of an employee has been improved after caution or after the offender has been sent home for a week.

8209. The worker is stimulated to do better?—Yes. In many cases to do better work and to behave better. We take on females without requiring a character. I engage all the women. Of course we have a large number pass through our hands every year—indeed, we lose about 10 per cent. by marriage, etc., which may make the record appear more than would otherwise be the case.

8210. What is the attitude of the workers towards the change of system?—At the beginning the workers would have much preferred to keep on the system of fines.

8211. Can you explain their attitude of mind?—Their attitude of mind was this—that when they had paid their fines they were done with the offence, whereas they regarded the record system as more severe in some ways.

8212. Has that attitude of mind at all changed?—I think so. I don't think now they have any objection to the present system.

8213. You have now been engaged for seven years in the actual administration of the work?—Yes.

8214. Are you able to testify not only to the moral but also to the industrial effect upon the individual?—Yes, the industrial effects are undoubtedly good. The new system has led to greater efficiency, because we have been able to weed out the inefficient.

8215. And there are others who have taken a thought and mended?—Yes, we have improved the industrial efficiency and the moral status of the people, and for these, amongst other reasons, we get a higher class of workers. We believe that by weeding out the inefficient or the lower class of workers we are enabled to get a higher class to come to us.

8216. Have you any knowledge of the workers' homes?—Yes, to some extent.

8217. Are you able to testify as to whether the abolition of fines is approved in their homes?—I could not speak positively upon that because I have not had much evidence either way.

8218. You have described to us that the substituted system is one of beginning with a caution and going on when necessary through suspension to ultimate discharge, but I suppose we may assume that under the previous system offending workpeople could, of course, be discharged?—Yes, the discharges for women were really more frequent under the old system than they are now.

8219. The discharges were more frequent and more haphazard?—Yes, more haphazard. We have the percentages of discharges for women for some of the years under the previous system.

8220. I am still on the general question. Before you come to your figures I wish to know whether you ever had a system of deductions for bad work in this sense, that you compelled any of the material to be bought or taken over at a valuation by your employees?—No, not that system.

8221. You are aware that in some trades that system is adopted?—Yes.

8222. What is your view with regard to it?—I should be against that system, I think. It is not necessary for us, at any rate.

8223. Still avoiding your statistics for the moment, will you kindly tell us what the category of bad conduct includes, generally speaking?—Bad conduct includes untidiness of person, noisiness, impudence to superiors, or moral delinquencies.

8224. Lack ot discipline?—Yes.

8225. Of course in your work, untidiness or anything of that kind is most offensive?—Yes, untidiness and uncleanliness.

8226. Because cleanliness is an absolute condition of employment?—Yes. We are extremely strict with regard to cleanliness.

8227. Now we come to the statistics. You have been good enough to give us tables, and I am going to ask you to allow us to append them to your evidence (see Exhibit No. 2 of Appendix XI.) which will save some time, but there are several facts which I wish to bring out from you. You have a table made up for the years 1899 to 1905 inclusive, which contain instances, as I understand, of bad marks put on the record?—Yes.

8228. In fact these are black lists, in a certain sense?—Yes.

8229. For late time, bad work, bad conduct, and then the total offences and the total offenders are given?—Yes.

8230. Now, as to late time, in 1899 there were forty-five cases?—Yes.

8231. Now will you tell me the reason for that kind of thing?—I do not think our system was working properly in 1899. I doubt if those first two years are so trustworthy as the rest. The system was only just being adopted.

8232. Might we for all practical purposes take 1900 to begin with?—Yes. In the later years we got the records better and more systematic.

8233. Substantially, then, we will take out 1899?—Yes, I think so.

8234. Beginning with 1900, in that year the late-time cases were 115?—Yes.

8235. I want you to illustrate that. Your employees are mostly women, are they not?—We have about 2,600 women and the rest men.

8236. You have a gateman, of course?—Yes.

8237. And he records the time when they enter?—Yes; they hang up a check.

8238. Have you any system by which they are kept out of work for, we will say, a forenoon or a day, or anything like that?—No, half an hour would be the most.

8239. That is to say, you reckon the period in half-hours?—Yes.

8240. In the year 1900 you had 115 late-time cases?—Yes.

8241. That increased in 1901 to 208; what is the reason of that?—I am afraid I could not give the reason offhand. I could look it up.

8242. From that time onwards the late-time cases have gone down very much, until in 1905 they are only thirty-three. There are thirty-three late-time cases for the twelve months of 1905 in a body of workers numbering how many ?—These figures are for the girls—about 2,500.

8243. So that so far as late time goes this system of records seems to have produced next door to perfection in punctuality ?—Yes, I think so.

8244. I wish to bring this to a point. What is the average of those thirty-three cases with regard to the time lost; is it ten minutes ?—Yes; the bulk of the late time is five or ten minutes. They come five or ten minutes late. It is carelessness.

8245. That is 330 minutes, which is five and a half hours ?—Yes; but that would not be the total late time. If you will look a little lower down the table you will see there are several allowances made. Therefore that would not be the total late time.

8246. It was the total late time recorded ?—Yes, the total late time dealt with; but we make allowances in the case of girls.

8247. I know; but so far as your record of offences goes, offences which in your opinion should be properly chronicled, in the case of 2,500 people employed for twelve months, there are only five and a half hours lost altogether ?—Yes.

8248. How many hours a week are they employed ?—From forty-four to fifty hours a week.

8249. Say forty-five hours a week. All that you have of lateness worthy of record amounts to five and a half hours altogether, so that substantially you have eliminated lateness by the record system ?—Yes, substantially we have eliminated lateness. We have eliminated the habitual offenders.

8250. Now we come to bad work; in 1900, you recorded 129 cases of bad work ?—Yes.

8251. And these have gone down and down under your record system until there are only nineteen cases in 1905 ?—Yes.

8252. I want you to tell me the kind of offence which was considered worthy of being chronicled here under the head of bad work ?—If you take the example of a box, it would be bad packing—careless packing, in a box; that would be chronicled under the head of bad work. Taking the card box department, where we make boxes, the careless glueing on of labels or marking with a finger or something of that kind would be bad work.

8253. Such cases were reduced to nineteen instances in 1905, for the same number of workers, 2,500 ?—Yes.

8254. So that again you have practically eliminated bad work by the record system ?—Yes.

8255. Then take cases of bad conduct; they have gone down from 532 in 1900 to ninety-three in 1905 ?—Yes.

8256. Under the head of bad conduct there are all these elements of lack of discipline and so on which you referred to in your evidence ?—Yes.

8257. Again, bad conduct has been substantially eliminated ?—Yes, it has. There has been a contributory cause to eliminate that.

8258. We will come to that, but so far as this record goes, of cases where you thought it was a fair thing as between employer and employed to chronicle bad conduct, those instances have substantially disappeared under the record system ?—Yes, they have.

8259. Let me put this point to you. Supposing you had kept up the system of fines, have you any reason to doubt that you could never have got down to that figure ?—I do not think it would have been possible to have got down to these figures by a system of fines.

8260. With the best supervision possible you think the affair would have gone on pretty much upon the range of the 1899 or 1900 figures ?—Yes.

8261. I will now take your explanations with regard to these tables ?—I should like to say with regard to bad conduct and so on, that since we have had a system of compulsory gymnastics for our younger girls it has very much diminished the offences. It has improved the discipline. I consider that a contributory cause.

8262. You have gymnasia in connection with the works ?—Yes; and from thirteen to fifteen years of age they have gymnastic instruction, including swimming three times a week, in our time, under the Swedish system. That is really a contributory cause, and has undoubtedly very much improved the discipline.

8263. That is very satisfactory. Would that affect the lateness of attendance ?—Yes; I think it improved the discipline all round, especially of the younger girls.

8264. It would be most marked with regard to bad conduct ?—Yes.

8265. At what age do they come into your employment ? Do they come straight from the primary schools ?—They come straight from the primary schools if they have worked in Standard VI. We do not take them under Standard VI. That is one of our own rules.

8266. We see the physical training which goes on for these three years; have you any arrangements for mental training ?—Yes. It is now practically compulsory to attend a course of evening classes from thirteen to sixteen, during the winter.

8267. Are they charged for them ?—Well, they just pay the fees, which we largely refund. I think that comes lower down on these tables.

8268. You have made certain statements with regard to not putting upon the record all the cases of late time: will you tell us about that ?—In the case of women we allow them to be late once or twice a month, if it is not habitual, without any record being made.

8269. Of course in individual cases, of people travelling by train, for instance, their train might be late, or there might be exceptionally bad weather, and things like that ?—Yes.

8270. Or there might be some exceptional case like illness ?—In the case of illness they can come and give a reason on the following day. There is a stated time during which they can come up, and if they have been absent an hour or two, or half a day from illness, if they can give sufficient reason it would not be recorded against them.

8271. The late time is recorded by the gate-keeper ?—It was until the end of last year. We have now another system.

8272. To whom is the explanation given ?—The explanation is given to the works forewoman.

8273. Is she consulted before an entry is made in the record book ?—No. Suppose they are late from illness or something of that kind they have to go to her with their explanation; otherwise the entry would stand.

8274. If the explanation is satisfactory no entry is made ?—That is so.

8276. You mean a particular case where a person is had up ?—I mean that in the case of new hands and so on, a forewoman would, no doubt, prefer to maintain discipline without recording the offence, because I regard a forewoman who is not able to maintain discipline without constantly resorting to the record as incapable of properly looking after her department. Moral suasion should be sufficient in most cases to maintain the discipline of a department.

8277 Then as to bad work, you do not record the first offence unless it is very flagrant, I understand ?—It would be recorded if it were flagrant, generally.

8278. You have given us the general lists from which I see the total offences in 1905 were reduced to 145, and the total offenders is the same number: now tell us about the number of each division of punishment. I understand the numbers of punishment recorded is divided into three classes, caution, suspension, and discharge ?—Yes.

8279. Have you anything to say with regard to this ?—In the year 1901 there was a specially large number discharged; that was owing to exceptional circumstances.

Mr. E. Cadbury.

21 Feb. 1907.

8280. In the case of this table also the figures come down from the year 1900 or 1901 to the year 1905?—Yes.

8281. You might give us the percentage of employees who have been in the record book for each year. In 1900 there were 2,177 employees, and in 1905 there were 2,472, a slight increase in the number?—Yes.

8282. In 1900, out of 2,177, there were 328 cases on the record book, being 15·06 per cent.; and in 1905 there were only 145 cases out of 2,472, being 5·86 per cent.?—Yes.

8283. Then there is a part of your precis which I do not quite follow, with regard to "money transactions?" —Of course most of these do not come under the Truck Act, but only a very few of them; but we understood we could send up all particulars and then what was not necessary could be cut out. I should say that a good deal of this does not come in.

8284. I think we now have your view with regard to the substituted system in lieu of the former system of fines?—Yes.

8285. That is with regard to bad work and the like. Now there is a branch of the inquiry with regard to deductions from wages for any cause whatever: have you any system of compulsory deductions?—We have. In the case of both girls and men we have deductions for Hospital Saturday and in the case of men we have also deductions for a pension scheme, but the pension scheme is not actually compulsory.

8286. Is the deduction for Hospital Saturday compulsory?—Yes.

8288. You give a signed receipt in accordance with the Act of Parliament?—Yes, in accordance with the Act.

8289. What is the view you take with regard to compulsory deductions for this particular object?—It is a very old system. It has been instituted a great many years. In the first place it was instituted instead of the system of deducting 1d. a week as being a fairer system, as those earning more would pay a greater proportion than those earning less. Previously, whatever amount they earned, they would pay the same. Under the present system those earning more pay a larger proportion.

8290. What would a person earning 18s. a week have deducted from him each half year?—9d. It is for the hospitals in Birmingham—the Hospital Saturday collection.

8291. What is the view the employees take with regard to that?—They do not have any objection. We considered it quite recently and we asked our representative committees to consider it, and they suggested it should be continued.

8292. What do you mean by representative committees?—We have two committees of management, the men's committee and the women's committee, which meet weekly. They take a great deal of the management of the place. They are composed of nominated members and two elected members—elected in each case by the foremen or forewomen as the case may be.

8293. You nominate the other members?—Yes, and one of the directors is chairman.

8294. That is really for the purpose of co-operating in any mutual scheme?—Yes, for the purpose of organising the departments and the work, and so on.

8295. Does this system of subscription seem to be acceptable or does it not?—It seems to be acceptable, but I cannot say that I personally feel strongly upon it one way or the other.

8296. If it were left to the old voluntary system, do you think there would be a deficit in the revenue of the hospitals?—Yes, no doubt.

8297. Is the hospital available to your employees?—The hospitals are all available for our employees, and also the convalescent homes. The Hospital Saturday collection in Birmingham gives a fixed sum annually to the hospitals and supports the convalescent homes also, and our people make use of both.

8298. That is the one instance of compulsory deduction?—Yes.

8299. What are those which are voluntary?—There is the pension fund (see Exhibit No. 3, of Appendix IX), the membership of which is voluntary, but practically the whole of the men belong to it.

8300. How is it managed?—It is a contributory scheme, a percentage of the wages being paid by employer and employees.

8301. Will you explain it?—I can give you full particulars. An amount ranging from 2½ per cent. to 5 per cent. on the wages is paid in equal amounts: supposing the employee pays 2½ per cent. of his wages to the fund we should contribute another 2½ per cent.

8302. How is the system administered?—It is administered by trustees, four of whom are nominated by the company and two by the men in the works, and one is elected by the staff; there are seven trustees.

8303. What is the scheme of pensions?—Commencing at sixty we give a pension varying in accordance with the wages earned and the length of service.

8304. We have the rules and regulations here?—Yes. It is not compulsory, but we take this precaution that those not joining sign a declaration saying that they understand that in case of old age or disablement we have no liability towards them. I am not speaking of liability of a legal nature, but no liability to help them unless they take advantage of the scheme we offer.

8305. Is there any particular period during which they must remain in your service before they get the advantage of the scheme?—I have not come prepared to give you all the particulars of the scheme.

8306. The pension begins at sixty?—Yes.

8307. What do they get?—It is a varying proportion. It is an actuarial scheme based on the wages and length of service.

8308. Do they continue in your employment after sixty?—We have the option of continuing them in our employment after sixty.

8309. And if they do not continue in your employment they are pensioned?—Yes; then they come on the fund.

8310. Supposing a man has been in your employment for the requisite period, two years or whatever it is, and he has had a wage of 25s. a week, what would his pension be?—I should be glad if you will allow me to supply these particulars later. I have not them sufficiently at my fingers' ends at the moment. I shall be glad to give you any particulars you require.

8311. The management of the fund is done by these trustees?—Yes.

8312. And it is voluntary?—It is voluntary with this proviso, that we make it plainly understood that we shall not assist anyone in their old age unless they join.

8313. To the extent of your contribution it is practically an addition to the wages of the employees?—Yes, it is.

8314. Will you tell us about your other schemes?—We have no sick club. We had a sick benefit scheme, but on the passing of the Shop Clubs Act that was given up. We now pay half wages practically during absence for sickness. There is no contribution made by the workpeople.

8315. Are there any other deductions?—We deduct for belonging to the athletic club from the men if they ask us to do so. We have a voluntary athletic club, and the employees authorise us to make deductions quarterly or half-yearly. That is for the convenience of the club.

8316. They get the advantage of your book-keeping?—Yes. The club is run entirely by the workpeople. The arrangement of which I have spoken is for mutual convenience.

8317. Have you other clubs of that kind ?—Yes; the girls have a club, but they pay in cash for everything; we make no deductions from them. The various transactions, kitchens, overalls, and so on are all paid for in cash.

8318. It has been represented to us that the payment for overalls and that sort of thing is most conveniently managed by deducting from wages: you find it can be quite well done by payments in cash ?—Yes. Food, for instance, is paid for in cash entirely.

8319. There is cooking on the premises ?—Yes. We have a kitchen department. I would not like to give the amount we take from our kitchen department, but it amounts to some thousands a year.

8320. Will you explain that to us. In the first place you do not deduct from wages ?—No.

8321. You take cash for the articles supplied ?—Yes.

8322. Is there any compulsion, direct or indirect, to make them buy from you ?—Not at all, because we sell at a loss.

8323. You are able to testify that you do sell at a loss ?—We do to a certain extent; that is to say, we do not charge the kitchen department with wages, rent, or fuel.

8324. Before I pass from the payments during sickness, will you allow me to supplement what you have told us by asking you this: for how long does your payment of half wages continue ?—I have the exact particulars of the sick fund here. There are two scales of allowances, one for men and boys, and one for women and girls. From thirteen to fifteen it is 3s. a week; from twenty-three it is 12s. a week, with a funeral donation of from £3 to £8.

8325. How long does the allowance continue ?—Full pay continues for twelve weeks—that is the maximum allowance—and twelve weeks half pay.

8326. With regard to the payments that are made for overalls in cash, I understand you supply the overalls ?—We supply the material. We supply a considerable variety of articles in fact.

8327. But are they free to supply themselves anywhere ?—Yes, even for materials for overalls, which we supply at two-thirds cost. We require respectable overalls to be worn. We should require them to renew them if they were worn out.

8328. While it is voluntary, as you have described and while they pay cash, as you have described, I understand they have the advantage of buying rather more cheaply from you ?—Yes, in many cases.

8329. And they have every convenience, as for instance the purchase of railway tickets and so on, from you ?—Yes.

8330. That is so simply because you take an interest in the employees and provide them with the conveniences necessary for their work ?—Yes, largely that is so. Of course it has its business side. All these things tend to promote efficiency and tend to enable us to obtain a higher class of employee, a more intelligent and better kind of worker.

8331. What we want to get at is whether there is any kind of indirect compulsion on these people to take these things from you and take advantage of these conveniences—whether they are in any kind of peril of losing their situations if they do not ?—No. There is no compulsion in any of these things so far as I can look them through. With regard to continuation classes, there is practically compulsion there for the younger people to attend from thirteen to sixteen, and of course there is compulsion in regard to the gymnasium. Where we have compulsion, as a rule we make no charge. For instance, in the gymnasium, where the younger ones are compelled to go, we provide the uniform.

8332. With regard to the evening continuation classes, under the age of sixteen the fee is refunded if the attendance is good and a satisfactory report given ?—Yes.

8333. Then between the ages of sixteen and nineteen all the fees up to 7s. 6d. are paid if two-thirds of the attendances are made and a satisfactory report is given ?—Yes.

8334. Is there any grumbling with regard to their paying any of these fees ?—No, I do not think so.

8335. What is the amount they pay when you pay the fees up to 7s. 6d. ?—I am not quite sure what the fees are for the younger ones.

8336. I understand it is only from sixteen to nineteen that any fees are charged at all for the evening continuation classes ?—Fees are refunded from 16 to 19.

8337. Can you tell me what amount they pay per annum ?—I could not tell you off-hand.

8338. May I offer you a friendly suggestion: it would be a nice clean sheet if there were no fees at all. It would not come to much ?—No. In most of our educational work we are acting directly under the advice to a large extent of the Board of Education.

8339. You will think over my suggestion ?—Yes. I entirely understand your point of view.

8340. I see you have a swimming class also ?—Yes.

8341. Then with regard to the Savings Fund, that is financed by you in the sense that you appoint the collector and receiver ?—Yes, and we allow a certain interest. But we do not permanently hold our employees' money; we feel strongly against that.

8342. Who is the actual banker ?—We hold it for a year, and pay it in to the Post Office Savings Bank at the end of each year, to the credit of each depositor's account.

8343. Then I see that they can obtain medicines and dental requisites by arrangement with you ?—Yes.

8344. And these are all checked ?—Yes.

8345. You say there is a nurse in charge who gives a receipt for the nominal amounts charged for medicine ?—Yes; we have a doctor, two nurses, and a dentist.

8346. Employed by the firm ?—Yes, entirely.

8347. Do they pay for medical attendance ?—They do not pay for medical attendance; they pay for certain medicines. They do not pay for dental requisites, except in the case of fillings and so on.

8348. Of course we do not conceal from ourselves that it is manifest that the well-being of the workers is very carefully before your firm. Might I ask you one general question: do you find that the feeling on the part of the workers is one reciprocating those sentiments ?—Yes, I think so. We have never had any trouble of any kind in our works.

8349. With regard to the personnel, do you find them on the up-grade in physique and character ?—Yes, decidedly so, especially in physique, because they have to pass a strict medical and dental examination now before we take them on.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8350. In your experience, fines have had a bad effect on the character of the workers ?—Yes.

8351. Therefore in that sense they were no deterrent ?—That is so.

8352. Can you explain why they were no deterrent in the sense that the workers did not feel the consequences in their pockets ?—I would not say they were a deterrent there. They were a deterrent for the time being, but not a lasting deterrent; that is my opinion.

8353. Have you any recollection as to the amount of the individual fines imposed; were the sums considerable in any case ?—I would not like to say off hand, but I do not think a fine exceeded 2s. 6d., I think 2s. 6d. was the maximum fine, but I could not say without further reference.

8354. Can you say without further reference what the commonest amount would be ?—I think 6d. was the usual fine.

8355. It has been suggested to us that if the amount of the fine were regulated in proportion to the amount of wage earned it would be a great improvement for the worker: I gather from your evidence that although it would be an improvement to her to be fined 6d. rather than a shilling, still, the fact that she was fined a smaller amount would, if anything, be a smaller deterrent: therefore, a modified system would be still more likely to fail in its deterrent object ?—Yes, I think so; that is, against those that specially needed it—against the habitual offenders.

Mr. E. Cadbury.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8356. Will you kindly tell us exactly what the old system was if the employees came late? In the first place, how much grace are they allowed now before being reported?—They are allowed to be late once or twice a month, if it is not habitual, without being reported. I am dealing with the women at the present moment.

8357. That is not what I mean. Are they allowed three minutes' or five minutes' grace?—No; there is no grace at all.

8358. At what time must they arrive?—Our women come at a quarter to eight, at the earliest.

8359. If they were not there at a quarter to eight, under the old system they were fined?—Yes.

8360. How much?—I have not the particulars of those fines with me.

8361. It might be 6d. or 7d., I suppose?—Yes

8362. Then they were allowed in the works?—Yes.

8363. If they are five minutes late now, what is the system adopted?—They are booked if they are late.

8364. And you allow them to go into the works?—Yes. From the beginning of this year we have another system which is not down here. We have altered our system. I do not know whether you wish to go into that point, but I can explain it. Under our present system they are booked in each room and not in the lodge at all.

8365. That does not make any material difference, I think. If they are three or five minutes late they are simply booked, and allowed to go into the works as they were before?—Quite so.

8366. Then what do you mean by suspension?—That is for habitual offenders.

8367. That does not mean suspension for half an hour?—No; for a week.

8368. You have no suspensions at the particular time for half an hour or an hour?—No, we have no suspension for the particular time.

8369. If they were late twice or three times they might be suspended a week?—No. If they were late three times they would probably get cautioned, and if it occurred again within a year they would be liable to suspension for a week.

8370. They would lose a whole week's wages in that case?—They would, but such cases are rare.

8371. And would have nothing to do?—That is so; they would not come to work at all.

8372. That is a severer system than a system of fining?—It is severer on the habitual offender because it means eventual dismissal, I think.

8374. With reference to this table of continuous progress which you have put in, am I right in saying that that improvement is obtained because you have now a better system of finding out how many times people are late and dismiss the real offenders, and so make your record better?—It has two effects. We dismiss the really incorrigible offenders, and the present system has a moral effect on the rest, because they are personally interviewed.

8375. It has a moral effect, and the fact that those who offend most are dismissed makes the record better?—Yes; I think it is quite fair to look at it in that way.

8376. I presume in regard to fines for bad work discipline is helped by the forewomen threatening to record the offence; it is in the nature of black marks at school, I suppose?—Yes. Not every offence is recorded in that way, but the forewomen may threaten to record them.

8377. Just in the same way as a master at a school would say, "If you do not do so and so I will give you a black mark"?—Yes. Our object is not to get the maximum amount of punishments, but to avoid punishments altogether.

8378. You do not consider a forewoman is a good disciplinarian who has to resort too much to the record?—That is so.

8379. These overalls and other things are compulsory?—Yes. We give the material. When a girl is taken on she has the material for two overalls given her, which she has to have made up; and afterwards we sell the material at two-thirds cost. She has to have a clean overall each week. We also often lend overalls for limited periods.

8380. She has to pay two-thirds of the cost of the material and make them herself after the first time?—Yes. Of course she could buy the material elsewhere.

8381. Your system is wonderful in its organisation, if I may say so, but you would not suggest that anyone starting in your business, if anyone could do so, could carry out that system? It would take them a long time to arrive at anything like this state of perfection, which is only possible because you have the command of large means that you can give these very great advantages to the workpeople?—Partly so, I think. Of course in a small manufactory you do not need such an elaborate system of organisation; there is no doubt you can deal much more individually with the employees. Here, where we are dealing with such a large number of people, we have to deal with them in the mass. You are speaking with regard to punishments, I take it?

8382. I was talking not only with regard to punishments, but with regard to the different advantages which you give by means of clubs and other things: those could not be given by anyone except large capitalists?—I think we are large because of our system of organisation and discipline, so that it is cause and effect; it is not only one way.

8383. Still, when Cadbury's was in a small way of business they had not such a good system, and they could not treat their workpeople quite in the luxurious way in which they are treated now: is not that so?—Probably so, but it has developed gradually. I quite agree that it has developed gradually, but I do not admit that it is because we are large that we have this system. I maintain that, equally, the system is the cause of our growth, because we are enabled to get more efficient workers.

8384. You really maintain that your system has not only been good for the workpeople, but through being good to the workpeople you have been recompensed?—Yes; I maintain the system is economically sound. It is not charitable; it is an economically sound system.

By Mr. Walsh.

8385. Sir Frederick has touched upon one point I thought of mentioning. Although you say that the discipline has improved greatly, and that there is a higher standard of efficiency, I notice that the proportion of discharges is as great as ever?—The proportion of discharges to workpeople has gone down very considerably.

8386. In 1899 there were only thirteen girls discharged out of a total of 229, which is about 6 per cent.?—The system was not properly working then.

8387. We will take it in a subsequent year. In 1900 you had twenty-one discharged out of 328?—Yes.

8388. That is a little less than 7 per cent. discharged?—Yes.

8389. You have thirteen discharged out of 145 in 1905, or very nearly 10 per cent.?—Quite so.

8390. So that really your proportion of discharges is as great as, if not greater than, even out of the total number recorded?—That is so, but not to the total number of workpeople. I think the test of the system is not the discharges to the total number of records, but the discharges to the total number of workpeople.

8391. Your total proportion of workpeople has not increased in the same ratio. Comparing 1905 with 1900, your proportion of workpeople has increased by about seven to six, whereas your proportion of discharges has increased by ten to seven?—The discharges in 1900 were 1 per cent. of the total number of workpeople; our discharges in 1905 were ½ per cent. I maintain the test of the system is not the proportion of discharges to offences but the proportion of discharges to the workpeople employed.

8392. I am inclined to agree with you. I was only endeavouring to find out as to how far you agreed with me that with an increased efficiency the number of cautions would be less?—Our standard of requirement is higher now, no doubt.

8393. And therefore, the discharges would really be the most flagrant cases ?—Yes.

8394. And they show an increased percentage because of that ?—Because our standard is higher. Probably those who were discharged last year in certain cases would not have been discharged in 1900.

8395. That is the point I wish to bring out, that the suspensions and the cautions really being a limited number of cases as compared with those under the old system, the number of discharges would show a higher proportion to the total number of punishments ?—Yes.

8396. You said that a higher class of worker came to you ?—Yes.

8397. Would you be also inclined to say that you develop a higher standard of efficiency among the workers who remain with you ?—Yes, because of the various factors we have in operation.

8398. You say in your précis that in case of accident an allowance is made equal to one-half of the wages previously earned, and that this allowance commences from the date of the accident in regard to men and boys ?—Yes, and girls: the amount in accordance with Act to all employees, and in addition to that, in the majority of cases the worker is paid sick pay as well in a case of accident.

8399. I am speaking of accidents;?—If a worker is absent through accident, not only does he get accident pay, but in the majority of cases he gets sick pay, which is a voluntary payment on our part.

8400. The allowance, therefore, is in addition to what he would receive under the Workmen's Compensation Act. He is entitled after a fortnight to half his wages ?—Yes; but we pay from date of accident, and in addition to that, the men's or women's committee considers the case, and generally an allowance of sick pay is made as well, that being voluntary on our part.

8401. Would that sick allowance really be a very similar amount to what he would receive as compensation under the Act ?—In many cases those earning small wages would practically receive full wages when absent through accident.

8402. In the case of these railway tickets which you obtain from the Midland Railway, does that arrangement apply practically to all your people ?—No; very few use railway tickets.

8403. In those cases where the tickets are obtained for them I suppose they are absolutely necessary to enable the workpeople to travel to and from their work ?—Yes. We made an arrangement with the Midland Railway, and I think it is 1s. 3d. a week into Birmingham, which is about four miles.

8404. There is no forcing a railway ticket upon any of the people ?—No, it is no advantage to us. We get nothing out of it.

By Mr. Maddison.

8405. With regard to dismissals, following upon what Mr. Walsh put to you, it does not appear, having regard to the proportion of dismissals to the total number of offences, that the improvement is due to the increased dismissals as suggested by Sir Frederick Cawley ?—No; we have not an increased number of discharges over what we had previously.

8406. Have you any statistics of the percentage of discharges under the old system ?—Yes; I have statistics of the percentage of discharges under the old system which I have got out for certain years. I have percentages for the years 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895. In 1892 the percentage was 2½ per cent.; in 1893 it was 2½ per cent.; in 1894 it was 2 per cent.; and in 1895 it was 1½ per cent. The highest percentage in the figures you have under the present system is 1 per cent. There were more discharges under the fining system—there was double the percentage of discharges under that.

8407. With regard to suspensions, would you say that in any system where fines and deductions were abolished, suspensions could also be done away with with effect ?—That would mean an increase in the number of discharges. I have a plan; I would have suspensions and dismissals kept in a register for the inspection of the factory inspector, similar to the accident register, if fines were abolished. But this is merely my own personal conclusion on the alternative. Suppose fines and deductions were illegal I would still allow suspensions, I think, and, of course, dismissals, but I would have suspensions and dismissals kept in a register open to the inspection of the factory inspector, giving the cause. That is for the protection of the worker. Otherwise I think the system might be a little severe.

8408. Do I understand that you, as an employer, would allow the factory inspector, or the law, to interfere in the case of a discharge ?—Not necessarily interfere, but I would allow the factory inspector to inspect.

8409. Would you say the same with regard to suspensions ?—Yes; he should inspect the books, and if he thought any case of suspension or dismissal was unreasonable he would say so, and that would have a moral influence. I do not advocate any legal interference at the present moment.

8410. It has been stated to us that suspensions in certain places are of a very savage kind and are really worse than the fine system, and that men prefer fines because the suspensions are savage ?—I can quite understand that point of view.

8411. But you do not think that suspensions could be done away with in case fines and deductions were made illegal ?—I do not think so; I think that would drive employers into more discharges. That is merely theoretical on my part.

8412. Now with regard to deductions, I take it from you that there are no deductions made for bad work, spoilt material, or for anything which happens in the course of your business ?—It is piece work, and we only pay for good work. You understand what I mean ? I will take a case in point, in regard to covering chocolate creams. These are looked over and only the good work is paid for. The bad work is recorded, and would be sold as waste. The piece rates are based upon the output of good work. If they were paid for both good and bad work probably the piece rates would have to be altered, and in the long run the workers would not necessarily be any better off.

8413. You pay a worker for producing a certain article, and if he does not do it he has not executed his contract ?—That is so.

8414. Have you a printing place ?—A very small one. We do not do much printing.

8415. You do not print your own labels ?—No; we do not do much of that. We have a card box department.

8416. Take the case of a time worker in that department who spoils a certain number, so that they cannot be used ?—They are all piece workers there, practically. There would be no deduction, but they would be promptly recorded.

8417. You would not deduct anything for loss of material ?—No; we do not make any deductions of that kind.

8418. One word with regard to bad conduct. You gave us a general idea of what bad conduct meant. Under any circumstances would bad conduct include girls singing at their work ?—Yes, if it disturbed the room. They either sing together, which we allow in some rooms, or not at all. One looks upon the question as one of benefit to the whole room. We would not allow one girl to be a nuisance to the whole department.

8419. Take the question of girls talking: I suppose if many girls were talking, that would be regarded as a nuisance ?—We allow talking, but we do not allow loud talking to the disturbance of all, making a sort of pandemonium of the room. We expect them to behave as ladies.

8420. Casting your mind back to the beginning, when you were a small firm, could you with confidence say that you could have done without fines and deductions from the start, and that the fact that you can do so now is not dependent upon your great position ?—I do not think our economic position makes any difference with regard to the question of fines and deductions.

8421. You have told us what you do with regard to those who join your pension fund; suppose a man after he has been with you a little time, wants to leave the pension fund, could he do so ?—Yes. He gets his contribution back, with 2½ per cent. interest. He also gets it back if we dismiss him.

8422. He gets all his money back ?—Yes; on dismissal, or resignation, he gets his own money back with

Mr. E. Cadbury.

21 Feb. 1907.

2½ per cent. interest, and our contribution goes to the benefit of the general fund.

By Mr. Yarrow.

8423. Do I understand that there is a book kept in which the various complaints against your people are entered, and then they are brought to you ?—Yes. They are kept on cards at the present time.

8424. When you abandoned the fines it appears to me that two things happened ; one was the abandonment of the fines and the other was bringing the person who did not behave well before you ?—Quite so.

8425. As there are two things which deter them from misconduct, I wonder what proportion is due to the abandonment of the fines and what proportion is due to being brought before you. I should have thought that being brought before you was a very serious thing, and that that in itself might have operated, quite independently of the doing away with the fines ?—Yes ; it was meant to be serious.

8426. I do not know whether it is quite right to put the credit to the abandonment of the fines. I should have thought the workpeople would consider that they were being properly treated and that it was a serious matter to be brought before you, and that that would have had the effect of lessening misconduct. I should not have thought that the abandonment of the fines should have all the credit. What do you think ?—There are many factors to take into account, I quite agree. But the broad line which I have tried to indicate is this : that one system did not eliminate the habitual offender, and the other one does.

8427. The two things happened at the same time. Of course suspension is a form of fine, is it not ?—It is, but it is not a deduction, because it is not as if we required a girl to be at business while she is suspended ; she is at her home and her time is entirely at her own disposal during her suspension.

8428. Are none of your people discharged without coming before you ?—No, we do not allow it. We undertake that. We think it is fairer.

8429. With regard to piece work, you pay only for the good work which is done ?—Yes.

8430. That is almost a form of fine, is it not ?—It depends. As I tried to point out, if we paid for all the work which was done, good and bad, the piece rate would be slightly lower. Suppose 1s. per gross, 144 lbs., be the piece rate for good work. If we paid for bad work also, and had, say, 10 per cent. of bad work (which we do not, but I give it for the sake of illustration) there would be between 120 and 130 lbs. good work, and in order to make it the same price to us we should have to make the rate perhaps 11½d. per gross all round.

By Mr. Walsh.

8431. I would like to ask this upon that point. In fixing the piece rates, the workmen and yourself are brought into contact ?—To some extent. We fix our piece rate on the average. To my mind the fair basis of the piece rate is to fix it on the standard wage, not on the fastest. We do not fix our piece rate on the output of the fastest, but of the average.

8432. You fix it upon the assumption that there will be a certain average amount of bad work ?—Yes, on the assumption that there will be a certain average amount of bad work.

8433. On the assumption that, their skill and efficiency being what it is, there will be that amount of bad work ?—Yes ; we keep a record of the bad work.

8434. Are your workpeople allowed a voice in the determination of the piece rate ?—No ; they are not allowed a voice in it. I do not quite know in what way we could do that. They are allowed to appeal from the rate, if that is what you mean. Suppose we fix a piece rate, and it is not thought to be a fair one, we have a suggestion scheme, and they can put their complaint into the suggestion box, and it will come up before the Works Committee the following week, and will be considered.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8435. I have not understood quite clearly about the piece-work rate. Take a concrete case. You fix the rate of a set of perhaps six people ?—As far as possible our rates are individual, but in some cases they are for gangs, and then they share it.

8436. We will say it is individual. The price is according to weight, so much a pound ?—Yes, so much a gross.

8437. So much for 144 lbs. ?—Yes.

8438. Suppose an individual does bad work and spoils say 10 per cent. of the stuff, what do you do ?—Suppose the individual makes 144 lbs. and spoils 10 per cent., he would be, roughly speaking, paid on 130 lbs. He is paid on the good work.

8439. You only pay on the good work ?—Yes.

8440. I understood you to say it was reckoned in the piece-work rate ?—Yes, it is in a way ; at the outset, in fixing the rate, it is reckoned in. In fixing the rate we based it on the output of good work, and not on the total output of work. Suppose there was an average of 10 per cent. waste in a certain article and the rate was on 144 lbs., the rate would be practically fixed upon 130 lbs. ; it is fixed on the good output.

By Mr. Maddison.

8441. That would be only fair to the good worker ?—It would give the good worker the advantage.

By Mr. Walsh.

8442. That standard of payment is really a benefit to the good worker ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

8443. If you paid for good and bad work the rate would be less ?—Yes. Under our system the bad worker suffers.

8444. And under the other system the good worker would suffer ?—Yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8445. I wish to be sure that I understand it. I have had some experience of piece-work, and I know it is difficult to understand. I take it the explanation is this, that you know a certain amount of bad work will be turned out ?—Yes. We know the output of good work, and we base our piece rate on the average output of good work. You understand we do not choose the fastest worker and base our piece rate upon that, but upon the average output of good work.

8446. I understand that so far, but if any hand is not an average good hand, and does bad work to a greater percentage than you have allowed for, they are really fined for not coming up to the standard ?—Undoubtedly they suffer in comparison with the good worker. I do not think it can be said that they are fined.

8447. They are not paid for the bad work they have done ?—That is so. It gives the good worker the benefit of his care and efficiency, really. I think it is a perfectly fair system.

8448. And it penalises the bad worker ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

8449. It does not penalise him, but he is not paid for that bad work ?—That is so.

By the Chairman.

8450. We propose to put the letter which you are going to send to us in an appendix to your evidence along with the tables in your précis. In that letter, will you kindly include those three things which have been referred to ?—Yes.

8451. You will give us any details with regard to pensions which you think would be to our advantage to know ? At present we are quite in the dark as to pensions ?—Yes.*

8452. In the second place, will you oblige the Committee by giving us the schedule of fines which were formerly imposed, the amounts, and the kind of things they were for ? That would make your evidence more luminous upon that point ?—Yes.

8453. Then for my own part it would be an obligement to me if you would consider whether you could not also give us the amount of the continuation class fees paid by your students, in the hope that when you see how small it is you may think it right to abolish those fees altogether ?—I will send you information with regard to the amount.

By Mr. Maddison.

8454. May I ask this one question, which appears to me to be rather important. How does this system which we have been talking about in reference to piece rates apply, if at all, to any time work which is done on task work, if you have any ? I mean a case where a man is paid so much, but is expected to do so much ?—We have not that system ; we have not the task work system.

THIRTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 27th February, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. JAMES WASLEY, called; and Examined.

Mr. J. Wasley.

27 Feb. 1907.

By the Chairman.

8455. You are, I understand, Deputy Chief Constable of Worcestershire ?—I am.

8456. And I understand that in that county there are two districts, viz.: (1) the manufacturing district, which is chiefly to be found in the central and northern parts of the county; and (2) the agricultural district, which is chiefly confined to the southern part of the county ?—That is so.

8457. And your evidence with reference to the Truck Act bears more especially upon the agricultural districts ?—Yes.

8458. I believe the chief constable recently called upon each superintendent in the county to furnish him with a few particulars bearing upon this Act ?—He did.

8459. And does the result enable you to testify that there have been no proceedings taken within the last ten years ?—None, with the exception of my own proceedings in the Worcester Division.

8460. Please give us details about your own proceedings. Am I right in saying that the first case is dated April 16th, 1901, when proceedings were taken against Mr. David Harvey Smith, farmer, Wichenford, who was fined 40s., and costs to the amount of 14s. 6d. ?—Yes.

8461. Kindly tell us what was his delinquency and how you proceeded against him ?—In that case David Holmes was proceeded against by his late master, Mr. Powell, for leaving his employment as a labourer without completing his work. The defendant was sued before the justices and in the course of examination it was elicited from him that he had obtained employment elsewhere and was receiving 2s. less than with Mr. Powell, viz., 11s. per week and two quarts of cider per day. That was in his verbal agreement. A hint was given to me that it seemed a case of which I should take notice. I obtained evidence as to the cider being supplied to him, and when the case came before the justices there was a conviction and a fine of £2 with costs.

8462. Under what section did you proceed ?—I have handed in a copy of the information.

8463. Was there no appeal ?—No, none.

8464. The next case appears to have been on July 9th, 1901, where Mrs. Elizabeth Jones, farmer, Grimley, was fined £5, and costs amounting to £2 18s. 7d.?—In that case William Cooper, a waggoner, had his attention drawn to an advertisement in the newspaper. He saw the defendant's son, David Jones, and agreed with him that although the advertisement had said 16s. per week he would take 14s. per week with three qu rts of cider a day. That was in the verbal contract. A time came when the employer did not supply the cider, whereupon the man left the employment and sued Mrs. Jones for the value of the cider that should have been supplied, as well as for a portion of his wages. When the facts came out in Court I took proceedings against Mrs. Jones under the Truck Act, and, as already stated, she was fined £5 and costs. In that instance they applied for a case to be stated for appeal, and the documents were prepared, but apparently the appeal was not proceeded with and the conviction stood.

8465. The next case appears to be on September 12th, 1905 ?—Yes, that is so.

8466. What was its result ?—A farmer named Robert Jackson was fined 20s. and costs.

8467. What were the circumstances ?—In that case a labourer agreed with Mr. Jackson to cut 2½ acres of wheat at 15s. per acre and five quarts of cider for each man. A dispute arose as to the supply of the cider and eventually the case came into court. That is how I obtained information of the circumstances.

8468. The cutting of an acre might be done by the labourer with assistance ?—Yes, he had assistance.

8469. That would probably account for the five quarts ?—It was five quarts for each man for the job, and there were two or three men.

8470. Five quarts per day ?—Yes.

8471. A conviction was obtained ?—Yes.

8472. These cases seem to be very plain and, if I may say so, rather gross, but they are very few in number. Can you explain that ?—I know of no other division where any prosecutions have taken place. It is very difficult to get the necessary information, unless cases come into court, and evidence has been given which discloses the facts. There are undoubtedly many similar contracts between employers and employed about which we know nothing. There is an understanding when a certain amount of drink is to be supplied.

8473. Is the average wage of a labourer in that part of Worcestershire from 12s. to 15s. per week ?—That is so.

8474. Is a cottage provided for the labourer ?—In many cases a cottage is provided, and I don't think many men get more than 15s. per week. It must be a good man who can get 15s. a week and also a cottage.

8475. But in addition you say that a practice prevails amongst the farmers of giving cider and beer ?—There is no doubt about that.

8476. Is that given during busy seasons ?—Yes, very commonly. There is an understanding between the farmers and the labourers that the latter can have some drink, and if not a specified quantity the workman gets it when he wants it.

8477. Supposing the supply of cider were knocked off, would the labourer in your opinion have a just cause for considering that his bargain was broken ?—I really think, conscientiously speaking, that if all supply of drink was taken away from the labourer, farmers would often have great difficulty in finding sufficient labour. Good men get into the towns as soon as they can, because they have there a better chance of finding employment for their children or giving them a better education or earning more money. It is, in many cases, the drop of drink they get in the country that keeps labourers with the farmer.

8478. Do you know any cases where there is system of what I may call abstinence from giving cider ?—Yes, there are some cases in which the farmers give no cider at all.

8479. How do the wages stand in those cases ?—I don t think the labourers get more than 2s. 6d. per day in any case.

Mr. J. Wasley.

27 Feb. 1907.

8480. Cider or no cider ?—Yes. Where a labourer is a good man, the farmer is generally willing to give him a drop of cider, in fact, one of my constables told me a few days ago that he knew of two places where the men had a key and went to fetch the cider as they wanted it.

8481. You have quoted one case where a man sued not only for his balance of wages, but also for his balance of cider, so to speak ?—Yes.

8482. Did he get any decree or judgment in consideration of the cider ?—I do not think so.

8483. Can you tell us the date of these legal proceedings? —William Cooper summoned Elizabeth Jones under the Employers and Workmen's Act for wages. I think the amount was, in the end, considered as wages, although 6s. 8d. was mentioned for cider. That case was heard on June 11th, 1901.

8484. I rather think you were wrong about the appeal. That case seems to have been appealed ?—There was notice of appeal, but I was unable to trace that it was proceeded with.

8485. We have information here of a case "Jones v. Wasley," reported in March, 1902, where a workman was engaged under an agreement in writing at a fixed rate of wages, but a verbal agreement was entered into at the same time under which the justices found that the workman was to be supplied with a certain quantity of cider in part payment of wages. I believe that is the very case to which you refer. It was held that the justices were entitled to receive evidence of the verbal agreement and to find that an offence had been committed ?—Yes.

8486. So that in all these cases when cider has been given it has been given not under a written agreement, or as food, or anything of that kind, but by a private verbal arrangement between the parties ?—Yes. In the case of Jones there was said to be some agreement, but it could not be found although they were called upon to produce it.

8487. Is it your opinion that the giving of cider is still a prevailing practice ?—No doubt it is commonly done, but I don't think so much cider is given as was the case some years ago.

8488. How much cider would an ordinary Worcestershire labourer get ? Would it be a couple of quarts ?—Yes, that would be about the allowance.

8489. What is the value of that, supposing he had to pay for it ?—About 4d.—not more.

8490. About 2d. per quart ?—Yes, you can buy it at 6d. or 8d. per gallon.

8491. Suppose it is 2d. per quart, and two quarts are given on six days, that would mean 2s. ?—Yes.

8492. Do you know any cases where there is no cider given but a little extra in wages instead of it ?—I cannot say that I do.

8493. I believe that in 1892 a notice was issued by your county authorities calling the attention of farmers and agriculturists to the provisions of the Truck Act ?—Yes.

8494. Do you think these provisions are understood throughout the county ?—Yes, I think they generally are.

8495. Nevertheless, you think that there are contraventions going on ?—No doubt, indirectly.

8496. I understand that in 1893 the clerk of your County Council (Mr. Thornley), conducted a prosecution for the county against John Henry Crane for an infringement of the Truck Act ?—Yes.

8497. That was a case tried under the name of Long v. Crane in the Queen's Bench Division on June 9th, 1893, and numbered I. in the list of decisions upon the separate paper prepared for the use of this Committee ?—Yes.

8498. In that case the decision was that the cider was a free gift, and so there was no offence ?—Yes.

8499. Is that exactly where your difficulty comes in, that, according to the habits of the people, it seems that they prefer a small wage plus cider ?—Yes.

8500. Cider being the inducement in many cases that leads them to remain in the country ?—Yes.

8501. If the workers did not get the cider they would get only the same small wages, therefore the transaction is considered as a gift of cider instead of as a contract for cider ?—Yes; they will usually go where they can get the cider, if possible. I heard the other day of a farmer employing many labourers who said, "If I pay a man 2s. 6d. a day without cider and another farmer offers him 2s. 3d. with two quarts of cider, he will go where he can get the cider."

8502. Does that habit, do you think, conduce to better labour or to worse labour ?—I really think that a good man does more work if he gets a little cider, especially at harvest and hay making times. There are, however, some men who will go simply for the drink they can get; that is all they care for; but I think a good honest labourer does benefit from a small allowance of cider.

8503. How are they fed ?—They generally keep themselves.

8504. Is there no allowance of oatmeal, such as we have heard of in some other parts of the country ?—Yes, I know of one case, and have heard of other farmers giving oatmeal, and no intoxicants. They get whatever oatmeal water they like to drink.

8505. Is that done in your part of the country ?—Yes.

8506. There is no cider given in such cases ?—There are no intoxicants on the farm.

8507. How are the labourers paid in that case ?—Not more than 15s. per week.

8508. Is there a bargain made for the oatmeal in such cases ?—No, I think not. The farmer simply provides it.

8509. You are speaking of the meal and water potation used on harvest days ?—Yes, that is so.

8510. Suppose a labourer drinks a quart of cider and goes on with his work, is he in any degree under the influence of intoxicants ?—Some cider is very strong, indeed; but the men do not often drink a whole quart at a time whilst at work. I have seen them scores of times drink a comparatively little at a time from a horn and return to it from time to time whilst at work.

8511. Do you see any way of abolishing that system; but first let me ask whether you think it would be a proper thing to have the system done away with ?—I think that, if it were abolished, the farmers might have difficulty in getting their harvest work and hay making and such work done. I do not say that intoxicating liquor does the workers the slightest good, the quality in many cases being poor; but many men think it does; and some difficulty would probably arise if it was not given.

8512. About what age are the young people put to agricultural work—say in the harvest field ?—I do not think the farmers would usually engage boys under fifteen or sixteen years old.

8513. And girls ?—Very few girls.

8514. Are the boys also given cider ?—Yes; in the case of Smith, the evidence showed that the boy had cider.

8515. Was that a case where two quarts a day were given ?—Yes—the case of Mrs. Jones. See the evidence of John Cooper, son of Mr. Cooper. He said, "I used to have a quart of cider."

8516. One quart ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8517. Do you think if the wages were higher in proportion to the extent of the value of the cider, that the farmers would then have difficulty in getting labour ?—If that could be carried out generally it would probably suffice; but at present it is an open question; some men get cider and some do not.

8518. I understand that those who do not don't give the equivalent in money, so that if one farmer gives 13s. per week with cider and another offers 13s. per week without cider, the labourer naturally prefers the former ?—Some farmers might give a trifle more in wages if cider had not to be taken into consideration.

8519. You spoke of a farmer who paid 2s. 6d. per day without cider and contrasted his chances of getting labour with that of a farmer who gave 2s. 3d. per day and two quarts of cider. The latter farmer is giving the equivalent of 2s. 7d. per day, or 1d. per day more than the other man, so that naturally his chances among men who like cider would be better than those of the other man ?—Yes.

8520. If he offered 2s. 7d. per day in cash, do you think his chances would still be less good than those of the man who gave 2s. 3d. in money and also cider ?—Yes, in most instances.

8521. That is contrary to the experience of those who engage domestic servants, as most men and women servants prefer beer money to beer ?—If the practice could be made general, perhaps it would work out all right, but at present most labourers seem to prefer to go where they can get the drink.

8522. Do you think that if there was a general rule, it could be made to work ?—Yes.

8523. There would be no reason, if a labourer received the money value of the drink, why he should not buy his own cider ?—No ; in many case they do so. The farmer sometimes sells cider to his labourers, when it is not given to them ; but in every such case I think it should be immediately removed from the farmer's premises. I think that in some cases the farmers sell more than 4½ gallons.

8524. In the case you quoted in which 5 quarts was the cider allowance, were the 5 quarts consumed by men during their work or did they take it home ?—I could not say. A man might take some of it home.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8525. Is it a practice to take the cider home ?—I don't know of cases. If the purchasers were required at once to remove whatever cider they bought, they would not have the opportunity to drink so much.

8526. No smaller quantity than 4½ gallons can be sold ?—That is so.

8527. If the farmer sells smaller quantities he is infringing the law ?—Yes ; we should proceed against him.

8528. He does so sometimes, I presume, without being found out ?—I think it is done more with the 4½ gallons. It is stored upon the premises and they fetch it from the premises.

8529. The 2 or 3 quarts a day that a man would drink in the ordinary way when working would not have any effect in the way of intoxicating him ?—I do not think it would. I do not think that in the case of a man working all day, 2 quarts would make him intoxicated ; in fact we have a decrease in drunkenness.

8530. A man goes to a farmer and the farmer tells him he is going to give him so much wages, and the labourer knows that would include so much cider. I suppose in nine cases out of ten the wage offered includes a certain amount of cider ?—Indirectly it does, in many instances.

8531. I do not mean indirectly, but when a man is being engaged, in nine cases out of ten the offer of so much wages really means so much cider as well, and the labourer perhaps says, "How much cider will you give me ?"—It is an understood thing, there is no doubt.

8532. Unless it is specified that no cider is included, the wage includes cider ?—That is so.

8533. With all the farmers ?—There is no doubt of it.

8534. And that extends into Herefordshire as well ?—Undoubtedly.

8535. I wanted to ask you a question with regard to wages : the average wage is about 12s. a week ?—About 12s. or 13s., I think 13s. would be nearer than anything else.

8536. Which includes 2 or 3 quarts of cider per day ?—Yes, in some cases ; I do not say they get it in all cases.

8537. Take a man earning as low wages as 12s. to 13s. a week : would not that wage in the great majority of cases include so much cider ?—It would be an understood thing that he would have some drink ; there is no doubt about that.

8538. Does that include a cottage ?—The 13s. a week may include a cottage. The cottage would be worth about 1s. or 1s. 6d. per week.

8539. Supposing it included a cottage, I presume that if the man loses the situation he immediately loses his cottage ?—That is so ; he has to turn out of his cottage.

8540. Immediately ?—As soon as possible. It just depends upon his agreement. I have known lots of cases in which they could not get them out, and have had to get an ejectment order. They can stop twenty-one days afterwards if they like to put the farmer to inconvenience, if there is any friction between them.

8541. Do you think that system of letting cottages to labourers is a good one ?—Well, it is frequently done. I could not tell you whether it is a good system or not.

8542. Would the labourer be better off if he had 1s. 6d. or 2s. a week more without his cottage, and was able to work for whom he liked ?—I think so. Strictly speaking, I think a labourer would be better off if he was paid a certain wage for everything and allowed to spend his own money. That is what I candidly believe in myself, although I am sorry to say it does not exist.

8543. I want to get at exactly what you think the wages of an ordinary Worcestershire labourer are. Suppose you reckon that the cottage is worth 1s. 9d. a week and the cider is worth 2d. per quart : he has two quarts, which is 4d. a day, making 2s. a week, making 3s. 9d. in all ?—Yes.

8544. What would you reckon the usual wage of a Worcestershire labourer to be ?—If he got those allowances I do not think he would get more than 12s.

8545. Then he gets 15s. 9d. ?—With the allowances, yes. Of course in many cases the cottage would not be worth 1s. 6d. a week, perhaps. They are poor cottages, some of them. 1s. 6d. is very low I admit.

8546. That is only £3 18s. a year ?—Well, 1s. 6d., I think, would be a fair average.

8547. That is about it, is it not ?—Yes, that is about it. Of course a waggoner or cowman would get more money than an ordinary labourer.

8548. You are speaking of the ordinary labourer who works on a farm, and not a waggoner or cowman ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

8549. I suppose he would get a little extra for harvest ?—Yes.

8550. I gather from your evidence that you do not know of cases where the wages are higher in consequence of giving the men no cider or beer : I suppose it is chiefly cider, is it not ?—Yes ; it is chiefly cider and they can make it very cheaply. That is why it is given, no doubt.

8551. You do not know of any cases where higher wages are paid where no cider is given ?—I cannot say that I do. I know of one case, but it is only a very small farm, where oatmeal has been given and no cider. I believe the farmer pays them 2s. 6d. a day in that case.

8552. They will not have a cottage in that case, I suppose ?—No, I think not. There would be no cottage included in that.

8553. With your knowledge of farmers would you say they reckon the wages to cover the cost of cider ?—There is no doubt it is an understood thing between them.

8554. Mrs. Tennant asked you whether it was at all the practice to take cider home ?—Yes ; there is no doubt they do take it home, but I do not know of any case.

8555. Of course many of these men would be married ?—Yes.

8556. Obviously if they do not take it home specially, the 2s. a week represented by cider is consumed by the men themselves ?—Yes.

8557. Would you say that that 2s. could be used much better in the home ?—Undoubtedly. If he could be paid his wages in full and allowed to spend his own money, that would be better.

8558. And you do not regard the present system as paying the men in full ?—It is not paying them in full because there is no doubt it is an understood thing that they go for a certain wage and are to have drink. That is the understanding between them.

Mr. J. Wasley.
27 Feb. 1907.

8559. And having regard to the poorness of the wages, if the money which the cider cost was given to the men, the wives could use it to better advantage ?—There is no doubt about that, if it could be made a general thing.

By Sir F. Cawley.

8560. The men work till six o'clock on Saturdays ? They do not have any half-holiday in the week ?—The labourers do not.

8561. They work just the same on Saturday as on other days ?—Yes ; I know of no case where they leave off earlier in the labouring class.

By the Chairman.

8562. What are their hours ?—I think now they are from 7 to 6. When March commences I think they are from 6 to 6.

8563. What meal-hours have they ?—They have half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner. In some very rare cases they may have an hour for breakfast. I do not know whether they allow them any short time in the afternoon about half-past four. I know in hay season and harvest time, they do have a short time then.

Mr. ARTHUR JOHN DAVIS, called ; and Examined.

Mr. A. J. Davis.
27 Feb. 1907.

By the Chairman.

8564. You are a farmer and you live at the Snead, Pensax, Worcestershire ?—Yes.

8565. You have been engaged in agriculture in Worcestershire and elsewhere for upwards of thirty years ?—I have.

8566. I see your précis is dated from the Worcestershire Farmers' Association ?—Yes.

8567. Will you explain to me what that organisation is ?—It is an association which was formed some five or six years ago for the purpose of dealing with this very question. There was a very large meeting at Worcester to protest against the decision arrived at by certain magistrates in the county. The association was found to do good and it now comprises several hundred farmers in the county.

8568. You say it was formed for the purpose of dealing with a particular question ; what particular question do you allude to ?—There had been a prosecution in the county in which a farmer had been summoned for a breach of the Truck Act, which was felt to be such a hardship that this organisation was formed to protest against it.

8569. To protest against the decision ?—Yes.

8570. Then you say that ever since the passing of the Truck Amendment Act 1887 there has been considerable doubt as to the meaning of the provision of Section 4 ?—Yes.

8571. Now I call your attention to Section 4 : "That nothing in the Truck Act or this Act shall render illegal a contract with a servant in husbandry for giving him food, drink not being intoxicating, a cottage, or other allowance or privileges in addition to money wages as a remuneration for his services." That is the section to which you refer ?—Yes. May I inform you how the matter worked ?

8572. Yes ; we should be every glad to hear it ?—Previously to the passing of the Truck Amendment Act it was usual for farmers in making a contract to agree to give so much wages and so many quarts of cider per day. Although the farmers resented the passing of the Act they are now all in favour of it, although the Truck Amendment Act made it illegal to make a contract of that kind. We say now that we claim the right, having undertaken to give 15s. or 16s. per week to a man, to make a free gift of cider to him if we think fit. This case rather arose by a large landowner having converted all his apple trees into potting fruit. He had some difficulty with his men. He got the police to issue a summons, and got a conviction. We ask that it shall not be made illegal for a free gift of cider to be made.

8573. Let us see that we understand each other. In the first place, in the legal proceedings to which you have referred, cider has been taken as being under the category of an intoxicating drink ?—Yes.

8574. I suppose there is no doubt that in practice you did give this intoxicating drink to your labourers ?—Up to the passing of the Act. He demanded it by right of his agreement.

8575. Since the passing of the Act, what difference has been made ?—We now give them it or stop it just as we like.

8576. Did the passing of the Act make any alteration in the wages of the labourers ?—Undoubtedly.

8577. In what way ?—There is a higher level of wages. I would not say that took place immediately, but wages have gradually increased ever since.

8578. I must put it quite frankly to you. What you were in the habit of regularly giving to the labourer cost so much ?—Yes.

8579. When you were prevented by law from giving that did you increase the wages ?—The wages increased, not perhaps just immediately, but they certainly increased.

8580. Can you give us the figures ?—They have increased about 2s. per week.

8581. The wages increased ; roughly speaking, do you attribute that to the fact that there is now no contract to give cider ?—Yes, undoubtedly.

8582. What we are anxious to know is what the system is now ; do you still give them cider ?—We give them cider occasionally. We do not give it to them regularly. In the winter months we hardly ever give cider.

8583. What is the practice in the summer months ?—In the summer months we give it to them whenever we are hauling—whenever we are doing extra work we give cider.

8584. What is the allowance you give per day ?—We make no regular allowance. We much prefer to be able to make a gift of cider than that they should have to go to the publichouse to obtain drink.

8585. Evidence has been given before us—we will take the hot weather so as to be on common ground—that the labourer gets 2 quarts a day ?—We never give any regular quantity.

8586. Can you give the Committee any idea of what the actual quantity is on an average, taking a full-grown labourer engaged on a hot day on a full day's work ?—If he were working a long day he would get perhaps from 2 to 3 quarts.

8587. Does he expect that ?—I should think he did. In a district where cider is given he knows perfectly well that he must have it as a gift or else he must provide some himself.

8588. He knows his wages ?—Yes.

8589. And he knows that he will not have to buy his cider out of his wages because according to the custom of the country he will get it given to him ?—Yes.

8590. So that although you have not any express bargain there is an understanding which you both act up to ?—Yes, I think that is so. It is a custom that is understood.

8591. Suppose a farmer was suddenly to announce to his labourers "No cider," what would happen ?—I think things would go on because we frequently do say so when we have had a short year of apples—this last summer, for instance.

8592. Take the case I am putting to you where a man has been working a long hot day and gets, according to your evidence, from 2 to 3 quarts ; suppose men in that position engaged in that occupation suddenly had the announcement made to them "No cider ?"—I do not think there would be any difficulty.

8593. You think they would just accept that ?—Yes.

8594. I may tell you we have great difficulty in taking that from you. It appears to us that you might address yourself to the question whether there would not be great dissatisfaction ?—They might grumble, but they would not get any more money. I think it would pass away with grumbling. I think grumbling would be all.

8595. May we take it from you as your evidence that you get labour as easily without cider as with it?—Certainly. I have had the management of labour where we have given none and I have never had a difficulty.

8596. If the law stepped in to prohibit this kind of transaction or understanding being acted up to you think that no harm would result?—I think not.

8597. Are you in favour of its being prohibited?—Certainly not, not as a gift. I am not in favour of any contract being made by which the men can legally demand anything, but while I may give a passer-by a cup of cider I am strongly against being prevented from giving my own workmen one.

8598. I want to get your reasons. Do you think it produces better work to give them cider?—I think my chief reason would be this, that you have control. The men will have some refreshment, and if you do not give it to them they will simply go to the public-houses and get it.

8599. Take the case of a man expecting his cider, accustomed to get it, doing work in circumstances where he was wont to get it, and you refused it, the result would be he would have to buy it at his own expense?—He would have to buy it at his own expense, certainly.

8600. That would be a reduction of his wages?—He would reduce them.

8601. Do you tell us that that would be accepted with satisfaction by the workmen, that they had to pay out of their wages for supplying themselves with what they expected to get free according to the custom of the country?—I do not quite follow you. I frequently stop it myself if I am not satisfied with their work.

8602. What we are striving to get at is your view as to stopping it. If he goes with his own money and buys it he is entirely at his own liberty?—Yes; and if he wants more than you like to give him he has liberty.

8603. Yes, but if there is a general understanding such as you refer to then of course that general understanding is substantially to all intents and purposes an addition to his wages?—I cannot quite accept it as that, because when I engage to give a man 15s. a week and no mention is made of any cider being given to him, and he cannot demand it as a right, I do not see that because I choose to give him a little as an incentive to work hard, or do his work well he can claim extra wages in lieu of the cider if I do not give it.

8604. Apart from anything being said you admit there is an understanding and a custom; you have admitted that?—Yes.

8605. And you act upon that fair understanding and he acts upon it. Now if that understanding is broken I gather from you that he gets the cider, which he understood he was to get from you, at his own expense elsewhere?—Yes; he would be sure to provide himself with some.

8606. Then he does that at his own cost?—He does that at his own cost.

8607. The result is that when the understanding is broken (you may call it a free gift; I quite understand your position) and your free gift ceases, the man's wages are reduced by his having to disburse sums for the purchase of cider?—They are not reduced by his employer.

8608. There is less going into his home?—Yes, that would follow.

8609. That is on the one hand. On the other hand, do I gather from you that you do not think that the cessation of the practice of giving cider would affect the supply of labour?—I do not think so myself.

8610. If he had to supply cider at his own cost, there is of course the probability that he might not spend so much in drink?—In some cases in our own district there are gentlemen who do not give any cider, but sell it to their men. We find that very objectionable.

8611. Will you explain that?—You can only sell it in quantities of 4½ gallons to him, and when he gets the 4½ gallons you have no control of it. I have known cases where they have simply sat down and drunk the whole lot. On the other hand, when we give cider we have absolute control over it.

8612. I see that. I believe that in some instances the magistrates have not convicted the farmer when they were satisfied that the cider was produced on his own farm and was not a condition of the contract of service affecting the employee's wages?—That is so.

8613. Then you say on the other hand when any dispute has arisen, labourers have sometimes persuaded the magistrates that they were entitled to a certain quantity of cider as part of their wages?—Yes.

8614. That is your way of putting the fact that the magistrates have so found, I suppose?—There have been a few isolated cases where a man, in order to spite his master after being discharged, has gone and sworn to the police that it was part and parcel of the wage, for the sole purpose of getting his master convicted.

8615. And the magistrates, after hearing the evidence on both sides, have convicted?—Yes.

8616. The evidence of the men was that in all the circumstances they considered that it was part of their wages?—They have sworn so.

8617. And the evidence has been found by the magistrate to be such that he could proceed upon it?—Yes. I have no doubt there are some isolated cases, and we have no objection whatever to prosecution taking place where that is so.

8618. Such cases as what?—As making a bargain with a man. We want to do away with that practice, which we strongly object to.

8619. I should like to be clear about this. You think it is wrong to have a bargain about it?—We are against the whole idea of there being any competition. I have known cases, and could give you one in point, where farmers have been scarce of hands for mowing, say; one farmer had been giving a gallon of cider, as he could legally do before the Act was passed, and 5s. per acre. The next farmer, in order to get the men, would give perhaps two gallons of cider, and I have known cases where three gallons have been given on purpose to get the men. We say that is wrong. We very much disapprove of it. We much prefer to have a money bargain and undertake to give so much for the job, and then if we choose to give cider afterwards we want the right to give it.

8620. You put me in a difficulty, because I gather that you are very strongly against a bargain which should include cider?—Yes.

8621. But you do not seem to be at all against an understanding by which both parties know that cider is going to be obtained?—In a cider district they know that some cider will be given; we cannot get over that fact.

8622. You are further of opinion that if the custom were prohibited a farmer who has less expenditure on his farm would not give his labourer any more wages?—Certainly not, because we have several cases where farmers do not give cider now, and the wages are the same.

8623. Do they get labourers?—Yes, they get labourers.

8624. With as much ease as where cider is given?—They say so.

8625. Have you any reason to doubt that?—I have not. I think a very strong thing to show there is no disability with regard to men is the way the workmen's wives themselves treat the matter; they are all in favour of their men having cider. I think that is a very strong argument. They much prefer that they should have cider than that they should have to go to the public house.

8626. You think their habits are such that they would be driven to the public houses? That is quite a fair thing to put to us?—Undoubtedly. I live just near a large estate on which there is a public house. The men on going home from their haymaking invariably all go into that public house. Our own men stop away. You can understand that in the case of agricultural labourers getting about 15s. a week it is a very serious thing for them to go into a public house six or seven nights a week.

8627. You think it keeps them out of the public house if they are well filled up on the farm?—If you like to put it that way. During a period of some years not a single case of drunkenness was brought against any bona fide agricultural labourer in my own petty sessional di ision.

Mr. A. J. Davis.
27 Feb. 1907.

8628. I see you make some rather important suggestions. Under Section 9 of the Truck Act, 1896, there is power given to the Secretary of State to exempt from the provisions of the Act ?—Yes.

8629. I understand you have certain suggestions to offer to the Committee. Will you please gi.. them in your own words ?—The gift of cider and perry by farmers to their workmen is a very harmless custom, and it is very desirable that the custom should be exempted altogether from the operation of the Truck Acts, either under the provision of Sec. 9 of the Amendment Act of 1896, or by Parliament, for the reason, in the first place, that the cider is produced on the farm and is made by the farmer and may be regarded in the same light as food and drink mentioned in Sec. 4.

8630. With regard to that I find that Sec. 4 of the Act of 1887 deals with the case of a servant in husbandry, but especially provides that the drink is not to be an intoxicating drink ?—Yes.

8631. Of course you know this drink is intoxicating ?—Yes.

8632. But notwithstanding that, you think that it should be made an exception to the Act ?—Yes, that is what we think.

8633. What is your reason for that ?—For the general convenience of farmers and labourers.

8634. Then you say that it is a custom which has never been abused and which has always tended to cement the relationship between farmers and their labourers ?—I think I should like to put a point in regard to that. I do not see how it is possible to stop a man from making free gifts, but suppose it was possible to pass a law that one could not give the labourers cider, it would work very hard on the small employer of labour, because he may have some difficulty in getting his labour. A large farmer, who employs twenty or thirty men, in all probability sells cider to his men, but with the small employer of labour it would be very difficult.

8635. Unless he provides what some people would call an attraction and other people would call a temptation ?—Yes. On that point there is another thing which I should like to mention. In all cider districts there is a large quantity of cider produced which has no commercial value, cider that one could not put upon the market for sale. What is being done now by the majority of farmers is this : they sell all their best cider, and this cider which they give to the labourers is a good healthy drink, and enjoyed by cider drinkers, but it is one which the outside public would not touch. In the case of a large employer of labour in my district he was at one time against the giving of cider, and he had to put several hundred gallons of this cider down his drains, while the men were going into public houses to buy beer. He was so struck with this fact, and with the waste, that he altered his views and has given cider since.

8636. Then you say that labourers have been known to refuse to work for an employer who has felt himself obliged to refuse to give cider lest he should be prosecuted by the police. It is a substantial part of the inducement, in addition to wages ?—Yes. The wage for carters is 15s. a week. I think a man would prefer to go to the farmer who would give him a drop of cider.

8637. By a drop you mean on the average a couple of quarts or so ?—Yes.

8638. Can you tell me the cost of that cider to the farmer ?—Of course it would depend altogether upon the season. I buy fruit myself, and I have bought it as low as 1s. a bag. For 6s. you can make 100 gallons of cider. It would cost you about 2s. to make. Roughly speaking, in a plentiful year it would be a 1d. a gallon. Of course in a year like the present, when apples are scarce, it would be four or five times as much.

8639. Would the average be something like 2d. a gallon ? —In a plentiful year it would not cost a farmer more than a penny a gallon to make. Six bags of fruit will make 100 gallons of cider, and I have bought them lots of times at 1s. a bag.

8640. It has been represented to us that the worth of the cider is about 2d. a quart ?—Oh no, that is nonsense. Good cider would make to-day wholesale about 6d. a gallon, but the cider which is given to the labourers has no commercial value. I have known many occasions upon which at sales it has not fetched a farthing ; there has been no bid for it.

8641. What would the labourers pay for it if they went to a public house to get it ?—They would pay about 2d. a quart in a public house.

8642. So that to them it has that value ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8643. I gather that the cider which is given to the men has no commercial value to the farmer ?—It might have sometimes. I would not say that all of it would have no commercial value, but the most of it has not. The farmers sell the marketable cider as a rule.

8644. But it has this value to a farmer in his dealings with his men, that it is an attraction ?—Undoubtedly.

8645. Do you think it would cross the labourer's mind if the cider were withdrawn, that he would like a rise in wages to compensate him for that withdrawal ?—Certainly not ; I do not see how he could possibly claim it.

8646. You do not think it would cross his mind ?—I do not think so at all.

8647. Though he would have to face an expenditure from his wages, as the chairman has drawn from you ?—Yes.

8648. Formerly, before the passing of the Act of 1887, was cider given the whole year through ?—The agreement of so much per week was always made with the men, so much in wages and so much cider per day, and then he demanded it as his actual right.

8649. Did he exercise his right in the winter as well as in the summer ?—Oh yes.

8650. And now that you reckon it to be a free gift it is only given in the summer ?—Chiefly in the summer. If my carter wanted a jug of cider he would go to the house and get one, but he very seldom goes in winter time. We should not give him any in a bottle, but he could have a cupful at the house if he wanted it.

8651. Is there any agreement among the members of your association that there shall be no reference to cider when you are hiring a labourer ?—We should be very much afraid of making a bargain to give them cider. We have been asked a great many times by men to give them cider at task work and we have told them that we could never make any bargain, and that if they had any it would be a gift. We never make any bargain with them that they shall have any quantity.

8652. I understand there have been cases in which convictions have been obtained ?—Yes.

8653. And where the labourer has said there has been such a reference ?—Yes, and I have very little doubt there have been cases where the employer has made a bargain. Then he is liable, and it is a very dangerous thing to do.

8654. In those cases has the farmer not been a member of your association ?—No ; I do not think we have had any prosecution. The last we had we made an appeal and the late Secretary of State ruled that we could make a gift of cider under this Act.

8655. You appealed to the Secretary of State ?—Yes. The Chairman of the Worcestershire County Council was asked to obtain the information, and the Secretary of State ruled that we could make a gift of cider, and since then we have had no prosecutions.

8656. Can you give me the date of that ruling ?—I could not give it to you now, but I could let you have it. I think, roughly, it would be about three years ago.

8657. There was one prosecution as late as September, 1905 ?—Was that Mrs. Jones ?

8658. No, later than Mrs. Jones ; that was in 1901. In 1905 it was Mr. Robert Jackson ?—Yes, I remember the case.

8659. That conviction must have been obtained since this ruling to which you refer ?—Yes, that must have been so ; but I did not think there had been one. But I remember this Jackson case. It was a clear case of making a bargain, which we say is wrong. But the case to which I referred, which we felt was a great grievance, was the case of Mrs. Jones. It was that case upon which the Secretary of State ruled. I believe it was the Home Secretary.

8660. Perhaps you will send the Committee the correspondence which passed between you and the Secretary of State ?—Certainly I will.

8661. You say there were some cases in which a farmer was prosecuted, and the magistrates have not convicted; have you any details of those cases ?—No, I have no details of them.

8662. Could you obtain them, and supply them ?—Yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8663. Was your federation got up entirely to meet this difficulty in regard to the cider question ?—It was formed after the prosecution of Mrs. Jones, which was felt to be such a hard case that a large meeting of farmers was held in Worcestershire, and they formed themselves there and then into an organisation, not merely in regard to the cider question, because we deal also with cakes and manures, and things of that kind.

8664. I suppose in every village there are men who would not work unless cider were given ?—There used to be. I do not think that is the case now. For a few years after the passing of this Act there was undoubtedly difficulty; men would come in the busy time and say they must have cider, but I do not think that is at all the case now.

8665. You would not agree that when a man is engaged, and no mention is made of cider at all, it is really understood that he shall have some cider ?—Well, he would know that he would have some in the cider districts; that would be accepted.

8666. And if you did not mean to give the cider it would be more or less taking him under false pretences to say afterwards that you objected to giving cider and did not give cider ?—There are cases in the cider districts where men do not give cider, and labourers who went to work for them would know perfectly well they would not have it. It is well known in the district who gives cider and who does not.

8667. The men who do not give cider are the exceptions, and they are well known, and need not mention it, but I suppose they would mention that they did not give cider ?—Well, we do not get it asked for now.

8668. Do you think that if an ordinary labourer engaged with an ordinary farmer found out after he had gone to work that he did not have any cider given to him, that he would consider it was a grievance if nothing had been mentioned ?—He might grumble, but he would not leave his work.

8669. As a matter of fact, when an ordinary farmer engages an ordinary labourer, whether anything is mentioned or not, it is distinctly understood that cider will be given ?—Yes; he would know the custom of the country.

8670. And really, although it is not mentioned, and the farmers are careful not to mention it, as being part of the wages, it is really part of the contract ?—Well, he knows that cider is given, yes.

8671. You think it would not interfere with the rate of wages if a man did not give cider ?—Undoubtedly not; it does not in actual practice.

8672. Do you say that when a man is publicly known not to give cider at all he can get men as good and for the same wage as a man who does give cider ?—Yes, I think so. If labour was not plentiful I would not like to say that he would, but when labour is plentiful they are forced by force of circumstances.

8673. When there are more men than there is work a man is obliged to go whether he can get cider or not ?—Yes.

8674. But if labour is not very plentiful the man that gives cider gets the labourers and the man that does not give cider does not, unless he pays a little more wages ?—I think we have pretty well an accepted rate of wages and I do not think there is any difference.

8675. I want to get this perfectly clear. If labour was a little scarce do you mean to say that a man who does not give cider could get labourers without giving any more wages ?—The one who gave cider would naturally get the men.

8676. And the other man would have to go without unless he gave more wages ?—Yes, but I do not think they would give more wages. I do not think they take that into consideration.

8677. You admit that wages are governed by supply and demand. When labour is not very plentiful, do you mean to assert that a man who does not give cider could get labourers as well as a man that does give cider without giving more wages ?—That is a case I could hardly answer.

8678. But you know perfectly well ?—I know that in a case of that sort, if a man had the choice of two employers, he would naturally go to the man who gave cider first.

8679. The other man would not have labourers at all ?—Even if the other man offered him more money he would not go to him in the summer time, if it was a cider district.

8680. The other man would not be able to get labourers at all unless he gave more money ? He might not, even if he did give more money, but if he did not he certainly would not be able to get labourers unless there was a plethora of labour—more labour than there was demand ?—You might put it in that way. I think my answer is that there is no doubt that cider would be an inducement, and a man would prefer it to receiving more money at the other place.

8681. With regard to wages, you say you give carters 15s. ?—Yes.

8682. What does an ordinary labourer get ?—He gets about 13s. In most cases there is extra money in the summer, and also a house, and very often firing.

8683. That is the point I want to get at. He gets 13s.; does he get his house ?—He gets his house in most cases. I am speaking of the regular men.

8684. The regular men would get their houses, but in the case of the casual labourer it would depend whether it was summer or winter I suppose ?—Yes. I pay rather an extra rate for casual labour.

8685. An ordinary labourer gets 13s. a week, and a cottage worth 1s. 6d. 2s., or 2s. 6d. ?—They are let at from 2s. to 3s.

8686. Are most of the farms in your district let with two or three cottages included ?—A good many are, yes.

8687. A farm of 250 acres would have two or three cottages ?—They are scarce about us; there are not sufficient cottages on the farms.

8688. Do you think it is a desirable custom that there should be two or three cottages attached to a farm ?—Undoubtedly.

8689. Why ?—I think it is a very great hardship for an agricultural labourer to have to walk a long way to his work.

8690. But independently of that, do you think it is a good system that cottages should be let with the farms ?—I think all farms should have one or two cottages for the stock men in any case. For the others I am not so sure. I think there is more freedom for the men undoubtedly when they do not live in the cottages.

8691. Would you agree that the system lends itself to considerable abuse by a farmer who does not consider his labourers very much ?—Yes; I have a case just at the present moment. I have been asked for advice by a working man in a very hard case. He has been working under the owner of the cottage, and because the cottage was in a very bad condition he sought another place. His employer gave him a good character, but when he had a chance to get another man at once, he turned him out of the cottage.

8692. In other words, if the master and the man have a little dispute the master can say, "Off you go! Out of the cottage you go with your wife and family!" ?—Yes.

8693. And in many cases I may take it that leads to considerable hardship ?—Yes, I think so myself. But on the other hand, with regard to stock men, where it is necessary I do not think farmers, if they have a good man, are so hard-hearted as that.

Mr. A. J. Davis. 27 Feb. 1907.

8694. As the result of your evidence I may take it that you consider that every farm ought to have cottages for the stock-men?—Yes.

8695. But after that you are not quite sure whether the system is a desirable one?—No. I think in other cases a man would have more freedom in choosing his employer if he did not live in his employer's cottage.

By Mr. Maddison.

8696. Taking the year through, what would you estimate the cost to the farmer of the cider he gives?—I should estimate that the average amount of cider that would be given to a man would be about 50 gallons.

8697. In the year?—Yes.

8698. That is a gallon a week?—Yes.

8699. That is 1d. a gallon?—In a year of plenty it would cost him about 1d. a gallon. In a year like the present he would make it for about 3d.

8700. It would not cost him more than 3d. a week?—It certainly would not cost him more than that.

8701. That is to say, taking the average amount given by farmers in your district to their men, it would not cost them more than 3d. per week?—Certainly not.

8702. You have told us that there was a rise in wages after the 1887 Act was passed?—Yes.

8703. And you say now that the wage of the average labourer is 13s. a week?—Yes.

8704. But there would be wages higher than that?—Waggoners' wages were about 13s.; they have risen to about 15s., with the same allowances for harvest. The men had about 12s., with a house.

8705. Under the old system did the cider cost the farmer more?—Yes, it would cost them more, in this way. When the agreement was made with the labourers they demanded a better class of cider, and besides, so much more being drunk in those days, cider was dearer.

8706. As a matter of fact you have given them an inferior kind of cider since it has been a free gift?—Undoubtedly. You see the best is sold off.

8707. Previously, they had cider of a more commercial character?—Yes.

8708. It is clear from your evidence that you are against cider being included in a contract of wages?—Yes, I am not only against it, but I should be very sorry to see the law altered so that there could be any competition between farmers in giving cider, or that the men could claim it as a right.

8709. How many people in your district decline to give cider?—Of bona fide tenant farmers I only know of one.

8710. You only know of one in your district?—Yes.

8711. And all the rest will give cider to the extent of about 3d. a week?—Yes, that is how I estimate it.

8712. I mean a rough estimate?—Yes.

8713. You do not think it would be more than 3d.?—I do not see how it could be.

8714. Supposing a law was passed to prevent what you term, rightly I suppose, a free gift, have you in your mind any idea that the farmer might easily evade it by selling 4½ gallons for ½d.?—Yes, and it is being evaded now in that way, and creating a very great hardship. I know of a case in which a large landowner and farmer sells it each week and stops the money. He sends all the best into the town, and the men grumble very much for having to buy this inferior cider.

8715. You said the wives of the labourers were in favour of the men having a gift of cider?—Yes.

8716. Because it keeps them from the public-house?—Yes.

8717. Would you say the same thing, that the wives are in favour of it, if it amounted, as we have been led to believe it does, to some 2s. per week in cost to the labourers—I believe if it cost 2s. per week they would prefer it. I honestly believe that.

8718. You think the wives would like to have the men's wages reduced by 2s. a week, to be given in the form of cider?—Through the summer months.

8719. So that your evidence, I take it, comes to this, that you are against it being a part of the wage contract in any form whatever, but you regard the cider which is now given as a free gift as an inducement and an attraction to the men?—That is so.

8720. It was put to you by Sir Frederick Cawley that in the case of shortage of labour a man who does not give cider would stand a worse chance than a man who does?—Yes.

8721. But I take it in such a shortage there might be other factors coming in besides the giving of cider; for instance, one man might rush his men a good deal?—Yes.

8722. Even in a cider drinking district there would be other factors in the case of shortage of labour which would operate in the decision of a labourer between two employers?—Yes.

Mr. THOMAS WALKER PARKES called; and Examined.

Mr. T. W. Parkes. 27 Feb. 1907.

By the Chairman.

8723. What is your occupation?—I am a large farmer in Worcestershire.

8724. Do you represent an Association?—No. I was President of the Chamber of Agriculture during the year this Committee was formed, but retired at the end of the year. The office is an annual one. I suppose, as I had been President of the Chamber of Agriculture, it was thought that I was the proper person to represent the farming interest.

8725. And they have deputed you to come here?—Yes. I must apologise to you for one thing. I have been asked on two occasions to supply documentary evidence as to what I was going to say, but declined. My only object in declining was that I thought I might write something quite irrelevant to the information you required and might leave out something that you wanted. I would rather answer any questions which you may have to put to me.

8726. You know the object of this Committee?—Quite so.

8727. It is to inquire into the system of truck and of fines and deductions from wages?—I do not think that the question of fines and deductions applies in my case.

8728. What is the point upon which you wish to testify to us?—I should like to say that I do not think there is any breach of the Truck Act on the part of farmers in my county, and adjoining counties with which I am cognisant, with regard to drink given by them.

8729. Do you mean cider?—It is cider principally in my part of the world. I come from South Worcestershire which is a fruit country. In Northern Worcestershire you would find as a rule that beer is given, but it is cider most particularly in our neighbourhood because it is made on the premises in almost every case.

8730. Your view is that there is no breach of the law?—None whatever.

8731. Now I want to ask you with regard to the practice. Substantially speaking, there is a custom of the country, is there not?—If I may be allowed to say so, cider is given, so far as I know, in several ways. There are people who sell their cider in quantities of not less than 4½ gallons. They think thereby, I suppose, that they are outside the scope of the law.

8732. Do you mean farmers?—Yes; I know a lot of neighbours of my own who do that. That is a practice which I do not hold with at all.

8733. Why?—I do not think that selling drink to men in quantities of 4½ gallons is at all a desirable practice, for more reasons than one. It looks to me on the face of it to be an evasion of the law. Secondly, you place in the hands of a man 4½ gallons of cider at once, and if he has not discretion enough to know how to use it he probably drinks till he makes himself intoxicated. If it is of any service to this Committee, I should like to hand in the form of agreement which I have with all the men whom I employ, and which is largely used by other farmers as well as myself. (Handing in the document.) I give cider, in common with 99 out of every 100, I think.

8734. You started your evidence by saying there were several ways in which cider is given, and you have given us the first way, namely the sale in quantities of not less than 4½ gallons: what is the second way?—The second is by an absolutely free gift, which I come under myself. I will endeavour to prove to you that it is not in lieu of wages. As you will see, in that agreement there is a clause which says that when I covenant with a man to enter my employ I engage him at so much money.

8735. The phrase is: "The servant shall not be entitled to any other payment or allowance of any kind"?—That is so. That is not an agreement which is only used by myself. I should say it is used, not by 50 per cent. of the farmers, but by a large proportion—certainly by the large farmers.

8736. Is it by arrangement that this agreement has been made?—How do you mean by arrangement?

8737. You say this same form is used by a great many other farmers?—I know it for a fact. Why I say so is this, that that is a form which one can buy at a printer's. He does not stock them exclusively for myself, although that was printed for myself because you see my name there. It is such a form as you can get from a printer's, which he stocks in large quantities, so that it must be extensively used or he would not print it in such quantities and stock it.

8738. It seems clear from the terms of this agreement that there is no title to cider?—That is so, I think.

8739. This is an agreement used in a cider country?—Yes.

8740. Where the custom is to give cider?—Yes; I should say it is given by most people.

8741. So that if you had an agreement to give cider it would be just conforming to the custom of the country—I mean supposing it was lawful?—May I put it in this way. Probably the one thing which has made us Worcestershire farmers a bit more careful with regard to our agreements with our men is the fact that for some years this question has been, from a judicial point of view, rather forced upon us by our county authorities like the Standing Joint Committee. If I am not trespassing on your time too much I would like to say that the Standing Joint Committee six or seven years ago rather impressed upon the Chief of Police to try to get convictions and prosecutions against farmers for giving cider. The then Chief of Police, Colonel Carmichael, would not do so; he said he did not believe that there was any breach of the law, and he was perfectly certain from all he knew about farmers that they did not give cider in lieu of wages at all. That caused an open feud between him and Mr. Willis Bund as to this very question. Colonel Carmichael is dead and gone now, and Colonel Walker is the Chief of Police in our county, and I know they have endeavoured to do the same thing with him. I daresay the case to which I am going to refer has been mentioned to you, because Mr. Davis has given evidence, but the case in point was the Jones case, in which a conviction was obtained. Upon that conviction, the association which Mr. Davis represented to-day was formed. That was the birth of the Worcestershire Farmers' Association. I do not know that I am even a member of that Association now, although I have contributed to its funds, but that association was formed for the purpose of taking action on this particular question, and they took the case to the High Court. There was a technicality about the prosecution as to whether the magistrates could convict on hearsay evidence instead of documentary evidence, and the High Court upheld the magistrate's decision with regard to that point, but they quashed the decision in the Jones case. The Judge said that where cider was given as an incentive (I believe the word "incentive" was the one he used) to get a man to do a little more work it was quite legal to do so.

8742. Will you come back to the category with which you started?—I was leading up to it by saying that all these prosecutions have been vexatious to farmers, and it has made some of us go in for this form of agreement so as to cover ourselves against what we might term a vexatious prosecution. That is what I wanted to lead to.

8743. You wanted an agreement which was in all points lawful?—That was it.

8744. Putting it in another way, you wanted an agreement to get round the letter of the law?—That is your way of putting it.

8745. No; I am suggesting that that might be put. At all events, it was in view of those prosecutions that you found it necessary to protect yourself by an expressed agreement?—I give my evidence without fear or favour; I should not like to say that it is the case with everyone, but I think I may safely say that 90 per cent. of the farmers who give cider away at various times of the year and in various quantities would not give one copper more money in the shape of wages if they did not give cider at all. There are no doubt breaches of the law, but I think that applies to a very small percentage. I am perfectly prepared to hand to the Home Office, if they so wish, a statement of the whole of my wages for the last ten years, as a proof of my contention. There are years in which we make no cider, or scarcely any; there are years when we make but a partial quantity; and there are years when we make an abundance, and it appears to me that the amount of cider that a farmer gives is proportionate to the capacity of his cider cellar. I have distributed as little as two or three hogshead of drink amongst my own workpeople in twelve months, and I have distributed nearly twenty hogshead in twelve months, and the wages book will show that the wages have not varied in any one of those years, and that I have not given any more money when I have had but little cider to give. It is entirely discretionary as to the way it is given.

8746. The size of your cider cellar depends upon the apple crop?—Yes.

8747. And the apple crop is a constant factor throughout the whole district?—Yes.

8748. I mean roughly speaking. So that you and your neighbours have a short year or a full year at the same time?—That is so.

8749. Therefore so far as the labour market is concerned, when the men come into that district they find the same conditions with regard to the giving of cider amongst the various farmers; they know the custom of the country being to give cider it will be a short allowance in a short year and a pretty good allowance in a good year?—I do not think that follows. This may be a generally accepted custom, but it does not apply to all. There are plenty of people who do not give cider.

8750. We are anxious to find out about that. What percentage of the farmers would you say do not give cider at all?—I should think that perhaps 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. of the farmers do not give cider at all.

8751. Do they give anything in lieu of it?—Not at all that I know of. The standard wage is about the same with everybody; there is the same price for labour. I think you might say that 25 per cent. do not give cider at all, and perhaps 25 per cent. only give a little, only at occasional times such as harvest time; and probably the remaining 50 per cent. gave cider more or less, if they have got it, all the year round.

8752. Do you find that the giving of cider is an attraction to a place?—I do not know exactly that it is an attraction, but I know you can get more work done. I think that if our constable was asked the question he would bear me out that drunkenness in Worcestershire is on the decrease. I am very pleased at that, and hope it will continue to decrease. But there is a certain time of the year when a certain class of workmen must have something to drink of some sort. I do not say that it is exactly an attraction to give them cider, but I am satisfied of one thing, that if you were to go down into the harvest field at the busy time and offer them a lump sum of money it would be less acceptable than something to drink. They cannot dispose of the money so to speak, but the other they can deal with. They would take a great deal more than I have. A man may be very liberal with his cellar in the busy time, because he can get more work done. If you were to offer a man 2s or 3s, more during the busy time he would not thank you for it.

8753. I want you to address yourself to this consideration; suppose the giving of cider, whether under contract or under custom, were prohibited, would it affect the labour market in your view?—No, I do not think it would make the slightest difference. In our particular part we pay what one might call fair wages for agricultural labourers, although you would not perhaps think it very much money. Our labourers are 2s. 6d. a day men, 15s. a week, apart from cottages. I know that the adjoining county, Gloucestershire, pays less by several shillings a week.

Mr. T. W. Parkes.
27 Feb. 1907.

8754. Suppose this custom were to all intents and purposes made illegal as a bargain, you do not think that the agricultural labour market would be prejudiced?—I cannot see how they could possibly get more money. The present state of agriculture is so very bad that one is almost at rock bottom prices. At the same time we could not give less in our particular neighbourhood very well, because we are close to what is known as the Vale of Evesham, where a tremendous lot of market gardening goes on, and the men can always get 2s. 6d. for a day's work in the gardens, and if a farmer wants them he has to pay the same money.

8755. Do these gardens give cider?—I could not say. I should say they did in some cases.

8756. Take the case of two farms adjoining, the labour being practically supplied from the same quarter to each; one farmer offers wages of, say 14s. a week plus cider, and the other farmer offers 14s. a week and no cider?—The non-cider giver is prejudiced somewhat, naturally. But, to put it in another way, I do not think that one does offer more. There is pretty well a standard wage. It runs in this way, that if a farmer chooses to give cider he does so. Of course he probably makes the place a little more attractive to a man when he has got there. But when the man goes there he does not know. If I was engaging a new man I should at once ask him to abide by the spirit of that agreement; I should not engage him if he did not sign it. When it was mutually agreed upon, if in certain work I felt inclined to fill him a bottle of cider I should do so.

8757. You have told us your system. Is there any other system?—I thought a third way was the absolute breaking of the law. Of course there is a great deal of work in our neighbourhood called gret work, piece work. A man might go to a farmer, and the farmer might ask him to take the work by the acre or the chain, as the case might be, and he might say, "I will give you so much money and so much drink." That is the third way. There is no doubt that is done, and I consider that is an absolute breach of the law, so far as I am able to judge. I should say that is contrary to the spirit of the Truck Act.

8758. Do you think that should be forbidden?—Certainly. I have seen the evil of truck myself when I lived in Northern Worcestershire. It was a very serious matter, not in regard to agriculture, but in regard to trades, and I am a very strong upholder of the Truck Act. But I certainly try to fight the battles of my fellow farmers on this matter, because I think if a man cannot do what he likes with his own it is a very dangerous precedent.

8759. You mean with his own cider?—Yes.

8760. Has cider drinking any deleterious effect upon the habits or character of the labourer?—No, on the contrary it is much the other way.

8761. Does it elevate them? I mean morally, not physically?—I have some knowledge of Northern Worcestershire, as I own farm property there, and there is no cider given or made there, and therefore if they resort to drink giving it has to be in the nature of beer. I have seen the experiment tried of giving men the money and telling them to buy their own beer, and experience has told me that in all cases it is very much more detrimental to the men and to the masters and derogatory to the public at large. This has been because these men first of all buy beer which is unwholesome, what is advertised as "harvest beer," which is known to those who know something about it to be brewers' returns. In most cases it is beer which has gone off colour, or taste, or something, and has been returned to the Burton brewers and faked up and sold at a cheap rate. They can buy those brewers' returns at 6d. a gallon. It is strong and in all probability injurious. I have seen instances where men have been drunk not for a day but for a week when they have drunk this harvest beer in their busy time, making themselves very obnoxious to everybody about them.

8762. You are comparing the giving of cider with the taking of something else?—I am comparing the giving of cider, discretionary on the part of the employer, with the employee having the money and buying the drink himself.

8763. That assumes there are facilities for purchase in the neighbourhood?—There are always facilities—I do not mean for the purchase of cider, but there are always facilities for the purchase of beer.

8764. I quite know that, but what I want to get at is this: assume that Parliament forbids the giving of cider in this way, would not there be certain districts at least in the country where cider could not be had with convenience, or is it your evidence that there is always some convenient resort where they can obtain cider by purchase?—I should say that they could always get cider.

8765. Are the habits of the people such that out of their slender earnings they would purchase the cider rather than go without?—Yes.

8766. You think so?—Yes. I do not say that they would purchase it systematically year in and year out, but I am perfectly certain that they would purchase it at certain times of the year and for certain work which they do. In fact, I am rather ashamed to say that they crave for more than we sometimes are inclined to give them, and would buy more if they had an opportunity of doing so.

8767. How are they paid? Are they paid so much per week?—Mainly weekly; sometimes fortnightly. In my case it is a weekly payment, but some farmers pay fortnightly, on Friday night or Saturday morning.

8768. And it is then that the expenditure on drink will take place?—I do not know exactly when it would take place. The chances are they would get this drink if one did not supply it to them. They might get it on credit, which I think would be much more deplorable, because very likely their families would suffer. I am bound to tell this Committee that I have never seen in my experience as a farmer in South Worcestershire any abuse of drink-giving in my life. I think I could say (and it is rather a big thing to say) that I have never had a case of drunkenness the whole time I have been a farmer in South Worcestershire among my own men. If I have had a case of drunkenness through giving cider it has been through picking up what we call a vagrant off the road to work. I think you will see that in a good many of the Petty Sessional Divisions in the county there has not been a conviction of a farm labourer for drunkenness from one year's end to the other.

8769. Is there anything else you wish to tell us?—I do not know whether this quite affects this Committee, but I know that some members of our county council have said, "If you make a lot of cider why do you not sell it? It all comes to the same thing in the end. Give these men the money, if you think they are worth more money at certain times or on certain work, and sell the cider." I should like to point out one thing (and this is a question which probably affects landowners more than tenants) and that is that in that portion of the county, South Worcestershire, there is a tremendous lot of cider fruit, vintage fruit, and a good deal of it is hedgerow fruit, growing in hedgerows, of an indifferent quality, that is to say it is a vintage fruit which would not make cider which would be marketable unless it was faked. For my part I would venture to say that it was the best of cider but that would only be from a cider drinker's point of view. It is what we should call dry cider. Perhaps you would call it hard cider. But it does not make cider which is luscious, or the sort of drink that a town man would like, and in a good many cases it becomes discoloured, dark-coloured, after being exposed to the air. The whole of that fruit, and the whole of that vintage, is of no use from the point of view of a marketable commodity, and if farmers who have got a lot of that fruit do not make it into a cider which can be consumed and is consumed on their holdings they might just as well cut the trees down. It would be a very serious matter to South

Worcestershire if anything were to happen on this question; I am satisfied about that.

8770. Is there any other topic you wish to speak upon?—No, I do not think so.

By Sir Frederick Cawley

8771. I suppose the same remarks apply to Herefordshire as well as to South Worcestershire?—I think Herefordshire and South Worcestershire are about exactly alike. I asked the Secretary whether inquiries had been made upon this question from any other counties, because I do not know what Somersetshire or Devonshire would say, but I think South Worcestershire and Herefordshire are on all fours on this point.

8772. I suppose the public-houses do not sell a deal of cider?—They do in our neighbourhood; in fact in a little parish adjoining mine there is a record number of licensed houses per head. I think there is a licensed house to every fifty people, men, women and children. That is the parish of Defford. I will not say offhand, but I believe those are the figures, as nearly as may be. Among those houses there are one or two, if not three, cider shops, as they are called. They have an off-licence—not a licence to drink on the premises, to sell intoxicants, which comprise cider and cider alone

8773. Is drunkenness more often caused by beer or cider?—I do not think countrymen drink much but cider—I do not mean only the cider from farmers, but if they want to buy a drink.

8774. You speak now of those who go to public-houses?—Yes; I think countrymen drink cider principally.

By Mr. Maddison.

8775. What would you estimate the cost to you per man over the year, taking all the seasons together, of the cider you give your men?—I could tell you nearly the cost per gallon to make. I should say we can make cider at a cost of 3d. a gallon. But as to saying how much it would cost per man, that would be very difficult, because there is such a variation in years. I have given as little as between two and three hogsheads a year, distributed amongst my workpeople, and I have given four or five times that quantity.

8776. Taking it roughly, would they average a gallon a week?—I think you might put it at that.

8777. It costs you about 3d. per man per week?—I think you would have to put it at more than that, because there are times in the year, haymaking and harvest, when there is a good lot given. The point that I specially want to emphasise before this Committee is the fact that at the time when they want a lot of cider, and appreciate it more than money or anything else, we have the absolute control of it and we do not allow them to have more than is good for them.

8778. You have said that you think there are 25 per cent. of the farmers in South Worcestershire who do not give cider at all?—I should think that would be somewhere about it.

8779. That is very much in excess of the number given to us in other evidence. Are you quite sure that there are as many as 25 per cent. who do not give it?—In the other evidence were they taking farmers as a whole? I am taking all farmers.

8780. You could not mention the number who do not give it, which makes you sure of the 25 per cent?—Yes, I know a good many.

8781. Do the 25 per cent. who do not give cider give any other attraction? Are they teetotal farmers who do it on principle and try to make it up in some other way, or are they just ordinary farmers?—Ordinary farmers. There is no principle about it.

8782. Would you say that labour goes just as freely to the 25 per cent. as to the 75 per cent.?—I do not know that I should like to say that. It does not seem quite feasible to say that.

8783. Why do they not?—I mean to say when a man is looking out for a job in all probability he sees an advertisement in a paper, and I do not think I have ever seen even once in my life a case where a man has put in the advertisement "cider given," or "drink given." That is an outside thing. A man goes and engages himself, therefore, to a master or mistress, not knowing that there are any perquisites. If he asks he is probably told there are not, except that he will be paid extra money for extra time. That is my principle. I always pay overtime all the year round, winter or summer. But some people give them a lump sum for harvest, and so on. He probably finds out when he has been at the place that the master does give him some cider, and that is probably what he did not expect, or what he did not have at his last place.

8784. But I suppose, as a matter of fact, labourers do know what is going to be done before they go to a place?—I do not think they do, unless they are from the neighbourhood.

8785. Are most of the men from the neighbourhood?—The last man I had came from between London and Oxford, a good distance. That was twelve months ago. That is the last time I engaged a new man.

8786. There is no other form of payment you can make for anything like the amount which cider costs you which would give you the same result in labour?—That is so.

8787. And the men themselves prefer the cider to the money?—I am certain of that.

8788. It is the case of a man working more for a pint of cider than if you gave him sixpence?—I have offered the men money many times to do work and they would not have it. I have gone down, in the case of finishing a field, and said, "If you men will stay on a bit later I will pay you for all your time, and if you will come up to the house there shall be food for you," and the men have said, "If you will send some drink we will stop and do it, but not without," and they would not; they would have walked off.

8789. Are these staid married men, or just youngsters?—The bulk of my men are married men, staid men, with one or two youths and one or two boys amongst them. Every farmer's staff on a large farm is made up pretty well in the same way, and so many stock men.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8790. You have said that you offered to pay your men for all their time and they have resisted that attraction: what would that have worked out at in money?—What we pay for overtime is 6d. per hour.

8791. How long would they have been there?—It might have been a question of an hour or an hour-and-a-half extra work on any one particular night. That is the rate of wages which I pay over and above my regular wages in hay-making and harvest—6d. an hour overtime. I also tell my men at all times of the year that if they like to stay and make longer time they can do so and I will pay them. There are some farmers who do not pay overtime; they pay a lump sum. Suppose a man is getting 15s. or 16s., a week wages, they give him £1 or £1 10s. extra for one month. I do not like that way, because it is unsatisfactory. If you get a wet harvest or something of that kfnd, so that it runs into a longer time than the month for which the man has been paid, when he has drawn his £1 he is very dissatisfied if he has to work a bit later for another two or three days; he forgets the days when it was wet when he has gone home. It is more satisfactory to pay a man for what he does.

8792. What do you pay your men?—Casual labourers are paid 15s. a week.

8793. Does that work out at 2s. 6d. a day?—Yes.

8794. What are their hours during the day?—Half-past six till about half-past five.

8795. About eleven hours: that is something between 2½d. and 3d. an hour?—They have meal hours out of that. They get an hour and a half out of that; half an hour for what they call lunch (they have their breakfast before they come) which is the meal taken at half-past ten, and an hour in the middle of the day for dinner.

8796. But their absence from home is for at least eleven hours?—That is the time I expect them to be on my premises.

Mr. T. W. Parkes.

27 Feb. 1907.

8797. You do not think it is curious that a man who is only earning about 2½d. an hour should not be attracted by the prospect of earning 9d. on one of the days on which he is only earning 2s. 6d., by the expenditure of an-hour-and a-half extra time? Is it your universal experience that men are not tempted to stay by the offer of 9d. ?—It is, I am sorry to say. I do not find they care to work longer hours, even apart from the question of giving drink or anything.

8798. I understood you to say, in reply to Mr. Maddison, that this was a contrast between the inducement of 9d. and the inducement of, we will say, a quart of cider. I suppose at the end of the hour and a half, or during that time, one man would not consume more than a quart of cider ?—No.

8799. Would he consume as much ?—Scarcely. It is only a question of a bottle of cider among five or six men. You might put it at a quart at the outside.

8800. A pint or a quart is a greater inducement to a man than 9d. ?—Yes.

8801. Even though it must be within your knowledge that within half an hour of leaving your premises he could spend that 9d. on a great deal more cider ?—They have not the opportunity of doing that.

8802. I understood that one of the reasons why farmers like giving cider is that it keeps the men out of the public houses ?—I think it very likely does.

8803. Do I understand you to say now that there are not facilities for obtaining cider in a public house ?—I mean a man does not have much facility when he is working in a field. We are speaking now about overtime. He is working overtime and he has to be up again between five and six in the morning to start work. By the time he got home at ten o'clock he would not care to go elsewhere. Besides, the houses close at ten o'clock in the country.

8804. You told me the men ceased work at half-past five. One and a half hours after that would only take them to seven o'clock, and I understand that a public house is usually convenient ?—I think there are very few villages where there are not public houses. There is no public house in the parish in which I live, but in an adjoining parish, to which I have called the attention of this Committee, there is a very large proportion of public houses, and very great facility for getting drink.

8805. How much do you consider the withdrawal of the agricultural labourer from the public house to be really a factor in this case ?—I am pleased to be able to state that I do not think the agricultural labourer goes to the public house at all, or very little.

8806. How much is he kept out of the public house by the cider which the farmers give him ?—I do not know. I think very likely the fact that he does not go is sufficient proof that he does not want to go.

8807. He hardly could go, because there are no facilities, according to your reply to an earlier question ?—In my particular parish, but now I am representing Worcestershire.

8808. I am not speaking of one parish either, but of Worcestershire ?—Taking the villages as a whole, there is plenty of facility. I think I could count upon one hand the parishes in Worcestershire in which there is no public house. I should say that there are two or three in most and five or six in some. In my particular parish there is no public house, but my contention is that the agricultural labourer is not a drunkard, and I do not think that he frequents public houses. I have enquired of the Chief of Police in my county and others and I have always found that when an agricultural labourer has been convicted for drunkenness in nearly every case it has been when he has been on the road, when he has been sent to town with a load of wheat or something of that sort. I put that down to the attraction of the town. Probably somebody pays for a pint of beer for him, and perhaps he pays for some himself, and the result is he goes home the worse for beer.

8809. The agricultural labourer has no natural tendency to get drunk ?—No; I think they are a sober population. Of course one must not lose sight of the fact that they have not much money to spend on drink—they have not too much to buy bread. I often think it is one of the mysteries of this world how they live on their little money, but one cannot make an alteration in it. It is an extraordinary thing. At the present time I have a man who has a wife and ten children, the eldest of whom has only just gone out to service. God only knows how that family live on the money they get. They could not live if somebody else did not do something for them.

8810. Taking all that into account you cannot find any explanation why a man with those very low wages will refuse the addition of 9d. for an hour-and-a-half's work, though he will be attracted by a pint or a quart of cider ?—The only explanation I can give of that is that I have a practical experience of it myself, and I think I should do the same thing, and I think if you were doing the same work you would do the same thing. If you were in a field when it is about 90 degrees in the shade, working among the hay, as I have done many times, I think you would do the same thing. I know I would prefer a glass of water, if I were charged 6d. for it, to a lump of gold worth a sovereign. It is a tremendous temptation to anyone who has ever gone through it, who has worked out in a blazing hot sun, to be offered a good healthy beverage to drink. You give them the opportunity, and see which they will choose!

8811. But it is not usually 90 degrees in the shade in this country at seven o'clock in the evening ?—No, but it is very hot then if it has been hot all day.

8812. I gather from you that your neighbourhood is rather exceptional in having no public house ?—My parish is exceptional in that respect.

8813. Would you say that labourers in the other districts would equally be tempted by the cider rather than by the 9d. ?—Yes.

8814. Even though they would have facilities of obtaining five quarts of cider if necessary ?—Yes, but they would have it when they did not want it. It is no good giving it to them when they do not want it.

8815. Would it not be better to have a quart of cider in hand and 7d. to spend on other things than to have a quart of cider and no money to spend on other things?—It would be very much better, if you could get them to look at it in that light, but when a man wants a drink that is the time he will have it. It is no good of you offering it to him an hour after he has done his work, when probably he does not want it. He would be glad of the money then, and it would be much better for him. But I say it is just what the man wants at the particular time.

By Mr. Maddison.

8816. In the case of these men, they would get their 9d. by your system under any circumstances, would they not? You pay them overtime ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8817. I understood the men refuse to stay for money, but would stay for drink ?—I have known that many times.

By Mr. Maddison.

8818. That could hardly be your men, because they would get the 9d. ?—I have known cases where men would not stay overtime without drink.

8819. They would not work at all ?—No, they would not work at all.

By the Chairman.

8820. Your parish is one where there are not convenient facilities for getting drink ?—I do not know of any possible way in which they could get drink unless they got it from farmers on the 4½ gallon principle.

8821. I think we must have misunderstood the early portion of your evidence. Take the case of your parish and suppose this custom of giving cider were prohibited by law, what would be the effect in regard to work? Do you think the men would do as good work or not ?—I do not think it would make any difference to the work.

8822. It would be a cheaper arrangement upon the whole for the farmers ?—The only way in which it could make a difference to the work would be if a man had more drink than was good for him so that he could not do his work.

8823. It would be a cheaper arrangement for the farmers if the custom were forbidden ?—I do not quite know that. It would be cheaper in one way, that is to say that he would get his work done for the money less any drink. On the other hand a farmer who was in the habit of giving some drink would get more work done in the same time that he paid the money for.

8824. I would like to ask you about that. Do you think that there is any bad effect upon the population from this drinking habit ? Does it deteriorate the working class ? Have you any view upon that ?—No, I do not think it does. I am bound to say that there is among the poor people that I know in the country district a great deal of—I was going to say lunacy.

8825. Feeble-mindedness ?—Yes. I think that is growing.

8826. Do you think that is at all connected with the cider drinking habit ?—No, I do not. I have always been of one opinion, that to a large extent it is unfortunately due to the fact that the children of the poorer agricultural labourer do not get quite so many comforts and luxuries and nourishment as they should do, in their babyhood. I think the agricultural labourer is infinitely better than he used to be, but he is a long way from the mark which I consider he should reach.

8827. It is in view of evidence of that kind that I would not like to part from you without getting your view as to the abolition of this habit ?—I do not think it in any way deteriorates their health or physique. This is noticeable more in the younger children ; it is formed within their system and grows up with them before they come to an age when they take any drink at all. I have noticed myself in my own very immediate neighbourhood that in one or two large families several of the children did not seem to be as sharp as they might be. Mr. T. W. Parkes. 27 Feb. 1907.

8828. It is a little remote from the object of our inquiry, but do you not think that the soaking with cider from generation to generation must gradually affect not only the mental but the physical powers of those children ?—I thought I made it clear to you that these children are in that state before they ever touch any cider. I should think it is just the other way.

8829. You think that soaking with cider would improve the physique of the children ?—I think that cider such as is made in our particular neighbourhood, which is entirely the juice of the fruit, a pure vintage, is calculated to do a great deal more for them than a lot of the stuff they do take. As a case in point I may tell you that I had my carter, who has been with me for many years, ill for a long time. He had a good many doctors to see him ; I tried to get him good advice, because he was always ailing from acute indigestion. He used to think it was the cider that caused it. I said, " Well, do not drink it." He was still bad and he saw a specialist, who recommended him to take as much cider as he liked and no tea, and the man has not been sick nor sorry since.

8830. I understand your view to be that the habit of drinking cider has no effect whatever upon physique ? —None whatever.

8831. Nor on the mental faculties ?—None. If this were a beer-drinking district I should say otherwise. You do not know what you drink in beer, but I think the tendency of cider is to do more good than harm.

8832. Of course you are speaking with regard to the merits of Worcestershire cider ?—I am talking about cider—not cider that is spelt with a " y."

Mr. JOHN WILLIAM WILLIS BUND, called ; and Examined.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund. 6 Mar. 1907.

By the Chairman.

8833. Will you give us your address ?—15, Old Square, Lincoln's Inn.

8834. For the last fourteen years you have been Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, Standing Joint Committee, and County Council ?—Yes.

8835. I should like you in your own language to describe to us the custom of giving cider to agricultural labourers, which has been explained to us briefly by some other witnesses, because that is a matter in which you have taken considerable interest for some years past ?—I do not quite know how other witnesses have described it. There are two branches of the question ; there is first the question of giving cider to the ordinary agricultural labourer, and secondly the question of giving cider to casual labourers. The casuals are the hop-pickers and fruit-pickers ; the ordinary are the agricultural labourers. When the Truck Amendment Act was passed in 1887 these words were inserted, " Nothing in this Act shall render illegal a contract with a servant in husbandry for giving him food, drink not being intoxicating, a cottage or other allowance." When the Standing Joint Committee was appointed under the Local Government Act we had some gentlemen upon it who were very interested in the cause of temperance and they brought this matter very strongly before the Committee. They began as regards the hop-pickers, the casuals. I am sure that the gentlemen who have given evidence here would not dispute for a moment that there is, and has been for many years past, a great amount of drunkenness among the hop-pickers and fruit-pickers.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund.

8836. While speaking of the hop-pickers and fruit pickers as casuals, I suppose we may take it that they are employed for a continuous term during the year ?—Yes, for perhaps six weeks in the case of the hop-pickers, and the fruit-pickers for a longer time. The fruit-pickers begin with strawberries, and go on with pea-picking, then gooseberry-picking, then plum-picking, and so on and sometimes they go on also as hop-pickers.

8837. I will take the fruit-pickers : when they enter at the beginning of the fruit-picking season are they continuously in employment until the fruit season has closed ?—I cannot quite answer that question one way or the other, for this reason, that the conditions of fruit, picking vary so much. As a rule the farmer sells his plot to a merchant ; the merchant hires the pickers, and it depends upon whether he buys one or more plot whether it is continuous or not. But you may practically take it that they get one job after another, but not a job under the same person.

8838. I wanted to differentiate the case in our own minds from the case of hiring a labourer for a day during harvest, or anything like that ?—It is quite different from that.

8839. It is during a section of the year that that particular labour is required ?—Yes.

8840. And this is what one might term seasonal rather than casual labour ?—Yes, I am much obliged to you. That puts it very much better. What generally takes place is this. The person who wants his crop picked, whether he be a merchant or a farmer, sends up into the manufacturing districts, what we speak of as the Black Country, and gets somebody there who acts as his agent to hire him a certain number of labourers. The terms usually are either so much a week or so much by quantity, so much a basket that they pick, or so much a bushel as regards hops. Then there comes the question, which is always put, " Does your man give drink ? " Latterly they say, " Well, that is a matter of arrangement," but there is a clear understanding whether they give drink or whether they do not, and if they do not give drink more wages are paid. Taking it at 3d. a bushel, or something of that kind, if drink is given ; it would be 5d. a bushel if drink was not given.

8841. What is the experience from which you testify ? I only want to strengthen your evidence ?—My experience is from what I have learnt from the different employers of labour, who have told me so themselves.

8842. It is fair to apprise you of the fact that it has been represented to us that in the first place there is no contract made for the giving of cider. I suppose you assent up to that point ?—There is no expressed contract, but there is an implied bargain.

8843. I meant in the sense of an expressed contract ? —That is so.

8844. It has been admitted to us in the second place, that there is a well known and recognised practice of the country as to the giving of cider : I suppose you assent to that ?—Yes ; there is a survival. I would rather put it in this way, that there is a survival of the old custom of the servants being put up in the houses and fed in the houses. The giving of cider is a survival of that.

8845. The third point that has been mentioned to us is this : it has been maintained that notwithstanding the knowledge of that custom there is no difference in wages and no question asked about wages, no demand for a different scale, on the ground of there being no cider given ?—That I should say is distinctly untrue.

8846. Of course it is admitted that where there is no cider given a certain amount of cost is saved to the farmer. It may be small but something must necessarily be saved in regard to the expense of supplying cider ?—I do not think so, for this reason, that the cider is grown on the farm, is produced very cheaply, and by giving cider the farmer really saves money.

8847. I do not think we are quite on the same line. The admission is made that the expense of the cider must be something, although it may be small ?—Yes.

8848. It was somewhat surprising to some of us that when that expense was saved the labourer did not get more wages. Your view rather is that the labourer does get more and does stipulate for more wages if he does not get cider ?—Certainly.

8849. On the other hand, if he does get cider, whether by expressed contract, which we know is now forbidden, or by the general understanding assumed on both sides, then necessarily he gets less money wage ?—Yes, I shall be able to mention to you three cases where that has been clearly proved, and I shall show you the practice of our Committee with regard to that.

8850. I think this will be a convenient stage ?—If you please. Perhaps you will allow me to hand you this document, which contains the instructions given by the Standing Joint Committee. (Handed to the Chairman)

8851. This will be a very useful document to us ? —You will see there are three cases mentioned here. First there is the case on the top of p. 3 of a farmer named Darlington, which is a very instructive case. He was prosecuted for a breach of the Act by supplying drink in lieu of wages to a labourer named Panting. The terms of hiring were from September 25th. to March 25th, 13s., and three pints of cider a day ; from March, 25th, to Michaelmas 15s. and two quarts a day; during harvest 30s. extra and as much cider as he wanted. It was argued that the wages were fixed, that the drink was not part of them, but a voluntary gift. The Bench convicted. A case was asked for, but not gone on with." That is as good an example as I could give you.

8852. With regard to the statement made " That the wages were fixed and that the drink was not part of them, but a voluntary gift," members of the Committee will check the statement I am about to make, that substantially that has been the evidence given to us with regard to the practice ?—If you will turn to p. 2 of the memorandum you will see the case of Long v. Crane. The Committee left it to me, as you will see by the statement above : " The meeting resolved to submit the same to the Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee with a view to the prosecution of the offenders by the police. In the case of Long v. Crane I was very much opposed to prosecuting, because it arose in the way I will mention, and it seemed to me very clear that it ought not to have been taken, except, as they say, as a test case. Mr. Crane is a magistrate and a member of the Standing Joint Committee, and he farms largely. He said, " Oh yes, I give my men cider when I think they want it. If it is a hot day I give them cider, or if they have extra work I give them cider, but I make no bargain with them. I very often give them cider, and to show you what I do I will order them some cider now and you can prosecute me if you like," and he did so there and then. On that, a prosecution was instituted. It seemed to me it was an utterly hopeless case, that it was a pure gift and that there was no question of wages. The magistrates very properly dismissed it, and, if I may say so with respect, the High Court very properly affirmed their decision. That has given rise to all the trouble because that case has always been cited by the farmers, who say, " Oh, if we give it as a gift and not as part of the wages the Act is not infringed." But that is a totally different case from that of Darlington.

8853. Darlington's case was in the same year as Long v. Crane ?—Yes ; Darlington followed the case of Crane. I said that Darlington was a case where we ought to prosecute, and we did prosecute. I said, " I hope you will go to the High Court" : but they did not. They prosecuted a witness for perjury, whom we defended, and the case against him was dismissed, 8854. May I put it to you as broadly as this: Crane's was a case which did not represent a test of the general practice ?—Certainly.

8855. And Darlington's was a case which did truly represent the general practice ?—Certainly.

8856. That being so, I am bound to ask you the question what has been the result of Darlington's case ?—That in all cases similar to Darlington we have prosecuted and we have got convictions, of course where the magistrates believed the evidence, and no case has been taken to the High Court to dispute them.

8857. Now comes our difficulty as a Committee, which I think you will appreciate. We have evidence before us substantially of a continuance of this practice which you have now demonstrated by legal proceedings to be illegal; how do you account for that ?—Because we are not able, except there is a dispute between the servant and the master, in any way to ascertain what the terms of the contract are. Whenever we can we prosecute. The master will not tell us, and the servant will not tell us, he says, "What business is it of yours ?"

8858. In giving this evidence I gather you are representing the policy of the Standing Joint Committee ?—Yes, certainly. If you will turn to Paragraph 8 you will see our opinion. It was framed by me with very great care to show what our views were: "In our opinion, if it was ascertained, as it could be without any great difficulty, that the current rate of wages in the district was, say, 15s. or 16s. a week, a fact that could easily be proved; that a particular employer paid less than the current rate, say 12s., but allowed his men to have so much cider a day, a fact which could be proved by evidence without any great difficulty; such a case would come within the Act, as in our opinion it would be implied that giving the drink was part of the contract. We also think, now the defendant can give evidence, that a case should be taken, for if the defendant did not go into the box and deny the facts a presumption would arise that the Justices were right in concluding that the supply of drink was part of the contract, while, if he did elect to give evidence, the real terms of the contract could be got out. If the magistrates held that it did not come within the Act, such a case should be taken to the High Court and decided, so that either a repeal or an amendment of the Act could be obtained." That is the policy the Committee have laid down.

8859. I point out to you that there is a difficulty which arises, with which you are voluntarily being confronted, namely that it appears to be an undoubted fact that evidence will be given that the same rate of wages prevails cider or no cider ?—That may be in some cases, but there is no doubt a rule or an understanding that certain people give cider, and that if they go there they will get it.

8860. Let us take this case, which I thoroughly understand. Do you think it credible that if no cider were given in such a case the wages would remain as small ?—I do not think a man would stay.

8861. The servants would not be got unless that understanding was adhered to ?—No. Let me call your attention to the case of Elizabeth Jones, who was prosecuted in 1901 for giving cider in lieu of wages to a workman in her employ; she was convicted and fined £5 and £2 18s. 7d. for costs. A case was stated by the Justices in this case for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the point whether the Justices were right in receiving evidence of a verbal agreement to supply cider in part payment of wages, and in allowing such evidence to prevail in spite of the existence of a written agreement which was wholly silent upon the subject. There was a written contract as to the wages that were to be given, but there was an understanding, which was carried out, that they were to have so much cider as well. The Justices convicted, and it was contended as a matter of law, there being a written agreement, they ought not to have received verbal evidence as to a variation of it. The Court upheld the conviction.

8862. On the very simple ground, I suppose—all courts do take the common sense view, we assume—that if you could have a written contract and a verbal agreement it would make a mockery of the law ?—Yes.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund.

6 Mar. 1907.

8863. This document will be a very valuable one. Before we pass from it may I call your attention to Paragraph 9, where you say, "We are strongly of opinion that the present position of matters should not be allowed to continue. It is most undesirable that the law should be brought into contempt as it now is. In our opinion a great encouragement is given to drunkenness by the present practice, and it is the duty of the Committee to enforce the law now that its breach has again been brought to their notice." In consequence of the practice, was that distinctly the opinion of yourself and the body to whom you reported, who I understand agreed to this report ?—Yes.

8864. That drunkenness was encouraged ?—Yes.

8865. It is right that I should put to you as against that the view that was submitted to us, that if you gave money and no cider you drove the employees to the nearest public house where they took cider at a dearer rate and probably in larger quantity. What do you say to that ?—I say that is possible, but I do not think it is right, for this reason: that if you give them cider they feel bound to drink it, whereas if they have to go and buy it they probably think twice before they do so.

8866. On the broad fact, would the inducement to them to supply themselves in public houses because it was not given to them be in your opinion a serious matter ?—No. I think if they had to pay for all they got there would be very much less drunkenness.

8867. There is another thing I must put to you, namely, that there has been testimony given to the effect that there is not drunkenness, but a certain stimulus given to the labourer in regard to his faculties ?—I am sorry to say I must utterly deny that. If necessary I could get you a return during the hop-picking season of the number of cases of drunkenness dealt with by the Petty Sessional Benches in districts where hop-picking is carried on, and the number of cases of drunkenness dealt with by those Benches in districts where hop-picking is not carried on, and you will see there was a very much larger percentage of drunkenness in the former.

8868. Does the habit of taking cider conduce to better labour or to worse labour ? The answer given by a former witness was, "I really think a good man does more work if he gets a little cider, especially at harvest and hay-making times ?"—The question is, what is a little cider. The men would be thirsty and want some drink in a certain quantity, but an uncertain quantity does not help them in their work.

8869. Interpreting that answer as no doubt the witness would have wished it to be interpreted, that a supply of cider makes for better labour instead of worse, does that accord with your experience, or otherwise ?—It really turns on the quantity.

8870. You yourself would not look upon the supply of cider as in any respect a necessary encouragement to good labour ?—No.

8871. The supply of cider is accompanied with liability to drunkenness ?—Yes.

8872. And to the formation of habits of drinking ?—Yes. May I mention to you one case which I think strongly proves that, a case which came under my own notice ? A boy of fourteen was hired to work on a farm at so much a week and so much cider. He had been a good boy at the elementary school and so on, and before he went to that farm he had practically had no cider or intoxicant at all. After he had been there a short time he got into the habit of drinking. We made inquiries into the case, and I saw his mother, and said, "Why do you encourage your son to drink cider in this way ?" She admitted that she insisted on his having the cider because it was his right. I do not believe that is an isolated case. That is a case where in consequence of this practice a child is being brought up to habits of drinking.

8873. Then on the question of drunkenness, is it your opinion that there is a considerable amount of that ?—Yes, and if you like I will have those figures prepared for you.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund.

6 Mar. 1907.

8874. We should value them very much if you could oblige us with them ?—I will do so with pleasure.

8875. A habit of that kind, more particularly cider drunkenness which assumes an attractive and innocent shape, would last, would it not ?—I am afraid so.

8876. In Paragraph 10 you say: "We therefore recommend such a prosecution as we have indicated to be instituted against some employer of labour who is known to pay less than the current rate of wages in the district, but to give in addition to the wages intoxicating drink to his workmen." I again point out to you that there is a difficulty on the question of fact involved in your recommendation because of the evidence given that the current rate of wages is not known, or at all events cannot be conclusively proved to differ ?—That is so to a certain extent, but there is a current rate of wages, below which if a man pays there must be some reason for it.

8877. I should have thought so, but you can testify to that effect ?—Oh, certainly.

8878. This report of the Police Sub-committee was received and adopted ?—Yes. I ought to say that the late Chief Constable was a very old man—I do not wish to say anything against him ; he is dead now—and he had a very strong view that the police ought not to be made unpopular. He thought it was bad for the police force to make them unpopular, and that if they went against the farmers they would never get any information, and so on, and he did all he could to prevent that report from being carried out. That accounts in some degree for the few prosecutions.

8879. I see you note that great difficulty was found in carrying out the law ?—Yes.

8880. Then there was a resolution and order passed by the Standing Joint Committee on May 31st, 1902 ? —Yes. "That the Chief Constable be directed to report to the Police Sub-committee all cases which are brought to the knowledge of the police where intoxicating liquors are habitually given to persons in the employment of persons who are subject to the provisions of the Truck Acts." You see the word "habitually" is inserted to avoid "Long and Crane." "That the Police Sub-committee be authorised to take such proceedings as they may consider necessary in any case that the Chief Constable reports to them." That had been left to me before, as you will see by the memorandum, and I said I should prefer that the sub-committee should carry it out, because an association had been formed, on whose behalf I believe evidence has been given before you, the Farmers' Association, which was really a combination against carrying out the law as regards cider. I did not want to put myself alone against the association and I thought the sub-committee had better do it. That was the reason of it. "That any minutes or instructions of this committee that have been previously given on the subject be hereby rescinded."

8881. The sub-committee has accordingly been charged with this matter since ?—Yes.

8882. Have the prosecutions which have since resulted been substantially at their instigation ?—Yes, and I think they have all been successful. I am a member of the sub-committee and unless there is such evidence assuming it to be true, that I should myself convict upon, I have always advised them not to prosecute.

8883. Observe your next statement on your proof. You say that the hop-pickers refused to work unless they were supplied with drink ; is that so ?—Yes. I will give you an instance. I am sorry that you had our Deputy Chief Constable's evidence before mine, because it would have been rather important that you should have asked him as to this. Last autumn a number of hop-pickers, 300 or 400, were brought down to a farm and they did not get any drink. The man offered them tea and other things, and they struck and refused to work. It was necessary for him to get his hops picked. They must be picked in a certain time or else they lose colour and the price goes down. So he promised them so much whisky at the end of the day if they would go on picking. They said if he did not get it they would go elsewhere. The farmer told me that himself, he said he was obliged to do it.

8884. Does that suggest to you that there will be a difficulty in altering the law from its present condition to one of greater stringency ?—Quite so. I quite feel the extraordinary difficulty there is in any alteration of the law in making provision for ascertaining the terms of the contract. I do not at all see how that is going to be done.

8885. On the other hand, do you see the existing state of the matter is one of some awkwardness, namely, that certain people by giving cider really defy the law ?—Yes.

8886. And other people by complying with the law involve themselves in labour troubles ?—That is so If necessary I could give you the names of very large growers of hops and fruit who have suffered very considerably from carrying out the law.

8887. Have you any recommendation to make to us, who are struggling for the light, about that ?—The only possible recommendation I could make is this, that the terms which they offer to their hop-pickers should be registered with, say, the Clerk of the Peace.

8888. You mean the full terms of the contract ?—Yes.

8889. Including the custom ?—Everything which they put down ; I should make them register the whole terms of the employment.

8890. But suppose you have them, and cider is included ?—If cider is included it is a breach of the law.

8891. I know, but you see your recommendation would make the thing plain, any way, if there was a breach of the law ?—Yes.

8892. But to us who are looking to amend the law, can you give us any assistance upon that head ?—If you say that there must be some drink given, I should then say that you should put a limit to the amount of drink that was given.

8893. You admit that once the law comes to allot the amount of drink that is a very delicate matter ?—I should be opposed to that very strongly, but you asked me what could be done.

8894. Excuse me pressing you, but we want to have the full advantage of your view. Supposing the law could not interpose to prescribe the legitimate quantity of drink, do you think that an experiment could be made on the double ground of stipulating everything in the contract and making the contract illegal if drink were given ? Do you think we might risk total prohibition as part of the contract ?—What was passing through my mind—I wish to be perfectly frank with you— is this, that the men would (say because you are dealing with a very rough class, and a class who will take advantage of anything they could) "Well, we expected drink and it is not given us. You cannot enforce this contract against us and we will go off," and you would put the farmer in an extremely difficult position therefore. While I should like to see the contract declared void, I am bound to look at the other side.

8895. That is just the difficulty which occurs to us ?—I am bound also to say this. Take a tenant who has got sixty acres of hops, and he would employ 500 people, and if you said that the contract, if no drink was given, was illegal, those 500 people would be turned loose upon the farm committing all sorts of depredations. I really do not know what the landlord would do.

8896. That drives us back again to practically the existing state of matters ?—It does. I should like to put it clearly to you that my objection is this : my objection to the existing state of matters is not so much with regard to the hop-picker as it is with regard to the regular labourer, because as soon as the regular labourer quarrels with his master he goes into the witness box and swears, "The terms were so much a week, and cider." He knows law enough for that ; he sees at once he can put the master in a hole, and the master will be summoned. Although I want to put a stop to the cider giving, I do think that in some cases the labourer is not as scrupulous as regards the truth as he ought to be. He does it as a revenge, in fact.

8897. Following that resolution to which you have referred, proceedings were taken against Mr. David Harvey Smith ?—Yes.

8898. And Mrs. Jones?—Yes.

8899. And these other cases spoken to by previous witnesses ?—Yes.

8900. I see that in Mrs. Jones' case you say that the farmers who supplied drink alleged that it was not and could not be proved to be part of the wages ?—Yes, because they said the wages were fixed by the written agreement. There Long and Crane, which has caused all the trouble, came in again.

8901. But notwithstanding that, a conviction was obtained in that case ?—Yes.

8902. Then you make this serious statement that since that the practice has been used to evade the Act ?—That is so. I do not want to press my views, but I do want to put this, because it has occurred. You see, a great many magistrates feel very strongly on this question of cider and have very strong views on the drink question generally, and when there is a direct conflict of testimony between the employer and the labourer, and you have a tribunal who are the sole judges of the fact, if tha tribunal is composed of gentlemen who take a very strong view on the drink question it is quite possible that they may regard the views of the labourer with more favour than they do those of the employer. It is only right in fairness that I should mention that. When I say we have got convictions in all cases they are open to that view.

8903. I see you make the remark that the law ought either to be repealed or made so that it could be enforced ? —I do feel that very strongly, because I do not like any law that is used as a means of, I cannot say vengeance, but as a means of oppression. An idle labourer who will not work, who absents himself, is summoned, and he says, "If you summon me I will have you up for giving cider." That is what I feel.

8904. We all admit it is a knotty problem, but consider this; you say you think the practice is a bad one and should be put down ?—Yes.

8905. And you believe it promotes habits of drinking and drunkenness ?—I do.

8907. The moment you did that, observe that you raise again a whole crop of difficulties of this kind. You would then permit it to be part of the contract to give beer or even spirits to farm labourers?—I am quite aware of that, and I quite see the difficulty, but it is a question which of the two evils is the least. Of course, if this Act was strictly carried out, I suppose the custom which prevails in another part of the country in which I am interested, in Wales, is illegal, strictly speaking, because there the farm servants live in the house and have their food, and beer with their meals.

8908. Of course it would be infinitely better if the Scottish practice were adopted throughout ?—I am afraid I do not know what that is.

8909. Of giving with oatmeal so many quarts of milk per day ?—It would.

8910. That would be a sensible thing, that no law would strike against ?—That is so. I ought to say that some of the very large growers of hops have been trying to give tea and lemonade and such things to the hop-pickers, to the women particularly, but it has not been an unqualified success.

8911. You cited one very awkward and bad case to us, the case of the boy of fourteen; you might give us the other one ?—The other was one I tried at the Sessions last October.

8912. It was the case of a man who was tried for cruelty to his children ?—Yes, by causing them unnecessary suffering by neglecting them and not providing sufficient food. He was a drunken, good-for-nothing fellow, and there is no doubt he did not send any money home to his wife, and the children were left starving. That was admitted. A question arose as to what the duties of the guardians were, but I need not trouble you with that. He was paid by the job. He was a carpenter, who made gates and hurdles, and was paid so much a dozen for hurdles, and given drink. When he got off drink he was a very good workman indeed and could earn very good wages. When he had any drink he used not to be content with that which was given him but used to have rather a bout and became very troublesome. His defence was that he did not pay for the drink and consequently there was no harm in his getting drunk, as he could not send home more wages. That was his defence, but he was continually drunk and people would not employ him, so he lost employment by it. He said that if he had not got the drink he could have sent home more money than he did. I think that is a very strong case to show how very badly the practice works.

8913. Will you excuse me summing up your view in this way: There are three ways of interfering; in the first place you can make the law absolutely prohibitive ?—Yes.

8914. In spirit it is prohibitive, but in practice it is evaded; it can be made actually prohibitive. You think there might be dangers of disorder if that were done ?—I think we can cope with the disorder.

8915. Do you think that a labour trouble would not arise permanently ?—No, not permanently. We should have some trouble at first, but I should be prepared to risk that.

8916. Another way is to make the practice, legal on the ground that at present it is evaded, and you want to have the law either respected or amended ?—Yes. I should be very sorry to see that. I should be very sorry if we were obliged to say that we could not carry out a beneficient law in favour of temperance, and had to go back.

8917. The third way is the present system. May we discard No. 2, which would be amending the law in the sense which we have been discussing ? You would not like to go back by writing out the words of the Act of 1887 ?—I certainly think you might discard that. I do not like it.

8918. That leaves two alternatives, the present system, or a system which would be respected and in practice as well as in theory prohibitive. Of those two, which do you prefer ?—I think we must try and get some system which we could carry out.

8919. You think that an experiment ought to be made and that the prohibition of this practice should at least be attempted ?—Certainly. Perhaps I ought to say one thing to the Committee, if you will forgive my doing so. I think that every year is tending in a way for temperance, and for this reason; this practice is an old one, as you have been informed by witnesses; when I was a boy, and when I was young, almost every farmer made cider. Now, they do not. The practice of making cider is going out very much, and they do not grow the fruit for cider that they used to do. The fruit they grow is for sale—what they call pot fruit, for eating and cooking. Gradually, over a very considerable area in the county trees have blown down and been cut down; and that class of fruit tree is not replanted. The cider now made is of a better quality, which they would not give to labourers. The cider they used to make to give to labourers is not now made; it is only in out-of-the-way places and on the old farms and among the smaller men that this continues to the extent it used to do.

8920. Assume that the Committee were not prepared to go the length of effecting total prohibition, but were prepared to allow the existing system to go on, I fancy there would be at least three things which you would insist upon; in the first place you would insist that there should never be an expressed contract for cider ?—Yes.

8921. In the second place, you would insist that the amount of cider should always be an element to be taken into consideration when prosecutions were ordered ?—Yes.

8922. Suppose you had three quarts a day regularly to each labourer, for instance; that would be a case for the law interposing ?—Yes.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund.
6 Mar. 1907.

8923. The third point would be that wherever it could be established that less than the current rate of wages was given, presumably in consequence of the supply of cider, that should be treated as a contravention of the law, equivalent to an expressed contract ?—Yes. I should rather put it in this way, that wherever less than the current rate of wages was given the onus should be on the employer to show that he did not make it up.

8924. That is what I meant when I said "presumably in consequence of the supply of cider."—It should be for him to show he did not give anything else to make it up.

8925. With those three points before you the present practice might at all events be gradually purified until it approximated more and more to the elimination of drink from the contract altogether ?—Yes. I think that would be a very great improvement on the present system. I do not see my way to suggesting anything better. I have something here which may be interesting to the Committee. I instructed the chief constable to send round these questions to all the divisions in the county and this document says : "The Chief Constable notifies Superintendents of Divisions that the Deputy Chief Constable has been appointed to attend the Government inquiry now being held in London on the working of the Truck Acts," and the following information is requested : "(1) Result and particulars of any cases under the Truck Acts which have taken place in the whole of his division during the last ten years. (2) The average rate of wages given in the district. (3) Is the general practice in his district to supply intoxicating drink to labourers and workmen ? (Not in lieu of wages)." I will not trouble you with the returns now, but I thought you might like to look through them.

8926. I think we should value them if it is convenient for you to let us have them ?—I will leave them with you. The only thing I would ask is this. I have not the least objection to your using this document, but I should not like the names of the superintendents to be published, because they are confidential. But as regards the substance, you are perfectly at liberty to use them as you please.

By Mrs. Tennant.

8927. You say there are a certain number of cases in which no cider is given by the farmer, but in which he pays higher wages ?—Yes.

8928. Have you any idea of the proportion which those cases form to the whole ?—No ; I can only say that the larger farmers do not give cider. It is the smaller farmers who give it.

8929. Will you distinguish between the farmers who employ hop-pickers and the farmers who employ the regular agricultural labourers ?—Yes. There are a certain number who make the cider for the labourers ; all their refuse apples and so on go to make drink. Those are the smaller people. They do not make cider for sale ; they simply make it for consumption on the farm ; and they give it either to labourers or to hop-pickers. They say, and say probably with justice, "If we did not give it to these people it would be useless to us, because we could not sell it."

8930. Would you say that there are cases in which the farmer who gives higher wages, and no cider, is free from labour difficulties—in which the men are satisfied with higher wages and the absence of cider ?—As regards regular labour, yes. As regards the "seasonals," as the Lord Advocate called them, no. The people who come from the Black Country always look to have a holiday, and part of their holiday delights is a quantity of cider.

8931. But in the other cases, distinctly yes ?—I should say yes.

8932. Would you say that the evidence was not accurate which said that an agricultural labourer would prefer a quart of cider for an hour and a half's overtime to 9d. in money ?—No, I do not think so at all. I think in most cases, except in very out-of-the-way places, the labourers and their wives are beginning to see that money for themselves and their children is better than drink for the man alone. I am not sure that it may not be a selfish thing on the part of the wife to think that she might be benefited as well as the man, but I think that that idea is spreading, that she can do better with the money than he can with the drink.

8933. In the cases which we are dealing with, the permanent agricultural labourers, there is a satisfactory working system of higher wages and no cider ?—I do not say satisfactory, because there are these cases which I have mentioned, but I think certainly on the larger farms with the better class of farmers the system of not giving cider and giving more wages is spreading, and is spreading to the great advantage of the people.

8934. I did not mean that the general system was satisfactory, but that where the system exists it is working satisfactorily ; is that so ?—I think so. Of course there are cases where there is grumbling. The old-fashioned labourer says, "I used to have drink, and I get nothing now. Look how mean Mr. So-and-so is." There is always that sort of thing. But I think that on the whole I may say yes.

8935. In those cases has the arrangement been easily arrived at, or has it always been preceded by some form of trouble ?—I think it very much depends on the character of the employer. If he is a man with capital, a liberal man, and says, "I am going to do so-and-so, and I am not going to listen to anything else," it has worked well. If he is a man who rather screws his labourers down to the very last thing it has not worked so well. They might say, "You must give me more wages," and he would sooner give it in the form of drink than money. That is really what it comes to in many cases.

8936. Have you formed any idea of the extra sum which is usually placed against the cider ?—It would vary, but I think you might put it at from 1s. 6d. to 2s. a week.

8937. That is for the permanent labourer ?—Yes.

8938. As the cider has admittedly no commercial value it means very nearly that sum out of the farmer's pocket ?—Yes.

8939. And that he does not wish to face ?—No. Of course he has the cider. He has the fruit growing on his farm, and unless he gives it to his pigs he makes it into this drink. He cannot sell it, but he can sell it to the labourers in this way.

8940. How do you think it would work if it were specifically required that the contract should include not only wages but any reward or refreshment given ?—The question of the permanent and the seasonal labourer comes in again there. As regards the permanent labourer I think it might possibly do. But as regards the other, suppose you wanted him to work a little overtime to finish. It might be very catchy weather, and wet spoils the hops or fruit. There is nothing specified in the contract about overtime, but you might give the man something for working longer on a fine evening. That is where the difficulty comes in.

8941. It would allow him to give oatmeal or something of that sort. It would not prevent the giving of refreshment or reward, but would only prevent the giving of intoxicating refreshment ?—There is a difficulty. The man would be tempted to break the law. I am quite with you in wishing for it, but I do see the practical difficulty of doing it. Suppose the man said, "Unless you give me some whisky I will not work any more. I want a drop of whisky." Most of the employers would say, "Well, it may mean a difference of a good many pounds to me to get these hops finished to-night while there is fine weather and no wet on them."

8942. You do not think that the desire for whisky would be met by an extra small sum ?—I think the men would say they would have the whisky, or gin, or whatever it might be. I am afraid they would in the case I am putting to you. It is only a matter of opinion, but I am afraid that is how it would be.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

8943. It is a question really of supply and demand in regard to labour in the country, is it not ? I mean, if you have two farmers, one giving cider and the other not, if there is any shortage of labour the one who gives cider will get the labour ?—Clearly.

8944. It has been represented to us that there is not that difference ?—Then I think that has been a misrepresentation. I do not know the gentlemen who have given evidence before you, but the Farmers' Association are the people who give cider very largely, and who openly advocate the giving of cider, and no interference with it. The Chamber of Agriculture have also taken up the line, that the farmer in these hard times ought to have no obstruction put in his way. But there is no doubt of this, that when you bring a class of people like the hop-pickers into a district and they find that they can get drink at one place and not at another they will leave the man who does not give it and go to the other who does.

8945. I should like to keep the regular labourer entirely apart from this extraneous labourer in the shape of the hop-picker, and the person who comes from the Black Country. I am speaking now of the ordinary labourer on the farm. We have had it represented to us that if there is no contract to give drink it does not matter at all; but the man expects, and gets, some cider. I put it to one of the witnesses that it really comes to this, that when there is a shortage of labour the man who gives cider gets the labour, but when there is a plethora of labour the men must have work and it really does not make any matter whether they give cider or not. Is not that something like the facts of the case ?—I think the man who gave the cider would always get the preference.

8946. But if there was a plethora of labour a man can get labour whether he gives cider or not ?—He might, but the man who gave cider would always get the preference.

8947. I am speaking entirely now of the ordinary labourer ?—Yes.

8948. I want to keep away from the hop-pickers, if possible, for the moment. I said to one witness: "You think it keeps them out of the public house if they are well filled up on the farm ?" and the answer was: "If you like to put it that way. During a period of some years not a single case of drunkenness was brought against any bona fide agricultural labourer in my own petty sessional division" ?—I do not know who your witness was, and in the next place unless I knew the division and what the witness calls a bona fide agricultural labourer I should not be able to say. But I think I may say this, as I said in reply to the Lord Advocate, that I am by no means a person who would prosecute indiscriminately. When a case is brought up and the Committee ask, "are we to prosecute ?" I always go very carefully into the evidence, and say to myself: "Assuming what is said here is true, should I convict if I was sitting as a magistrate ?" and if I think I should not, I say, "Do not prosecute."

8949. I rather gathered from what you said in reply to the Lord Advocate that in your opinion this cider drinking leads to drunkenness ?—Yes.

8950. We have a witness here who said there has not been a case of drunkenness on the part of the agricultural labourers who are cider drinkers: how do you reconcile the two statements ?—As you are aware, opinions vary as to when a man is drunk and when he is not. A farmer would say that a fellow who had drunk a couple of gallons of cider was not drunk if he was able to walk home. If it was a public house, and the publican was likely to be charged with permitting drunkenness, he would probably stop him at the end of the first gallon and say: "You are going to have no more. You go home!" The farmer would say that it was not a case of drunkenness as long as the man could get home anyhow.

8951. Is not drinking a great many gallons rather the exception and not the rule ? I take it from other witnesses that the ordinary custom is to give about two or three quarts a day ?—Yes. You are getting on to a gallon.

8952. The ordinary custom is to give two or three quarts of cider a day, we will say; do you think that does the man any harm, or does it make him work any worse or any better ?—You are going into a very big question. I do not think it does him any good. But there are people who say that we have a very large amount of lunacy, and that that is due to cider drinking. I do not agree with that.

8953. Lunacy is not peculiar to a cider-drinking country ?—No, but they say that our great increase is due to cider drinking.

8954. Is lunacy more prevalent in a cider-drinking country than in other parts of England ?—That is what some gentlemen say. Mr. J. W. W. Bund. 6 Mar. 1907.

8955. I am only asking for information ?—I do not say yes or no, because I have not seen sufficient evidence upon the matter, but when you ask whether it is good for a man or not I say that I do not think it does him any good, and there are certain complaints which cider drinking brings on.

8956. That is the point I wish to get at. We want to know whether this ordinary kind of cider which is given by the farmers is an ill or is not an ill ?—I think it is an ill. I think you may take it it is an ill.

8957. Is it an ill so great that we ought to try by legislation to put it down ?—Yes, certainly.

8958. Independent of the question of its being a matter of truck ?—Yes, certainly.

8959. You have to reckon times like harvest, say hay harvest, in which the men get very hot ?—Yes.

8960. I take it you could not very well stop a farmer giving his men either cider or any other kind of refreshment then, could you ?—No, you could not.

8961. Would it not be very difficult to differentiate between giving cider to labourers working in a hayfield, and giving it to people who are hop-picking, which is not such laborious work ?—No, for this reason, that the people in the hayfield or in the harvest field generally get what they have while they are working, and they work it off. The hop-pickers generally get it at the end of the day, after they have done their work, and do not work it off.

8962. Don't you think it would be difficult to frame an Act which would legalise the giving of cider to men whilst they are at work and would at the same time forbid the giving of it to them after they have finished work ?—I agree that there might be difficulty from that point of view. You asked me to differentiate between the two and I was only speaking of the custom.

8963. As a proof that cider did lead to drunkenness you referred to prosecutions among the hop-pickers ?—Yes.

8964. Are these prosecutions not due rather to the class of people, to a lower class of people coming in to the town ?—That does not apply so much to the hop-pickers as to the peapickers and the fruit-pickers.

8965. Are not the hop-pickers who come from Shrewsbury rather a low class ?—Shrewsbury is a most respectable place. People come from Dudley, Wolverhampton, Walsall, and all around there to do this work and they are generally a fairly respectable class of people. The same people come year after year to the same place. Some of them no doubt have their own ideas; they all sleep together, and their ideas as to what they can take back with them may be a little peculiar, I mean with regard to what property they can annex, but they are far from being the lowest class of people.

8966. Does your evidence in regard to the hop-pickers apply to the ordinary agricultural labourers ?—They are a rather different class, and many of them come out for a holiday.

8967. Therefore presumably we could not base legislation in regard to ordinary agricultural labourers upon evidence given in regard to hop-pickers and such people who come from a distance for occasional employment ?—To some extent I agree with that; I quite think that the hop-pickers and the fruit-pickers and the ordinary agricultural labourers are three distinct classes.

8968. In regard to the cider question I understood you to say that the old cider apples are not now grown so much because the small farmers are gradually giving up cider-making ?—Yes.

8969. Don't they make cider from what you would call pot fruit ?—Yes. A better kind of cider which they can sell, not the kind of stuff they call drink. The large manufacturers of cider are buying up the good fruit more than they did and the local cider-making at the small farms is going out very fast.

Mr. J. W. W. Bund.

6 Mar. 1907.

8970. Taking into consideration the fact that cider can be given to the labourers at a very small cost to the producer and that the custom is gradually being discontinued, don't you think the matter will work its own cure in time without any legislation, which you admit, I think, would be rather difficult ?—Yes, but it would be a long time first; the cure might not come within the next quarter of a century.

8971. But you admit that there would be a great difficulty in legislation to meet the points that you your self put before this Committee ?—Yes, and that is why I was desirous to come here and put them before your Committee.

8972. Do you think that if cider-giving were done away with the labourer would really be better off ?—I do.

By Mr. Walsh.

8973. You mentioned the case of a boy of fourteen and said the reason why the mother allowed her boy to take the cider was because she thought he ought to have his rights ?—Yes.

8974. What do you think was in the woman's mind —or let me put it in this way, do you think her idea was that his wages were lowered at least to the extent of the cost of cider supplied to him ?—It is difficult to say what a person has in his or her mind ; but I think her idea probably was that the boy had earned the cider and ought to have it.

8975. And that if he had not the cider he ought to have more wages to bring home ?—Yes.

8976. You mentioned the case of a workman, a carpenter who made gates and hurdles. I suppose I may assume that his work would not be of a seasonal nature ? —Quite so.

8977. Although he was rather a worthless fellow he might, so to speak, be a permanent hand, permanently engaged in that kind of work ?—Yes, he would be employed by the job, and not permanently retained on any one farm.

8978. But inasmuch as farmers often require gates and hurdles, his work would be, so to speak, of a permanent character ?—Yes.

8979. His case was that he had earned the cider and had to take it ?—Yes.

8980. He seemed to have been of the same opinion as the mother of the boy, that the wages would have had to be increased to some extent if he had not been forced to take the cider ?—Yes.

8981. So far as you can ascertain the minds of the workers, do you think their idea is that if they did not take the cider their wages would be greater to some proportionate extent ?—I think their position is this ; that the cider is their right, that they have earned the cider and they are going to have it.

8982. And that if the corresponding portion of their labour was not convertible into drink it ought to be convertible into cash ?—Yes. They consider, "We have done so much work, we have earned so much, and we are going to have what we have earned." I am not prepared to say that they would all prefer the money to the drink, because no doubt many of them would prefer the drink.

8983. I was not thinking of their preference, but I understood you to say that the larger farmers who employ permanent labour are gradually letting the cider giving system lapse, and that as a result the wages of these labourers have been increased ?—Yes.

8984. And so far as you can ascertain that would represent an increase probably of from 1s. 6d. to 2s. per week on their wages ?—Yes.

8985. Does not that seem to imply, if the smaller farmers were also to abandon the system of supplying cider, that the law of supply and demand would probably raise the wages of their labourers to a similar extent, and that thereby the whole family, including the wife and children, would participate in the improvement ?—I think that if the custom of giving cider was generally abandoned there would be a general rise in wages ; and with regret I may add that I believe the opposition of a number of small farmers is due to the fact that they know this, and have therefore opposed giving up the supply of cider.

8986. In the case of labourers permanently employed they receive, so far as you can ascertain, increased wages in consideration of the supply of cider being abandoned ? —Yes, and I think a better class of labourers obtainable.

8987 In the case of seasonal labour, I suppose the demand, although not quite so effective, is often very urgent ?—Yes.

8988. That kind of labour is largely supplied from the Black Country ?—Yes.

8989. And that practically the same class of people come season after season ?—Yes.

8990. So that although it is only seasonal, it is composed of practically the same element year after year ?— Yes. And as Chairman of our Education Committee I may mention that we arrange the school holidays so that the children can go with their parents.

8991. The demand being urgent for this class of labour, the stress being immediate, and the people themselves being year after year the same class and knowing all the circumstances, does it not seem as though they themselves would shortly find out the increased value of their labour if the system of supplying cider was abandoned ?—It has not got to them yet. I am afraid they are not yet educated up to that.

8992. Suppose this Committee or Parliament were to say that inasmuch as for a long term of years the value of these people's labour in cash has to some extent been taken from them by cider being substituted, and the object of Parliament being that all wages should be paid in coin, would these people not find out soon their real rights and come up to the level of the more permanent labourers of whom you have spoken ?—I should hope so, but at present that is only a hope, because most of them do look forward to enjoying themselves, as they term it, on their holiday.

8993. I suppose you are aware that in connection with many industries intoxicants are entirely forbidden ?— Yes, quite so.

8994. First of all, perhaps, for the sake of safety, and secondly for the sake of discipline ?—Yes, and very properly, if I may say so.

8995. I suppose the consideration of safety would hardly arise in this case, but is it not just as necessary that there should be discipline in the villages where a large outside population is brought in at certain seasons ? —I quite agree with you that it would be a very great blessing if there was no drink given to these people at all.

8996. For the sake of social order at least ?—Yes, and for the sake of order amongst these people themselves. The accommodation for these hop pickers is very bad indeed. They are put into cow houses or cart sheds or anywhere, and if one or two of them get drunk and kick up a row it disturbs all the others and leads to fighting and all sorts of trouble. Then with regard to safety, they have fires in the farmyard to cook their food, and it is dangerous to have a drunken fellow kicking the fire about.

8997. I only used the term safety in a comparative sense. With regard to the permanent labourers amongst whom the giving of cider has been abandoned, have you heard of any large farmers who employ them, complaining of either the quantity or quality of the work now done ?—No.

8998. Are you aware of any material number of the labourers themselves who would desire to revert to the old system ?—I think some of the old people say in a grumbling tone that things are not quite so good for them as they used to be when more drink was given.

8999. Although it is a fact that wages have increased ? —Yes, but they do not always think of that.

9000. Speaking broadly, are you aware of many cases ?— No. I should say, speaking broadly, that the people are fairly content, and I think the best class of them would say that they are happier.

By Mr. Maddison.

9001. You have told us that there has been an increase of wages in some cases through the non-giving of cider. Are there many farmers in your county who do not give cider ?—Yes. One of Lord Dudley's largest tenants, a Mr. Best, began the system of refusing to give cider, and one consequence was that for a time he had the greatest difficulty in getting any labour at all. He farms some 900 or 1,000 acres, and was a large hop-grower. The largest occupiers now, or many of them, do not give cider.

9002. You may have heard that in the evidence of one witness, Mr. Davis, who appeared before the Committee, it is stated that he only knew one bona fide tenant farmer who declined to give cider ?—He is, I think, the President of the Worcestershire Tenant Farmers' Association, and is anxious to protect the right of the farmer to give cider. He was no doubt speaking of his own immediate neighbourhood, where they are nearly all small farmers, that district is one of the most backward, out-of-the-way places in the country.

9003. Similar evidence was given by a Mr. Parkes, who said he could only mention the cases of two farmers ?—He was the Chairman of the Worcestershire Chamber of Agriculture and lives in another part of the county. He is a person who I should not think had much experience in cider giving because cider is not so much given there, but he stands up for the rights of the farmers and says they are losing money and ought not to have any further restrictions placed upon them.

9004. We were told by a witness that since the passing of the 1887 Act there has been an increase of perhaps 2s. per week in the wages, and that since that time cider has not gone into the contracts but was made a free gift. Is that increase what you referred to when you differentiated between those who do give cider and those who do not ?—I think those farmers who do not give cider have to pay a little more in wages, and probably that amounts to between 1s. 6d. and 2s. per week.

9005. Some evidence given to us was to the effect that cider was not in the contract, that it was made a free gift sometimes given and sometimes withheld, according to the season or to varying circumstances, and that the same wages prevailed whether cider was given or not. Is that your view ?—No. I quite think that the fact of cider not being given has raised the wages of the men in such cases and this may have had some effect in producing some rise of wages elsewhere.

9006. Is there an all-round rise in wages ?—I do not think there is.

9007. What should you think would be the cost to the farmer of the sort of cider he gives to his labourers ?—Little more than the cost of the labour used in making it.

9008. We have had it in evidence that it would cost the farmer on the average 3d. per week per man for the cider he would give. Would you put it at something like that figure ?—Yes, probably not more.

9009. If wages have risen from 1s. 6d. to 2s. per week and the cider which the farmer gives only costs 3d. per week per man, the change is very much against the interests of the farmer ?—Oh yes, that is what some of those gentleman protest against.

9010. It has been an advantage to the labourers ?—Yes.

9011. You have told us that those who give cider usually pay a little less than those who do not ?—Yes.

9012. In looking through the returns before us I find that in almost every case cider is given ?—Yes, many of the smaller farmers give it in the agricultural districts.

9013. Have you any cases in your mind where there is a difference of from 1s. 6d. to 2s. in money to the workers who do not get cider ?—Yes, I have known such cases.

9014. You have given clear evidence from your large knowledge as a magistrate and as a public man in your county that the giving of cider, whether it is by contract or as a free gift, does have a bad effect on the workmen ?—That is my opinion.

9015. You are somewhat influenced by the effect of alcohol upon heredity, and environment, etc., especially in the case of the children ?—Yes.

9016. Upon public grounds (apart from the question of Truck) I understand you think that there should be a definite wage without the giving of drink ?—Yes, and perhaps I may say I am told by various district medical officers that certain complaints, such as stone, are much more common in cider than in other counties.

9017. We have had some evidence about the selling of cider by farmers to workpeople in quantities of 4½ gallons. Now, suppose we were to prevent the giving of cider by farmers, do you apprehend that any danger might arise from the men buying such large quantities more frequently than they now do from the farmer ?—I am not quite clear with regard to the quality of the cider which some of the farmers might sell, and if large quantities are sold to the workmen, there ought to be some provision, perhaps under the Food and Drugs Act, with regard to ensuring the quality.

9018. That is not quite my point. I was speaking about social order. Of course you are aware that there is nothing in law to prevent a farmer selling 4½ gallons of cider to one of his labourers ?—Quite so.

9019. Then if the labourers had extra money in lieu of the value of the cider now sometimes given, do you think there would be any tendency on the part of the workmen to buy extra quantities and so furnish themselves with additional facilities for a drinking bout ?—No, I think they might be allowed to buy the larger quantity.

9020. As a magistrate, you would not fear any serious violation of social order in consequence ?—No.

9022. My point is, would not the sale of larger quantities after work result probably in even greater drunkenness than the giving of cider in small quantities during work ? If a labourer buys 4½ gallons what is he going to do with it ? Is he likely to drink it until he cannot stand ?—He would probably take much of it home, but there again much would depend upon what kind of woman the wife was.

9023. Then you do see some little danger in it ?—Yes. The danger is somewhat confirmed by my Welsh experience, yet I am not sure that it might not be a way out of the difficulty.

9024. Assuming for the moment that we interfere with the giving of cider, do you see any danger of serious evasion by the farmers selling to the labourers these 4½ gallon casks for a merely nominal sum in order to make the gift in that form ?—I had not thought of that. I suppose you mean that a farmer might sell a 4½ gallon cask for a 1d. if he was forbidden to give it free. I think that is extremely likely.

9025. I rather share your view, would you not greatly dislike to see an Act which is evaded and not run, as it were ?—In a case of that kind I think I should convict and should say that it is a colourable evasion of the statute : not a bona fide sale.—I mean if such a case was brought before me as a magistrate. If a farmer allowed a man to buy a large cask of cider for the nominal price of 1d. or 2d., when the real price was perhaps 2d. a pint, I should regard that as a colourable evasion of the Act and I should convict. I don't know if I would be upheld, but I should risk it.

9026. Do you not think that this question of the sale of intoxicating drinks by farmers ought to be dealt with in some sort of way under the Licensing Acts. Do you approve of such a power of sale ?—Candidly, I do not.

9027. You made one suggestion which I admit startled me a little, viz., that all farmers should register their contracts with all their labourers. Would not many small farmers find that requirement rather irritating ?—No doubt they would.

9028. Then would you really suggest that as a thing that would be desirable ?—It is a choice of evils. In working out the compensation under the Licensing

Mr. J. W. W. Bund. 6 Mar. 1907.

Act of 1904, we have found that the profits on the sale of cider are far larger than on the sale of anything else, either beer or spirits, and that on cider houses one has to give a much higher rate of compensation than on other houses.

By Mr. Delevingne.

9029. You drew a distinction between the permanent agricultural labourer and the seasonal labourer, especially with reference to the giving of cider during a day's work or in the evening at the close of the day's work?—Yes.

9030. Would you draw this distinction between the two cases—that in the first instance the cider is given as refreshment to enable the labourer better to do his work, not as part of his reward or remuneration for labour done; whereas in the second case it is given as part of his remuneration for work done?—To some extent, yes.

9031. In the second case the cider is not given as a refreshment to enable a man to do his work?—No.

9032. Would you say that the evils against social order or the danger to social order are greater in the second case than in the first?—Certainly. In the first case the farmer looks after the man and sees that he does his work.

9033. Then the second case is the worse?—Oh, yes.

9034. You said that many of the large farmers had given up the practice of giving cider. Do the large farmers go in much for hop and fruit growing?—Yes, some of them do. I know of one who has 150 acres of hops and a large area of fruit.

9035. Do they employ seasonal labour?—Yes.

9036. Do they find any difficulty in getting such labour?—Yes, several of them have complained that workers leave for other places where drink is given.

9037. Is that a recent difficulty?—The man I am thinking of is now dead, and perhaps things have quieted down lately in that respect, but we still have cases from time to time. Within the last few weeks a tolerably large farmer came and asked me to have a notice put out about the Truck Act, as he had such difficulty about his labourers; that if he did not do something he should not be able to get anyone and might have to break the law.

9038. Do you know any other industry in which a similar custom prevails of giving drink?—No I do not.

By the Chairman.

9039. In the case of purchase which you have described the purchase of cider is at a very cheap figure?—Yes.

9040. Now, whether or not one individual labourer consumes the whole quantity, you can see that a number of labourers might easily club together and obtain a very adequate supply, to say the least of it, for the whole lot of them?—Yes.

9041. And that could be done for a merely fractional sum?—Yes.

9042. And the result in drunkenness would be the same?—Yes.

9043. In order to make your suggestion of the exclusion of cider supply effective I suppose you would require legislation to prevent the giving of it as a part of wages and at the same time enact that it shall not be either given or sold by the farmer to his employees; that would be an effective exclusion so far as the farmer was concerned?—Yes.

9044. Do you see any difficulty in definitely suggesting that to us?—What I feel about it is this, that it would be at once said by the farmers that you were putting further restrictions upon them.

9045. In short they would use the same argument with reference to the sale of cider for a nominal figure as they do with reference to its gratis supply?—Yes.

9046. But, in principle and looking to the result, the matter stands pretty much on the same footing, does it not?—Yes, the suggestion about men clubbing together does indicate a real source of danger.

9047. We have been looking through the returns you furnished and I am sorry to suggest any further trouble, but we should be very glad if one of your staff could put all the particulars upon one sheet without the repetitions, and then we could append it to your evidence?—If you please, and I understand you would like to have the returns showing the drunkenness during the hop-picking seasons as compared with other times.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

9048. Is it the practice in your part of the country to let several cottages with the farm?—Yes.

9049. Do you consider that that often bears hardly on the labourers?—Yes, although I do it myself.

9050. Could that system be done away with?—I object to it very much. When I was young and enthusiastic I tried to do away with it, but I had to give up the attempt.

9051. Would you not consider it a system of truck that bears very hardly upon the agricultural labourers?—Yes, very.

Mr. N. BUCKNER; was called, and Examined.

Mr. H. Buckner. 6 Mar. 1907.

By the Chairman.

9052. I understand you are secretary of the East London Government Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses?—Yes.

9053. And live at 38, Tredegar Square, Mile End Road?—Yes.

9054. How long have you held that position as secretary?—Since January last, but I have been in the Union since we amalgamated and I was a member when we were independent from ten to fifteen years ago.

9055. What is your line of business?—I am a machinist.

9056. A practical tailor?—Yes.

9057. There are certain conditions prevailing in your trade that you desire to give evidence about?—Yes.

9058. Do you know about the Government clothing contractors?—Yes, I have worked for several of them.

9059. Where are they mostly located?—There is one (N4) in the South-West and others (O4, P4, R4, and S4) in the East End.

9060. You are speaking, of course, of London?—Yes.

9061. Is it a fact that several of these Government clothing contractors supply all the necessary sewings?—Yes.

9062. For the making of the garments?—Yes.

9063. Whereas some contractors cause their workpeople to buy the necessary sewings?—Yes.

9064. In the former case the worker I suppose knows exactly how much he receives for the make of the garment?—Undoubtedly.

9065. Is the work done on piece?—Yes, it is piece work.

9066. Take the case of an ordinary workman like yourself, competent and in average good health: what wage would he make?—At present upon Government work the pay is very bad; whether for the Post Office or in khaki work for the War Office the wage might be about 25s. per week, working hard, the rate has been so badly reduced.

9067. Are there also women employed?—Yes.

9068. What is their average wage?—From 12s to 15s.

9069. For the same length of day that the men work?—Yes.

9070. What is the number of hours per working day?—Usually from eight to seven, but sometimes from eight to eight.

9071. Where do you work?—At T4.

9072. The contractors have all establishments of their own?—Yes, indoors.

9073. Is Government work ever done in the homes of the workers?—No.

9074. I understood you to say that there is a variety of practice and that some contractors themselves pay for the sewings whilst others charge the workpeople ?—Yes.

9075. What is the amount charged for sewings ?—It varies with different firms. For instance, U4 charge 8½d. for a reel for black silk; P4 5½d. for a reel of black silk, O4 5½d., and R4 7½d.

9076. What kind of Government work do you do with black silk ?—Artillery tunics, cloaks, and infantry grey coats.

9077. For these same tunics some contractors supply the sewings free ?—Yes, all included.

9078. Is there any difference in the wage given when the worker has to pay for the sewings as compared with the cases when he has not to pay for them ?—Where the sewings are supplied free the price for the garments is higher than where the workman has to buy the sewings.

9079. That is contrary to what one would expect ?—Undoubtedly; yet it is true.

9080. Then there is a variety of prices charged for the sewings as you have explained ?—Yes. The sewings must be bought by the reel. For instance, I may have a garment given to me to make which requires black silk. and my work may be approved, but before I have used the whole of the reel of black silk I may have a scarlet tunic thrown in and then I have to buy scarlet thread. After having bought these additional sewings I may not get another similar garment for weeks to make and the unused sewings which I have bought accumulate in my box or bag and may have to lie there for a long time.

9081. In such cases a worker cannot forecast from one week to another what is to be his exact wage ?—No.

9082. Is that considered a grievance by the workers ?—Yes, undoubtedly.

9083. When sewings are supplied by the contractors is there any waste of the sewings ?—No.

9084. Who superintends and protects the contractors against such waste ?—The worker, when he wants more sewings has to take back the empty reel or spool to the firm before another is given in its place, and if a reel is returned which has not been fully used it can be handed on by the firm to another worker engaged on similar work. The spool has to be returned.

9085. Then the contractors can at once detect whether the workers have wasted the material or are using too much ?—Yes.

9086. Where the sewings are paid for by the contractor have you heard of complaints of waste by the workmen ?—No.

9087. Does the workman have to incur sometimes a cost of several shillings for sewings payable out of his wage of 24s. or 25s. per week on account of different coloured threads required for the various garments which are given to him to make ?—Yes. It amounts to about 2d. per garment. A man may receive a garment for making which he is paid 1s. but all the different sewings must be bought by the reel, which may amount to 1s. 6d, or 2s., and thus he receives no payment for this garment and his expenses are only returned if he has many more similar garments to make, since he only uses a small amount of the sewings for each. Each firm has its own prices for the sewings used in the making of similar garments and forces its people to buy these from the firm. All sewings that are taken on account are deducted by the firm at the end of the week from the wages, irrespective of the amount left, and, should the employee be dismissed or leave the place, the sewings which he has in hand are useless since each firm refuses to permit the use of any but its own sewings.

9088. If you get a khaki garment given you to make, and we will assume that you have not been working on the same kind before, I understand you must get sewings of the proper colour; how much would you have to pay for a full supply of the necessary sewings ?—We may be charged 6d. per reel of thread and it would require two reels of thread and perhaps one reel and a quarter of silk at 7½d. per reel for a dozen garments.

9089. One of your hardships seems to be that you may be left with surplus sewings in your hands ?—Yes, that is one point, and it is emphasised when we go from one firm to another, who charge different prices and make us buy fresh sewings from them.

Mr. N. Buckner.

6 Mar. 1907

9090. Does your branch of the Amalgamated Tailors Society protest against this system ?—Undoubtedly.

9091. They would like the sewings to be always supplied so that a worker may know what exact wages he will receive ?—Yes; the same as in London County Council and other municipal contracts.

9092. You think that system should be followed by all Government contractors ?—Yes; several of them do it.

By Mrs. Tennant.

9093. Do you include in your union any workers who work direct for the Government ?—No.

9094. Is there the same quality and quantity of silk in the 5½d. reel as in the 8d. reel?—No. The specification says that 18 silk is to be used and 50 thread, but if we used 18 silk we should have to take our own money from home to pay for the work. We use 24 silk, which is rather common rubbish.

9095. Do the contractors know quite well what kind of cottons and silk you use ?—Yes. We have to buy the sewings in-doors, our employers supply them.

9096. Then are they not themselves working to specification ?—Undoubtedly not.

9097. Is the fair wages clause in force among the contractors ?—I am sorry to say that I think the fair wages clause was really made for the sweaters.

9098. Would you explain that statement ?—As far as I remember the fair wages clause states that the current rate of wages shall be paid to competent workmen—the current rate—but I have proved absolutely that that may mean the sweating price paid by contractors. I have heard a Government Inspector say that 25s. was a fair wage for a workman.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

9099. I understand your contention is that one factory paid less than another for the same work. What remedy would you suggest ?—I would suggest so far as the fair wage clause is concerned that there should be a listed price paid, and issued with the contracts, so that the workmen would know what money would come to them. If that is impossible then I think the clause should read not the current rate of wages, but the trade's union wage, so that we should have something definite to go by.

9100. You complain that in some cases you have to pay for the sewings ?—Yes, that is one of our contentions. We think they should be furnished by the contractor, and that there should be no deductions for sewings, twists, etc. Sewings are part of the material of a garment.

By Mr. Walsh.

9101. As I understand, the real trouble is this, that having once bought a number of reels of a particular colour for work at one factory, you may be discharged or leave for another factory, where the unfinished reels for which you have paid would be of no use to you ?—Yes.

9102. When you get into the next factory, you have to buy fresh reels, making a double cost with perhaps the same result in the third place ?—That is one of our disadvantages.

9103. Is it not the fact, that although you have to buy these reels in the factories where you are employed, yet in consequence of the system to which I have referred you are driven sometimes to other expedients and have to fake the thing by using sometimes an old reel of your own ?—Yes, a kind of fraud.

9104. Your contention is that these purchases ought not to be required of the workmen, and that when work is given out, the contractor should supply all these necessaries?—Quite so, the sewings are part of the material of the garment.

9105. Can you indicate to us roughly the length of time that has passed since you bought those reels in the box which you produce ?—I bought several of them eighteen months or two years ago. For about a year I have been working with a firm who supply the sewings.

Mr. N. Buckner.
6 Mar. 1907.

9106. Would any of these articles be of use to you under any other firm who might employ you?—Not openly, although I might get hold of a decent foreman who might wink at my using one reel.

By Mr. Maddison.

9107. What would be the cost or value of the spools and reels now in your box here?—Perhaps about 5s.

9108. Have you as much at home?—No, perhaps 1s. 6d. worth.

9109. That illustrates what you said about your loss?—Yes, that is one of the points.

9110. How do the prices for the reels that you have to buy in the works compare with outside prices for the same article?—I have not examined into that, but if my wage amounted as it sometimes has done to £2 in a week there might be deductions ranging from 4s. to 13s. per week for sewings.

9111. Do the prices charged by your employers compare favourably with what you would have to pay if you bought the same quantity and quality outside?—I cannot say: I have never bought the things outside.

9112. Then it is not a part of your complaint that the employers charge excessive prices for these reels?—No, I cannot say the prices are excessive.

9113. Your point is not that they charge more than the market price for the reels?—I have been told by the inspector that they are supposed to charge cost prices.

9114. What attitude does your union take up with reference to prices?—In Government work we have absolutely no power at all.

9115. Does not the union have some standard of price, and would not that be affected by the information you have given us as to the firms which charge for sewings and those which do not?—Our trade union wage is not paid for these garments.

9116. Then your union does not operate, as it were, with regard to these complaints?—We protest about the sewings as much as we can.

9117. Would you say as a general proposition that a workman takes most care of that which belongs to himself?—Yes.

9118. Still, you have not heard of any justifiable complaint on account of waste?—No.

By Mr. Delevingne,

9119. You work in the factory?—Yes.

9120. Perhaps you are aware that at present under the Truck Act, 1896, it is legal for a firm to make deductions for sewings?—Undoubtedly, or they would not do it.

9121. Subject to certain conditions?—I do not know much about the conditions.

9122. There must be a contract, the deductions must not exceed the cost price, and particulars must be given to the worker each time a deduction is made. Are these conditions observed in your factory. Is there any notice posted up in the factory?—Only in some cases. I think there is usually a notice in the office.

9123. Are particulars always given. Do you get a wage note at the end of the week which shows the particulars of deductions?—Oh yes.

9124. What you want is an alteration of the law to provide that it shall not be lawful for an employer to make any deductions for sewings from the wages of his workers?—Yes.

9125. Supposing it were made the law that an employer could make no deductions for sewings, would it not be open to him to make the workers buy their reels outside?—He would scarcely do that, or they would only buy inferior sewings.

9126. Could he not exercise a sufficient check upon that?—He could not examine all the sewings.

9127. Do you speak for out-workers as well as for indoor workers?—In the ordinary tailoring trade the sewings are supplied. It is different with Government work.

By the Chairman,

9128. We are glad to have had your evidence.

THIRTY-FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 13th March 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. THOS. RATLIFFE ELLIS, called; and Examined.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.
13 Mar. 1907.

By the Chairman.

9129. You are a solicitor?—I am.

9130. You act as Law Clerk and Secretary to the Mining Association of Great Britain?—I do.

9131. You are also Law Clerk and Secretary to the Lancashire and Cheshire Coalowners' Association?—I am.

9132. Over what area of country does the operation of your association extend?—Over Great Britain.

9133. Wherever there are coal measures, I suppose?—Yes, wherever there are coal measures. We have local associations in Scotland, Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, the two Yorkshires, West and South, Lancashire, Cheshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, North Wales, Warwickshire, Staffordshire, Forest of Dean, and in South Wales and Monmouthshire.

9134. So that you represent the association which substantially is a federation of the various local associations all over the country?—That is so. It is a federation, and we have provision in our constitution for the admission of individual members where they may not happen to be members of their local association.

9135. Do you happen to have a figure, speaking roughly, of the number of employees?—The persons employed would be the whole of the mining population in the kingdom, which I believe is 800,000 or 900,000; something of that sort.

9136. You offer your evidence at the request, I believe, and on behalf of this large organisation, the Mining Association?—I do.

9137. We are anxious to have from your point of view, Mr. Ellis, if you will oblige us with it, a general statement of the course of legislation. Of course we begin with the Statute of 1831. The starting ground of the subject committed to this committee is, of course, the Statute of 1831?—That is so. The Truck Act of the year 1831 provided (inter alia) that in all contracts for hiring, wages were to be made payable, and the entire wages were to be actually paid, in coin only. No contract was to be made as to how a workman should lay out or expend his wages, and it was expressly made illegal to discharge the wages by the delivery to the workman of goods.

9138. Before you pass from that, you are referring particularly to Section 1?—Yes, Section 1. Under the 23rd Section of that Act, however, there was excepted from its provisions contracts for the supply of medicine or medical attendance, fuel, materials, tools, or implements for use by miners, rent in respect of any house occupied by the workman, and amounts due in respect of the above-mentioned were (inter alia) permitted to be deducted from the wages; provided that the amount deducted did not exceed the real and true value of the same, and that the agreement for the deduction was in writing and signed by the workman.

9139. In giving that statement that you have now done you are really citing the Act of Parliament and confining the citation to those points which affect the coal mining industry?—That is so.

9140. With regard to the Act of 1831 I may have questions to put afterwards about that, but we might just take the several steps of legislation now if you will be so kind. The next was the Truck Act of 1887?—That was the next. That was an amending Act. By Section 8 of that Act any arrangement for a deduction from wages for sharpening or repairing tools must be made by agreement not forming part of the conditions of hiring; and by Section 9 where deductions are made (inter alia) in respect of medicine, medical attendance, or tools, the workmen are entitled to have an audit of the deductions once at least in every year. Then the next amending Act was in the year 1896. That Act does not legalise any deductions from wages which the preceding Truck Acts do not permit, but it requires that certain deductions which may be made from wages without violating the provisions of the Truck Acts of 1831 and 1887 shall not be allowed if they are not made under the conditions prescribed by that Act.

9141. The importance of that Act would appear to be that Parliament had addressed itself to the question of seeing that the conditions with reference to fines and deductions were made the subject of common knowledge between the employer and the employed?—Yes. Under that Act there must be an agreement for deduction. If you take the first section of the Act that agreement must exist between the employer and the workman. It may be, as I understand the Act, a general agreement for fines. If that is so, then the terms of the contract must be advertised in accordance with sec. 1 (1) (a). The first condition is that "the terms of the contract are contained in a notice kept constantly affixed at such place or places open to the workmen, and in such a position that it may be easily seen, read, and copied by any person whom it affects." That is one thing that you may do. You may have a general contract that fines shall be imposed as a part of the condition of service, I presume, and if you have it in that way you must advertise it, you must affix it so that it can be seen; or there must be a contract in writing signed by the workman.

9142. I understand you are the adviser of the Mining Association in regard to this matter of the Truck Act, and what should be the correct procedure under it. We are rather anxious to have your view with regard to the latter part of the evidence you have just given, namely, the distinction between what you quite justly characterise as a general contract and a particular contract, the latter being preceded by the words "or the contract is in writing, signed by the workman?"—When the Truck Act of 1896 was passed, I prepared for the coal-owners a form of contract, but I did not think that in the coal trade it would be very convenient to have a number of fines as a part of the general contract and have them advertised, because you would have to put a maximum fine. That was the only way in which it occurred to me. That I thought might be objectionable, and therefore I came to the conclusion that the better plan to carry out the Act would be that there should be a compliance with the second condition, that is that there should be a contract in writing signed by the workman for each particular fine as it might be imposed, and I prepared a form, and this is the form I prepared. The instructions given were that this form in a book with a counterfoil would be in the possession of the official, and that when the offence was committed which was to be dealt with by a fine, this should be signed there and then by the workman, and it is in this form:* "I agree to pay a fine of (blank)"—that would be filled in at the time—"for the undermentioned act or omission"—then shortly stated is the omission or the act in respect of which the fine is imposed—"and I hereby authorise you to deduct the same from my wages." That is only one condition of the Act of 1896. The contract is in writing for that particular offence. It specifies, that is under (b), "The acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed and the amount of the fine or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained." We specify the amount of the fine. The other conditions do not need to be put upon the face of the contract, but they are conditions upon which the legality of the fine depends. That is (c), "the fine imposed under the contract is in respect of some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer or interruption or hindrance to his business." Notwithstanding the agreement, notwithstanding the signing of this document, still if the offence for which the fine is agreed to be paid does not fall within (c) then of course the proceeding would be illegal under the provisions of this Act. Then the next is (d), "that the amount of the fine is fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case." That can be discussed either by the inspector calling attention to it, because a register of these fines is kept at the colliery and the inspector can see it when he thinks fit, and he can call attention to it, and can take proceedings on the ground that it is a violation of the Truck Act; or the workman himself, under the provision of the Act of 1896 can take proceedings against the employer, and if the tribunal dealing with this is of opinion that the amount charged as a fine is in excess of what it ought to be, then he can recover the excess. The employer would be subject to proceedings against him for violation of the Truck Act, and the workman would be entitled to recover from the employer the excess of any amount which might have been imposed upon him beyond what the tribunal might think was fair and reasonable under the circumstances. The next thing is that when the wages are paid to a man he must have particulars of these deductions. That is in (b) of sub-sec. 2, "particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed and the amount thereof are supplied to the workman on each occassion when a deduction or payment is made." I provided in that case that it should be put upon the pay ticket, and the form that I suggested for the pay ticket, and which I think is pretty generally adopted, was this, (see Exhibit D of Appendix X.). Of course that is an enlarged size; the pay tickets are much smaller.

9143. The pay sheets are these little tickets?—Yes. First the gross amount of the wages is put, and then there are two kinds of deductions, one is a deduction which is made by deducting it from the wages—I will deal with that if I may in a moment—and the other are deductions for payments which are made by the employer at the request of the workman.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.
13 Mar. 1907.

9144. I am anxious to get your view of the evolution so to speak of the legislation first, and then I may have a few questions to put to you upon the individual Statutes. You had reached the Act of 1896 and you have given us your view of its provisions. Have you any further Act to refer to ?—I have no further Act to refer to.

9145. I should like to ask you in particular in regard to the Act of 1896. I have gathered from your evidence that the document headed " Colliery, Truck Act, 1896," was a document compiled by yourself ?—It was.

9146. In doing so you were, to the best of your judgment giving effect to that Statute ?—I was.

9147. May I ask you has this form which was drawn up by you officially been in very general use throughout the collieries of the country ?—I think so. I can speak more particularly of my own county of Lancashire and of Cheshire, but it was sent round to the different local associations, and of course each of those local associations has the benefit of the advice of some local solicitor, and no doubt subject to such modifications as he may have thought fit, I may say that that has been adopted.

9148. So that when we have this document before us we are really confronted with the actual contract which is to be attacked if there is any attack possible, or to be defended if there is any defence possible ?—I think so.

9149. Were you aware—I fancy you would be aware—of the state of matters prior to 1896 ?—Yes, I think I was.

9150. You would be aware also of the policy of the Act being prompted by a desire to let master and workman know beforehand how they stood ?—With reference to fines ?

9151. With reference to fines ?—Notwithstanding some of the recent decisions I think that there was no illegality prior to the Act of 1896—That it was no breach of the Truck Act that a fine should be deducted, provided that it had been agreed to. I do not think before the Truck Act there was an agreement for each fine, but I think there were understandings that if a man committed offences, he might be fined.

9152. Will you allow me to say that it is probably not advisable either for the Committee or for yourself to proceed by way of criticism of the decisions. We would rather get the advantage of your evidence upon the view of the statute of 1896 upon which the parties have hitherto proceeded. You see that raises the issue before us ?—Yes.

9153. Upon that, my first question to you is : You were aware were you not, that prior to the passing of this Act of 1896, there was a desire, and apparently a legislative intention, to allow workmen on the one hand and employers upon the other to know definitely how they stood ?—That was so.

9154. And accordingly the first section, and in particular Sub-section (1) (a) prescribed that the terms of the contract were to be contained in a notice kept constantly affixed and so on. The real object of that, I understand, was to close the mouths of workmen from complaining if deductions which were agreed to and publicly notified beforehand had been made ?—Before the passing of that Act my view is and was that the imposition of a fine was not a violation of the Truck Act because it was not paying the man his wages in something other than cash ; it was not paying him at all, and it was no more a violation of the Truck Act than if you had not paid the man any wages. Complaints were made, I do not think in the coal trade much because I think the miners' representatives look after the employers too well to have much grievance of that kind, but it was said that in some cases the employee did not know really how much he was going to get when he had finished his work at the week end—there were so many deductions of one sort and another made that the employees never knew where they were.

9155. Do you admit that that was an evil to be remedied ?—I agree, and I think a very serious evil. I think the Act of 1896 very properly placed such restrictions upon fining as to remedy that evil.

9156. That is just the next question that I am coming to. So far as what you might call general contracts are concerned the remedy seems to have been obtained by the scrupulous provision for public notification—I mean public in the sense of accessibility of the workman to it ?—Yes, but I think there is a more important question than that, and that is this, that the whole scheme of the Act of 1896 is that there is to be a bargain between the employer and the employed that a fine should be inflicted.

9157. We are agreed about that. The point I wish to put to you is that in questions of general contract there is an express provision, is not there, for what you might call public notification ?—There is.

9158. Do you think yourself that that was a sound provision ?—I do.

9159. I think you have explained that the object was to allow the workman to know beforehand practically what would be the net earnings that he would receive ?—In that particular part of the clause ?

9160. In that particular part of the clause ?—But the second part of the clause enables that——

9161. I want you if you will be so good as to fix your attention upon it as a sound legislative object. I think you admit broadly that when there is a private contract there is of course not any necessity for public notification under the first portion of Section (1) (a) ?—I agree.

9162. Accordingly is it your opinion or not that there being no necessity for public notification there is any necessity or all the more necessity for private notification ?—I do not think there is any necessity for private notification—if you take the other provisions of the Act with the special contract.

9163. But I am taking all the other provisions of the Act with both the special and the general contract ; you may take it that we are assuming all the other provisions of the Act with both the general and the special contract. I want to get your view which I may sum up thus in this question : is it your view that where there is no general contract publicly notified there need be no private contract previously entered into when the contract of employment begins ?—I think if there is no contract to inflict fines when the employment begins or arising afterwards there could be no public notification. The public notification may be of a contract expressly entered into or it may be of an implied contract by a person working under conditions of which he has become aware after he has entered into the employment, but there must be one or the other. It must be a contract express or implied or you could not notify it ; you could not advertise it and affix it.

9164. You admit that the notification which is pointed to in the earlier portion of subsection (1) (a) is a notification for the purpose of letting parties know when the contract of employment begins what will be the result to both parties when it ends ?—That is certainly the object of it. I am not so sure how far it is carried out, if you put a maximum fine.

9165. I want to get at the object of it ?—Yes.

9166. So far as that object is concerned it is a perfectly intelligible and legitimate object ?—I agree.

9167. So far as the second portion is concerned, namely the private contract, do I understand that you have prepared this document which has since been proceeded on for the past eleven years, upon the footing that parties may not know when the contract of employment is entered into how they will stand at the end of the contract ?—At the end of the week.

9168. At the end of the week ?—Beyond this——

9169. Do you assent to that subject to an explanation ?—I assent to that subject to this, that at collieries where this practice is in vogue, where these special contracts are made, it is perfectly well known that a man is subject to be either brought before the magistrates or fined for offences.

9170. I will come to that. You see I am rather anxious to get, because it is so important to get, the sort of scheme upon which the practice under the Act has been carried out. There may be a difference of view with regard to it and my duty is to elicit your view, and I am very glad to have the opportunity of doing so. Am I right in saying or am I not, at all events that your scheme and the contracts under it, proceed upon the footing that in so far as regards private contracts for deductions with individuals, there is nothing to prevent these private contracts being entered into in the sense of signing for the deductions only at the end of the week ?—The signing is before the end of the week. The signing is the time when the fine is imposed.

9171. Quite so, when the fine is imposed ?—Yes.

9172. That fine, subject to the other things in the section which is applicable equally to general and particular, is a fine the amount of which may not be known or fixed by either party ?—It has to be agreed.

9173. Please do not let us differ about this ; I mean before it is imposed ?—I do not see how it could be known because the parties have to agree upon it. They have to agree in that particular case that the man will pay and that the employer should impose, by his agreement, a fine of a certain sum of money.

9174. That just brings very clearly into view the fact that it is only after the delinquency or assumed delinquency, that the man is informed that he will not get all his wages, but will get so much less, which he is bound to contract for in writing in order to conform to the 1896 Act ?—He is not bound to agree—he is not bound to agree in this way, that he can please himself whether he agrees or not.

9175. Suppose he does not agree ?—Then we could not fine him ; he would be brought before the magistrates in all probability.

9176. Suppose it was not a case of bringing before the magistrates ?—I do not know what the inspector would say in that case. The inspector can require the coal owner or manager to carry out the Act. If there were a breach of any of these regulations, the manager himself would be liable under the Act. If you have the Mines Regulation Act, Section 50, I think it is, you will find that every owner, agent or manager of a mine is liable for any offence committed by any person whomsoever. The only way in which he can relieve himself from that is by doing everything in his power to comply with the Mines Regulation Act. If there is an offence committed against the Act by a workman, and the employer does not take any means to punish it either by a prosecution or by an arrangement with the man to pay a fine, then the inspector would say, I have no doubt, to the manager : " You are equally guilty with him in not having done what you could to carry out these regulations."

9177. Is it your view that everything for which a man is fined is necessarily a thing for which he could be reported and punished ?—That is a large question.

9178. You must surely know about that ?—I have got a number of instances of fines here, and if you like, I will just run through them and see what they are.

9179. I may illuminate the subject, to help you, by saying that the very same language applies to deductions as to fines ?—In the Truck Act ?

9180. In the Truck Act of 1896 ?—That is so, but I am speaking now about the Mines Regulation Act.

9181. I never mentioned the Mines Regulation Act. We are on the Truck Act of 1896 ?—You were asking me what would be the consequence in the case of a man who was neither fined nor brought before the magistrates, and I answer that by saying that probably the owner would be summoned by the inspector for not carrying out the Mines Regulation Act.

9182. Now can we get back to the Act of 1896 and kindly keep the Act before you. I refer you to Section 2 of the Act and I point out to you that there may be deductions, and with regard to any general contract for deductions the same precautions for antecedent publicity are made, and with regard to any private contract for deductions there is just the same language employed, namely : " Or the contract is in writing, signed by the workman." Therefore this language and the alternative between the public and general notified contract and the private and non-notified one, applies equally to fines and deductions ?—It does.

9183. Very well. Therefore, in so far as the Act of 1896 provided for antecedent notification, it has completely failed by its language, as interpreted by you, to effect that in the case of individual contracts ?—I do not quite understand " failed," sir ; I do not know that it has failed.

9184. May I interpret it. It has failed to effect that antecedent notification which by the earlier part of the section seemed to be the object of the legislature on the subject ?—With very great respect, I should think the object of the legislature was in giving the alternative that if you did not choose to adopt the second alternative—otherwise I do not see what the object of the second alternative is at all—you must give this public notice so that a workman might know what he was liable for and how much might be deducted from his wages. But that was not necessary if the parties themselves agreed in writing that there should be deductions from the wages.

9185. May I suggest to you another view, speaking as a lawyer to a very skilled lawyer. When a contract in writing signed by the individual is referred to, it might be argued that what Parliament meant was a contract made in writing signed at the time that the contract of employment was entered into, otherwise you would leave the workman absolutely helpless, or practically helpless when he was fined an unknown amount for an unstipulated offence ?—With very great respect, I could not adopt that view, and I will tell you why. He could not possibly enter into a contract when he undertakes his employment as to the amount which would be inflicted upon him or which he would agree to pay. It is not a question that we are enforcing a fine against him. It is a question whether he would agree to pay for a particular offence. When you put it as part of a general contract, the point is that the man has no option. You do not want his agreement ; you simply say : " This is your contract and I am going to fine you 2s. 6d. or 5s." or whatever it might be. But in the other case, if he chooses to say : " I will not pay," you cannot make him pay.

9186. Under the second part of it you can fine him what you think yourself he ought to pay subject to the other conditions in the Act ?—If he agrees to pay it ; but he can please himself.

9187. Do you say that a private contract, a contract signed by the workman, is preferable to a general contract with the antecedent notification ?—I should think so.

9189. Why should not he know what he is liable to pay ? If 10s. is a reasonable sum then it is a fair contract. Is not that so ?—No, it is not, for this reason : because the conditions of the breach may be very different. One may be a very serious breach and another may be a same offence, but there may be many excusing circumstances in connection with it.

9190. Do you not know that the provision as to the the amount of the fine being fair and reasonable applies to those which are publicly notified ?—I do.

9191. I will show you this list. It contains a long number of fines which have been actually imposed. (Handing document to witness.) Do you represent to us that it would be impossible in practice to catalogue the list of offences such even as you find there ?—I should say it would be impossible except at the risk of a very great injustice being done to a man.

9192. Take as an instance the case of a man taking matches down the pit ?—In a case of that kind I should doubt the wisdom of fining for that. I should think the man ought to be taken before the magistrates for that offence.

9193. Coming to work drunk ?—There again, I think I should bring him before the magistrates for that offence.

9194. Being asleep on duty ?—Again I should say he ought to be brought before the magistrates for that.

9195. You do represent it as a practical impossibility to give a catalogue of fines ?—Yes, in fairness to the men. I should like to impress this upon you if I may ?

9196. Certainly ?—I hope you will excuse me being persistent. It is this : Supposing you adopt the first alternative, the man has no option but to pay the fine; he cannot say: "No, I will not pay the fine," and I do not know if we should have an option whether we should take a fine from him or bring him before the magistrates. This is the difference between them, that in the second alternative we could not enforce the fine unless the man agreed to it. The miners themselves constantly come and say: "Do not take me before the magistrates; fine me." It is in their own interests that they should not be taken before the magistrates.

9197. Would you kindly keep out of your view if possible the alternative of taking them before the magistrate, because there are a great many things as you know, in respect of which deductions are made for which people are not taken before the magistrates at all and could not be?—I should like to see one, sir.

9198. I will give you one. Do you know what dropping a bow is?—No, I do not know what that is.

9199. You know the steel hook with which a man controls his truck?—Down below?

9200. Yes?—Yes.

9201. He lets that fall. You could not take him before the magistrate for that, you know?—It just depends, I do not know quite what the effect of that is. I do not know whether he would be endangering anybody's life or not if he did that.

9202. That offence would involve neither the one nor the other?—If he is not endangering any person's life or doing anything contrary to any special rule, then I do not see that you could take him before the magistrates, but there is a rule to this effect, "No person shall do anything"—I am reading now from the special rules in the Lancashire district—"to endanger his own or another person's life."

9203. Supposing he does not do anything of the sort. You do not say that a miner does not have deductions made from his wages for a great number of things or at least for some things which would not make him criminally responsible under the Mines Regulation Act?—I should not say that. You have given an instance now but I do not know the circumstances. I did not even know of that offence, although I thought I knew most of these offences.

9204. Well suppose he breaks a lamp by accident?—If a miner breaks a lamp by accident he has committed an offence under the Mines Regulation Act, because he has done something that endangers another person's life. You cannot break a lamp down a mine without endangering life.

9205. I do not put it that it was broken when he was down the mine?—I should think he would not be breaking a lamp on the surface. I should think the probability is that it would be for breaking a lamp when he was down the mine.

9206. But suppose he does break a lamp glass, for which he is fined 6d.?—That probably would be when he was down the mine.

9207. Do you represent to us that it would be impossible that that could be done except by the man committing an offence under the Coal Mines Regulation Act?—It depends on the circumstances entirely.

9208. I am taking the circumstances as being possibly those which do not necessitate criminal proceedings?—I could not give a hypothetical opinion of that kind unless I knew what the circumstances were. A lamp, of course, might be broken without doing any harm at all to anybody.

9209. Do you know what coal picking is?—Yes, it is picking it on the surface—picking out, I suppose, the refuse from the coal.

9210. Suppose he is fined a shilling for not doing that properly?—Am I right in my description of it.

By Mr. Walsh.

9211. It is with reference to coal which has not been sold but has been stacked and people come along and pick it—probably a workman?—That is stealing coal, I suppose.

9212. Yes?—Supposing the person says "Do not take me before the magistrates but fine me something."

By the Chairman.

9213. The question is, is that under the Coal Mines Regulation Act?—No, I should think not.

9214. "Breaking a spade." Is that under the Coal Mines Regulation Act?—I should not think so, but you are selecting only a very few of the cases, if you will allow me to say so.

9215. I am selecting something in order to get rid of your idea that everything that is done here involves the alternative of making the offender liable under the Coal Mines Regulation Act to criminal proceedings. You can see for yourself, can you not, that there may be a variety of instances, and that is the point upon which I am anxious to get your view, in which a deduction may be made from a man's wages where the alternatives of criminal responsibility under the Coal Mines Regulation Act does not attach at all?—If you will excuse me saying so, I should not agree with picking out half a dozen cases of that kind as at all proof that there is a variety of instances where fines are imposed where the man is not liable to be taken before the magistrates under the Coal Mines Regulation Act.

9216. Do you put it, then, that there is no such case?—No, not at all.

9217. Then will you please assume that there may be cases of that kind. Will you take it that there are cases which do occur where the offence committed does not bring the man within the Mines Regulation Act at all. I want you to address yourself to that point if you will?—I will take it in this way, that those cases which you have mentioned to me, I should say, are not offences which would fall under the Mines Regulation Act, and the men committing those offences would not be subject to prosecution under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. Of course in the case of the one you mentioned, of picking coal, the offender there would clearly be liable to prosecution for stealing the coal.

9218. Quite so. Having got to that, I now put to you this question. Is it in your view a fair construction of the Act—I suppose it must be in your view a fair construction of the Act—that at the end of the week, or only when an offence or when the alleged offence occurs, the agreement is for the first time to be made for a deduction?—I think that with the protection which is given in the other parts of the Act against an excessive fine it is a perfectly fair arrangement that there should be no general contract enforceable against the workman in respect of fines, but that he should be at liberty if he chooses, with the consent of the employer, to be fined for a particular offence.

9219. Suppose a man does not obey an order to do it or maintains that he has not had instructions to put up a timber, for example, and he is then fined 10s?—Yes.

9220. There is a difference between the parties as to whether instructions were given to him or not. Do not you see that that may be a serious fine, 10s., in a man's wages. Do not you see for yourself, that the workman is put in this position, that if he does not pay exactly what is demanded of him the consequences may be very serious to him?—No, I do not see it. I think that a case like the one you have mentioned might be a case in which either his own or somebody else's life was endangered by his not seeing to the propping of the roof, and if the workman chooses to say, "I will agree to pay a fine," he is not hurt. You cannot impose a fine on him unless he agrees to pay, and if it was a case such as you have mentioned where the man says, "It was not my fault, because I was not told to do it," he would not be likely to accept the imposition of a fine under those circumstances.

9221. Am I to take it that you are quite serious in thinking that this voluntary agreement is sound in principle and works without doing any harm?—I am told on all hands that these fines are almost invariably inflicted at the request of the workman himself, and if that is so I should say that the system does not work any harm. I could not say, of course, that there may not be cases at times where a workman may perhaps be placed in the position of having the alternative put to him of either paying a fine or being discharged. I should not like to say that all the colliery managers all over the kingdom are perfect, but I should say that generally the system works well.

9222. So that I may take it your evidence is to the effect that in so far as the A t of 1896 provided for private contracts, it gave no protection of a similar character to that given in the case of the antecedent knowledge of both parties as to how they would stand ?—It is for this reason——

9223. Pardon me, will you answer my question ?—I must, if you will allow me, draw the distinction between the two classes of contract.

9224. Yes, but first did it or not give any protection ? —It gave no protection, but no protection was necessary, because it was optional with the man at the time whether he paid the fine or whether he did not. If it were not optional with the man, supposing the man could be made to pay a fine, then notification would be necessary by advertisement so that he could see what he was liable to pay, but where he is not liable unless he agrees, such preliminary advertisement is not necessary.

9225. The fines, of course, as you know, imposed under this private system are fairly numerous ?—I should think it varies a good deal at different places. In some places they do not fine so much ; they prosecute. The inspectors, so far as I have heard their opinion, are divided somewhat on the subject. Some think that the Mines Regulation Act would be better enforced if prosecutions were more general and if offenders were brought before the magistrates because of the publicity the proceeding would give. Others think that it would be very hard in many cases of a trifling nature to bring the men before the magistrates, and that the matter should be dealt with by a fine, but all agree that breaches of the Act should not be passed over without punishment of some kind.

9226. You are dealing with breaches of the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—Yes.

9227. You have gone back again to that. I was on the Truck Act of 1896 ?—You cannot very well separate them in some cases.

9228. Will you give us your view in so far as the deductions from wages do not cover things under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, which may be subject to criminal prosecution, whether to that extent at all events the parties should be enabled to know how they stand beforehand, or would you not go that length ?—I will go as far as this on this principle, that if I can compel a man to pay a fine I agree I ought to let him know beforehand what he is liable for, but if I cannot he does not need any such knowledge.

9229. Do you agree that the infliction of certain fines might have a very serious consequence to a man ?—I hope you will not forget what I say, that in a great number of these cases the fine is imposed at the request of the man hi self rather than that he should be taken before a magistrate.

9230. I am rather surprised to hear you say that, but I take it from you that it is so ?—Yes, you may take it from me that they invariably ask to be fined rather than be taken before a magistrate. If a man has committed an offence and he says, "I do not agree to be fined," the probability is that he would either be discharged or he would be taken before the magistrates if it was an offence of such a character as would justify one course or the other.

9231. Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act.

9232. Will you now just keep away from the Coal Mines Regulation Act in order to keep your mind clear on the point under the 1896 Act. Supposing he says, "I will not agree to it ; it is an offence I have not committed, I decline to agree," what do you suggest would be the penalty for the man ?—I think I must ask for some consideration on behalf of the colliery managers. They do not want to press men in that way, and if there was anything unjust about it, with a combination such as exists amongst the miners, and the men were dissatisfied, the employer would very soon hear of it from the miners' agents.

9233. That is a case in which they would invoke their union, you think, in order to remedy what was considered to be an unjust imposition ?—If I was in a Miners' Union and an attempt was made to fine me for a thing that I was not liable for, I should certainly invoke the assistance of my union.

9234. He would be liable in a case of antecedent notification ?—Yes. Of course the man could not invoke either his union or anybody else in that event ; he would not have an option, and he would be liable to pay the fine.

9235. But it would in fact be stated ?—I do not think it ought to be stated.

9236. You think it ought not in fact to be stated ?— I think it would be a much greater evil to the man—a much greater disadvantage to the man.

9237. Why ?—Because he could not refuse to pay the fine.

9238. He would know, at all events, what he had contracted for ?—He would know he had contracted to have a fine imposed upon him.

9239. Do you think there is no advantage in his knowing ?—I do not think in coal mining there is any advantage in his knowing.

9240. It is on that footing you give us your evidence ?— Yes. With reference to the textile industries and many other industries, from what I have heard, the grievance was serious before the passing of the 1896 Act, and I think it would be a great advantage that the person should know what he is liable for in those industries.

9241. But in the coal mining industry you do not think so ?—I do not think so.

9242. You have observed how anxious I have been to dissociate the 1896 Act from the Coal Mines Regulation Act, in order to elicit your view on that head. It is fair to you now to come to any offences under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. I suppose, generally speaking, the offences under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, are offences which might have consequences reaching to the general safety of the pit ?—Yes, because you cannot tell what the consequences of a breach of regulations down below might mean. The safety of the pit depends upon the care which every man takes when he is down below.

9243. I quite see that, and it is in consequence of that that the criminal law takes cogni ance of such a position ? —Yes.

9244. Do you approve of fines for such offences ?—You mean fines by agreement with the men ?

9245. Yes ?—On the whole I do, and I will tell you why. I approve of fines with this qualification, that if there is an offence against the Mines Regulation Act in the interests of discipline there must be some notice taken of the offence. If it is an offence of a trivial nature and the man is a man of good character, a steady working man, probably a caution in the first instance might be sufficient, and I have no doubt that method is adopted. But in other cases there must be something more than that. Now the question is which is the best way and the most considerate way in the interests of the men, and at the same time to maintain the discipline which must be maintained in a mine. I think in serious cases there ought to be prosecutions ; that the matter ought to be brought before the magistrates, but I do not think there are many cases in which it could not be satisfactorily met by a fine and without impairing the discipline of the mine, and that is the point, that discipline must be maintained sufficiently. I think in most cases it could be satisfactorily met by an agreement on the part of the man to pay a fine instead of bringing him before the magistrates.

9246. Is that to all intents and purposes a class of case in which it could not be reasonably established that there had been any danger to anybody else ?—No, I think they are all cases in which there is danger to somebody.

9247. Then the policy of the Legislature has been to make those cases cognizable by the criminal authorities ?— Yes, that is the remedy.

9248. The object of these contracts that you have referred to is to provide an escape from the rigour of the law ?—If I might ask you to refer to Sec. 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, probably you will see more what I mean. That section imposes responsibility upon everybody, the owner, the agent, and the manager—I think I am right about the section. Every owner, agent or manager of the mine is held responsible for any offence committed by any person, although it may be an offence with which they have nothing whatever personally to do. The policy of the Act is to place upon the owner, the agent, and the manager of the mine responsibility for the safety of the mine. They are liable for that, and the only way in which they can escape liability in the concluding words of the section is that they must show to the court, if they are summoned by the inspector for anybody's offences that they have to the best of their power—I forget the exact words.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

9249. You have stated it very well. It is that they must publish, and to the best of their power, enforce the rules ?—Yes, and it is upon the enforcement of these regulations and general rules of the Act of Parliament and special rules that the safety of the mine depends. The law looks upon him to secure that and he is punishable if he does not do it. If there is an offence or something done by any of the men, any violation of those regulations, the manager is not bound to take them before the magistrates; there is no obligation upon him to do that. His obligation is to show that he has done all he can to maintain the discipline of the mine, and he has the discretion if he thinks it is not prejudicial to the maintaining of the discipline in the mine, in a particular case, to inflict a fine. That is the object of these arrangements. If he thinks he can properly do that, and the man says, "I prefer to pay a fine," I cannot see what objection there can be to that. On the other hand, if he thinks, even in the most trivial case, that in order to do his duty and in order to provide for the safety of his mine he must prosecute every man, then he is quite within his rights if he does it. That is my view.

9250. In the case you have given us, not only is the man himself, but also the owner and the agent responsible ?—Quite; they are all responsible under the section.

9251. They get rid of that responsibility by a private arrangement, under which the workman pays something to the master ?—I ought to say that these fines are not put into the master's pocket.

9252. Admitting that, and taking that away from it, they compound it by a private payment ?—Even supposing that they do compound it by a private payment, I wish to protest against the idea that these fines go into the employer's pocket. They do not. They almost invariably go to some charity.

9253. Quite so ?—But I should say that even if the owner, in his judgment, thought that he was securing the discipline of his mine in every way, and the man agreed to it, of course he is still under this liability. The inspector might say; "I do not agree with you; I do not agree that by doing what you have done you have done what you can to maintain the observance of these rules," and he might summon him. Then if the tribunal was of opinion that he had not, by adopting these means, done what he could to discharge the obligation which is put upon him under that section, he would be fined himself.

9254. At all events, to the best of their power they have attempted to compound away the Mine Regulations code by a system of private discipline enforced by pecuniary payments ?—I do not agree quite, if I might disagree, to your word "compounding." What they have done is this; they have endeavoured with the sanction of the men and I press that—with the sanction of the men——

9255. Yes, I agree they are both implicated in this curious transaction ?—In order to prevent disgrace to the men, because colliers do not like being brought up before magistrates any more than anybody else, they may say "In this case you can be fined," and if the man agrees, and it is frequently so, as I say, that he does, because almost invariably the man says "Do not take me before the magistrates; fine me," I think they are justified in doing it.

9256. In order to elucidate one difficulty in the minds of the Committee may I put this to you; we can understand an offence being committed for which it is possible the criminal law would inflict a punishment, and we can understand in such circumstances the owner saying: "Now you are liable at law, but I will forgive you." That is a thing I can understand, but our difficulty is in allowing the owner to say "I will forgive you and not report you if you will make a payment of money." What do you say to that transaction ?—Excuse me, but you have not quite stated the facts. The way in which it is put is this: "I forgive you, but," he says, "if you choose to pay a fine of so much money, I will not bring you before the magistrates." The reporting, however, still has to be done, because this has to be registered.

9257. Do not let us differ with regard to the terminology. Put it in your own way ?—Except that it is an important difference. There is no secrecy about it. Every one of these fines has to be inserted in a register, and that register has to be inspected by the inspector whose business it is to inspect it and if he finds that there has been a violation of the Truck Act, either by reason of an excessive fine having been inflicted or where he considers that what has been done is not sufficiently effective in order to maintain the discipline of the mine he can still bring the case before the magistrate.

9258. If it is right the inspectors approve of it, and if it is wrong the inspectors may not approve of it ?—The object of the book being there is in order that the inspector may see it. It is provided in the Act of 1896, sub-section 3, Section 6: "Every employer who has made any contract purporting or intending to operate as a contract under Section 1 of this Act shall keep a register of deductions or payments, and shall enter therein every deduction or payment for or in respect of any fine purporting to be made under any such contract, specifying the amount and the nature of the act or omission in respect of which the fine was imposed, and this register shall be at all times open to inspection by one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories or of Mines."

9259. Your point, I understand, is you state that as a matter of fact fines are imposed for matters which are recognizable by the criminal law, and that His Majesty's Inspectors see that ?—They do, and this Act provides that they shall see it.

9260. And they have seen it and have taken no action ?—I cannot tell you what they have done, but the Act provides that it shall be there for them, and the Act contemplates that there shall be these fines, and in order to guard against the danger which you suggest, I presume, of compounding a felony or a misdemeanour or whatever the offence may be, the fines are registered there for the inspector to see.

9261. I think it is essentially a point that should be stated, and you are quite right in stating it, that the system, whatever may be said about it so far as the record goes, at all events has never been a system of concealment at all ?—No, I am not aware of any case where inspectors have taken proceedings. I have never heard of any case where proceedings have been taken against an employer either for a violation of the Truck Act or for imposing an excessive fine, and I think that goes for a great deal. I have a certificate of conviction here in which the fine was 5s. and the amount of costs 11s.; that made 16s. In addition to the 16s. the man would have to attend before the magistrates and that would mean the loss of a day, and probably more than one day, because often there are no magistrates sitting who can try a mining case and the man therefore loses a day in having to come up again. So that this system, safeguarded as it is by the Act of 1896 assists sufficiently in maintaining the discipline of the mine. It is much less oppressive to the collier and it is carefully safeguarded against any violation of the Truck Act or any excessive use of this power.

9262. In the result therefore—we need not go back upon it—the discipline which among other things might have been aimed at under Sec. 50, is achieved by the simpler method which is agreed to by both parties ?—I think so.

9263. That is your view. Has it ever been brought under your notice that there is dissatisfaction among the men ?—For the fining ?

9264. For this fining without antecedent notice ?—No, I have never heard of that. What comes before me is this, that the men prefer to be fined rather than to be brought before the magistrates. It is at their own instance that these fines are more usually inflicted.

9265. Have you any knowledge of men who would rather pay the fine than be reported ?—They cannot help being reported because the fact of their paying the fine has to be recorded in the register for the inspection of the inspector.

9266. I know that, but you know exactly what I mean ; I mean reported as offenders and haled before the criminal authorities ?—I think the men prefer to pay the fine rather than be reported.

9267. Have you any knowledge of a case of a man agreeing to pay a fine rather than have a difference which might have both criminal and defamatory results ?—I know of no special cases, but I have no doubt there are such cases, and the more guilty a man is the more readily he would agree to a fine rather than to going before the magistrates.

9268. He would rather agree to a fine, I suppose, for the sake of getting off, than have the circumstances reported to the inspector ?—He would not be reported to the inspector, he would be brought before the magistrates ; the prosecutions are by the owners, not by the inspector.

9269. Yes, I know that quite well, but in so far as regards the inspectors of mines it would be possible, would it not, to make representations to him ?—Yes, but I do not think you would do that ; the inspector would have no time to listen to it. He would say to the manager : "It is for you to look after this man, not me."

9270. The inspector would have time, however, to look at any general regulations that were put up ?—Certainly, and the inspector would have the same opportunity that he has now, of course, of criticising the amount of the fines if he saw that the regulations were overriden.

9271. If there was any meaning of the legislature, it is certainly not the meaning you have taken for the reasons you have given ?—Of course it is difficult to say what the legislature did mean, but my view is that the legislature meant two entirely different things, as I have explained to you.

9272. Do you think there is any improvement called for under the Act of 1896 ?—With reference to coal mining I do not think there is.

9273. You can suggest no alteration of the law ?—I can suggest no alteration of the law—I am speaking now as to the coal mining industry ; I do not go outside that.

9274. There are certain things which you give in a list. You might perhaps just read that list to us ?—I suggest to the Committee that under the provisions of the Truck Acts deductions may be made from miners' wages by agreement.

9275. You suggest that these deductions are at present made?—Yes, by agreement in respect to explosives where they are used and where the agreement is that the man shall pay for them. Of course, in some cases the getting price of the coal includes the provision of explosives by the employer, but in cases where the man has to find his own explosives, it is very undesirable that he should get explosives of an inferior character, because that might be very dangerous, and, therefore, it is desirable that they should be supplied by the employer, who would be more likely to find a safe explosive than the workman. Then under the Mines Act of 1896, lamps have to be provided by the employer. You will see at once why that is desirable because a defective lamp might cause a great deal of mischief down in the mine.

9276. Is a deduction to be made for that ?—Yes, we do not provide them for nothing, but in order that the lamps should be safe we provide them and the men agree to the deduction. Then oil and trimming, house coal, materials, tools or implements to be used in mining. That is under the Act of 1831. House rent, lamp cleaning sharpening or repairing tools. That is partly under the Act of 1831 and partly under the Act of 1887. The Act of 1887 requires that it shall not be part of the conditions of hiring.

9277. You mean under Section 8 of the Act of 1887 they must have a separate contract for sharpening or repairing tools ?—Yes. As far as I could, I have drawn out conditions—I think I handed it in—providing for the deduction of these. It is the paper I handed in first ; that is the contract with the men for the deductions of these various items. Of course they must be reasonable.

9278. They must fall under the other conditions of the Act of 1896 ?—Yes.

9279. Can you tell us any part of the country where explosives are supplied by the mine owner ?—They are supplied in Lancashire.

9280. How does that system work there ?—I think it is a necessity that they should be supplied by the mine owner. The only difficulty I have heard raised is this, that the workmen of course can get them cheaper. But he cannot get them as good, and he may not be able to get the right sort of explosives at all.

9281. Perhaps I was wrong in the phraseology of my question. What I meant to say was supplied free of charge ?—It differs in various districts. In Lancashire there are some districts where they are not charged for because there is a different price paid for the getting of the coal.

9282. They work it out in that way ?—They work it out in that way.

9283. How does that system work ?—I think they both work well ; I do not think there is any difference between one and the other.

9284. Of course if there was anything inferior in the nature of the explosive and that sort of thing, that is a thing that would be observed in the working of the mine ? —Yes, you have to be very careful.

9285. Should that system be applied to lamps, do you think ?—That the lamps should be provided free of charge ?

9286. Yes ?—The difficulty about that is this that you would have to re-arrange the wages and that is always a difficulty. Another thing is that when you have a thing settled you do not care to begin to alter it, and if you were to say to the men : "Now instead of your paying for the lamp, I am going to supply it, and I want something off your wages for that," you would get into interminable trouble in arranging how much that deduction ought to be.

9287. I see you allow a deduction for sharpening or repairing tools in this list you have given. You make that one of the deductions from the gross wages ?—Yes.

9288. But there is a contract necessary for that beforehand ?—Yes, there is a separate contract necessary—you will see it in the form I have handed you. It is not part of the contract of hiring ; it is a different contract altogether.

9289. Does the separation of the sharpening or the repairing of tools in another part of the contract apply in the case of the other articles you have mentioned ?—That is not the contract of hiring that you have got there.

9290. I do not think you apprehend my question. Under Section 8 of the Act of 1887 there must be a separate contract for the sharpening or repairing of tools you say, and I ask you must there also be a separate contract for the other things ?—There is a separate contract for all those things.

9291. Antecedently made ?—Yes. When the man signs on, he signs that contract. The contract of service is a different contract altogether. I think I have a specimen contract of service here. That is the contract of service (see Exhibit A of Appendix X). That is a separate contract I have given you for the deductions, altogether apart from the contract of hiring.

9292. This is the contract of service ?—Yes.

9293. And this is the contract for the deductions ?—That is the contract for the deductions.

9294. This is headed " Colliery. The Truck Acts 1831 to 1896" ?—That is the pay sheet. If you will take the contract for deductions you will find it is in a different form.

9295. Just see if we are right about this now. The main substantial document is what I may call the original contract of employment ?—Yes ; that is in a book.

9296. That is kept in a book and is now marked "A" ? —Yes.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

13 Mar. 1907.

9297. The next contract is also in a book and it has reference to deductions?—Yes, and the payments by authority.

9298. Yes, but those deductions are deductions in respect of which there is an antecedent contract?—Yes, I thought there was a contract on the top of that; there is another one with the deductions on. I have another copy here; this is the one (see Exhibit B of Appendix X.)

9299. This which we shall call "B" is the contract containing the heads of deductions?—That is so.

9300. These heads of deductions are for material and other things set forth in the Acts of Parliament including explosives, house rent and so on?—Yes, I think they are all in there—all the deductions that are made.

9301. There is also a request and authority to the employers to make the following payments. These are for hospital and recreative purposes and so on?—Yes, the Permanent Relief Society; the check weigh fund, and so on.

9302. These documents "A" and "B" enable both parties to know exactly when the contract is entered into how they stand?—They do.

9303. When the man's wages are paid there is a third document, "C," (see Exhibit C of Appendix X.) which he has to sign?—Not when their wages are paid; when the agreement to pay the fine is entered into.

9304. When during the course of the employment anything is done which is the subject of agreement for a fine a third document, "C," there and then as I understand is entered into?—That is so.

9305. It is by piecing together these three documents that at the end of the week or fortnight or whatever the time may be you are able to ascertain the net sum received by the workman?—That is so.

9306. Is that a correct interpretation of the transaction?—Yes. Then when the wages are paid a fourth document, "D," (see Exhibit D of Appendix X.) is given to him, that is the pay ticket which you had just now showing those deductions.

9307. I see. Is there anything else you would like to mention to us, Mr. Ellis?—I would like to mention those deductions if I may, particularly the one for the Permanent Relief Society.

9308. Certainly, we shall be glad to hear you upon that?—Since the year 1892 I have acted as the adviser and solicitor to the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners Permanent Relief Society. I believe you have had before you representatives from the four large societies, and I hope they have satisfied you as to the great importance it is to the miners that these societies should be maintained. Prior to 1897 in Lancashire and Cheshire the employers contributed 25 per cent. in money on the men's contributions, and the board of management consisted of twelve ordinary members, who were men selected from the men, and ten who were men selected from the employers. The Permanent Relief Society was established in 1872 in Lancashire and Cheshire. Before that time there was no provision made for widows or cripples who had been damaged in the coal mines, and in the yard of the colliery when the wages were being paid you used to find that a great number of unfortunate people were collecting what they could to assist them, and it was felt very strongly in 1872 that something better should be done, and at the instance of Mr. Pickard, who was then the miners' agent, who occupied the position now so very well filled by Mr. Walsh, Canon Bridgeman, the Rector of Wigan, and Mr. Alfred Hewlett the society was established. Those three gentlemen were particularly interested in getting together the society. It went on very satisfactorily and the contributions were all collected at the collieries from the men without complaint of any kind, in fact that is the only way in which these contributions could be satisfactorily collected. I ought to say that there are about 53,000 members of the Lancashire and Cheshire Permanent Relief Society. In 1897 when the Workmen's Compensation Act was passed, the employers decided that they could no longer continue to make their contributions of 25 per cent.

9309. Do you happen to remember what was the reason of their decision?—Because they had to pay compensation under the Act. There was no contracting out of the Act and they had to pay direct. Prior to that they had contracted out of the Employers' Liability Act and they paid this 25 per cent. contribution, but when they found that they could not contract out of the Workmen's Compensation Act they said they could not continue to pay the contribution. At that time there was a question as to whether the society, which was financially unsatisfactory, should be wound up, and there was a strong feeling on the part of many of the coal owners as to how they could safeguard the interests of the incumbents on the society, the widows and orphans in respect of whom the money had been contributed, and they wanted to see those people safe. It was very strongly indeed urged on the employers by the society and by the ordinary members of the society, the workmen on the board; who said what a disaster it would be if this society was wound up, that if the employers would continue the collection of the money that they should retain their position on the board of management, and that was agreed to, and since that time the collection has gone on as it had been done before at the collieries, and ten out of the twenty-two members of the board of management have been the representatives of employers, twelve representing the workmen.

9310. May I suggest to you that the council of employers is a kind of compound of agent, book-keeper, and the like, acting so as to be a convenience to the men really without any obligation on the part of the employer but as a help and guidance to the men?—That is all. The numbers in the society decreased immediately after that in what was called the old Permanent Society, and what was called the New Permanent Society came into existence. That was a society promoted by certain members of the Miners' Federation. It was founded upon pretty much the same lines—I think the rules were adopted en bloc or pretty nearly—because they did not desire that the employers should have anything to do with the management and that they should in fact be excluded altogether from any connection with it. This society numbers, I believe, about 13,000. The Miners' Permanent Relief Society, as I have said numbered 53,000 in 1898. After that it went down to about 40,000; it has now got up to 49,622, in 1906, and its financial position has constantly been improving until now the actuaries say, although there are not 20s. in the £, still they are a great deal better off than they were, and they are rapidly approaching a very sound financial position.

9311. Is any miner compelled to join that society?—No, he is not compelled to join. On the board of management there are twelve what are termed ordinary members. The representatives of the men are members of the Miners' Federation, several of them being officials in the federation. There are 49,000 members of the Permanent Relief Society. According to the return of the Registrar of Friendly Societies for 1906, the total number of persons in the Miners' Federation in Lancashire and Cheshire was 30,000. I do not know what the number has increased to since that time, but I believe during last year there have been certain increases. But certainly in 1905 we had 47,000 in that year members of the society whereas the total number of the members of the Miners' Federation only amounted to 30,000. You asked me if the men were compelled to join. The men are not compelled to join. They are asked at the colliery if they wish to join, and if they do wish to join their contributions are received; if they do not wish to join they are not received. They do not at any of the collieries receive the contributions in respect of the New Permanent. I have never heard a complaint from a collier about his being compelled to join the Permanent. I have heard complaints from gentlemen connected with the New Permanent that it was not quite fair that the collection should be made for one and not for the other, but I have never heard a complaint from any collier, and I should strongly put this to you that with 49,000 members it would hardly be possible to exercise compulsion. It is hardly conceivable that 49,000 members could be required to join a society without their consent. In 1900, a suggestion was made at the instance of the Miners' Federation no doubt. A letter was written by Mr. Ashton, who is the respected Secretary of the Miners' Federation, and Mr. Walkden, who is a very prominent man in connection with the new society, for an amalgamation, and Mr. Ashton expressed then the very sound opinion which those who are interested in the old society entertain, and that is that there ought to be only one Permanent Relief Society in South-west Lancashire, and I think every reasonable man comes to the same conclusion. There is one with 50,000 members and another with 13,000 members, and it is a great pity that those two should be going along separately. I submit to you that there is no ground for the suggestion that the men are compelled to join the society. I hear of most of the disputes that take place in Lancashire. My friend Mr. Walsh has no hesitation in coming to me whenever there is any difficulty with the men, and I have never heard of a complaint from anybody. The only complaint I have heard of is that it is not quite fair that the employer should agree to collect in one case and should decline to collect in the other. If there was any prohibition—fence it round with any safeguard you think necessary—but if there was anything which prohibited these permanent relief contributions being collected by the employer, the society would disappear, and that I cannot look upon except as a very serious disaster to the workmen—a society that has been built up by the workmen by years of providence.

9312. How is the audit conducted ?—By the public auditor.

9313. Under the Friendly Societies' Act ?—Yes.

9314. The management is a joint one you say ?—The management is joint nominally; when I have been at the board meeting, although I have found that the workmen members are never absent, and are never late, I have never found any large attendance of the honorary members, and no one can be interfered with or coerced into joining.

9315. I think we have now exhausted all the different points you have raised. Have you any suggestions to offer with regard to contributions for hospitals ? We would like to hear you on that also ?—With regard to contributions for hospitals, the men contribute very handsomely indeed in our district to the local hospital at Wigan. They contribute very willingly and I have never heard of a case of any complaint as to oppression in requiring the men to contribute to a hospital or as to being unwilling to do it. I believe in Wigan the amount is 1d. a week. I think it was started at the suggestion of the men. They have a very large share in the management of the hospital. The board of management consists very largely of their representatives, and they make this very handsome contribution to its funds.

9316. I see that is one of the things mentioned in the document "B" which you have given to us—subscriptions to the so-and-so sick cub, or to the cottage hospital or to the recreation ground ?—I think the cottage hospital was rather intended to apply to the St. Helens district, where they had a cottage hospital which they specially contributed to. The hospital in Wigan is a very big place.

9317. Are they compelled to make those contributions ? —I do not think so, I have never heard of any compulsion; I think it is entirely a voluntary contribution.

9318. It is more a point of honour with them ?—Yes; I think so. The Shop Clubs' Act, as you are aware, prevents these being conditions of employment—any compulsion of that kind is punishable very seriously, and I cannot conceive that the men should require compulsion to contribute to a sick fund or to a hospital. The men are always perfectly willing to contribute for those purposes.

9319. Has any case of this kind ever come under your notice of a man failing to act like his mates in subscribing to an infirmary, or anything of the kind, that his position is rendered uncomfortable and inconvenient and he has had to leave his employment on that account ?—I have never heard of such a case, but I should think it would probably have been occasioned by his mates, certainly not by the employer.

9320. I agree, not by the employer ?—No, the employer has nothing to get out of it.

9321. Have you heard of any case of that description where the man has been looked upon as something in the nature of an outlaw ?—I have never heard of such a case, but I should think it is very likely it would be so. I think if a man refused to make a contribution to a hospital which his mates looked to him to help to support, that he would be looked upon as an outlaw. I do not know, however, that that can be dealt with by legislation.

9322. No. I am merely putting these points to you in the light of other evidence we have had upon the subject. Is there any other point upon which you would like to inform us ?—There is one matter I might mention to you, and that is that there has been a case recently decided with reference to the deduction of a fine imposed by the magistrates. That was the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries.

9323. What is the date of it ?—It is reported in The Times Law Reports of March 28th, 1906. That has given rise to some doubt as to whether making these deductions even by consent is not a violation of the Truck Act. I think the question in that case rather was this: A man had been fined by the magistrates and the employer deducted the fine from his wages. It was held by the House of Lords that that was not permissible. I should venture to draw a distinction between that case and the case of where the man had agreed to pay a fine.

9324. The feature in Williams's case was that the 10s. was not agreed to ?—That was so; it was not agreed to at all. But then it was said further —at least this is the conclusion which is tried to be drawn from the case—that you cannot agree to a deduction which the Truck Act does not allow. Of course that is a general principle of law that you cannot override the law by the agreement, and that it is suggested that the whole of the money has to be paid, that you cannot, even by agreement, deduct a fine. That is in opposition to the decision which was given many years ago, that the imposing of a fine was not a violation of the Truck Act; it was not paying a man in something other than cash, it was not paying him at all. This case of Williams v. North's Navigation gives some foundation for the suggestion that that is not quite sound, perhaps, and that the Truck Act does not merely say: "You must not pay him partly in cash and partly in kind," but "You must pay him all in cash and you must deduct nothing from the cash in paying him." I do not know how far that is so, but what I want to suggest to you is this: that everybody has been under the impression until this case, that fining was not a violation of the Truck Act. The Home Office issued a very able memorandum, if I may say so, on the Truck Act in 1896, in which they lay down the law, and it is very satisfactory to have it from such an authority.

9325. As they view it. We are not bound by the Home Office, you know ?—Quite so, What they say is: "It is legal by agreement to deduct fines for absence, lateness, bad work, and other misconduct, except in the case of women or children, who can only be fined for absence from work to an extent commensurate with the employer's damage thereby (Employers and Workmen Act of 1875). The legality of such fines appears to be independent of their amount." There is another very useful thing which was issued by the Home Office, giving us instructions as to what we should do, and there again they mention the legality of fines. That is a Memorandum issued after the passing of the Truck Act of 1896, and they put it down equally clearly there that fines are legal. "Fines may by agreement be imposed on a workman provided they are reasonable, but not otherwise," and the Act of 1896 recognises the legality of fines qua Truck Act, because if they had been illegal, that would have been unnecessary. It assumes the legality of a fine that it is not affected by the Truck Act, but requires certain new conditions to make it legal in future.

9326. Will you just amplify that if you will be so good ? —I say the Act of 1896 recognises that fines are not a violation of the Truck Act, otherwise it would not have surrounded them with the special legislation under which they should be enforced. If they were in violation of the Truck Act, the Truck Act would have been quite sufficient to prevent them being made, and therefore it recognises that they can be made when it says without violating the Truck Act, but it says you shall only make them in this particular way. If they were illegal under the Truck Act it would not have been necessary to give any protection at all. My point is this. I consider that the imposition of these fines, protected as the workman is by the Act of 1896, is important in order to maintain the discipline of mines, and rather than have to go to the expense of prosecuting in every case it is desirable, if it is an offence against the Truck Act, that it should be made not an offence against the Truck Act. Now may I quote a precedent for that. Last session Parliament passed the Trade Disputes Act. It was always thought that trade unions funds were free from liability. Everybody thought so, and everybody acted upon that until the judges decided that they were not. But inasmuch as everybody thought they were right, it was said we ought to have the law so altered as to make it that they are free from responsibility. Parliament accepted that view and altered the law and freed these funds from responsibility. Now I put it in the same way. The influence of these fines in the direction of maintaining discipline is so great that we want them maintained, and if it should be that we have been all wrong, the Home Office, Parliament, and everybody else, we have gone far more wrong on that point than anybody ever went on the question of the funds of trades unions. If we are wrong in thinking that these fines are legal subject to the Act of 1896, then we ask for an alteration in the law, as we think they ought to be legalised.

9327. I am extremely indebted to you, if I may say so personally, for your statement of it because the point is undoubtedly a very serious one. May I suggest to you that there has been a long category of possible mistakes that have arisen in the law on account of a failure, whether on the part of the Home Office or anybody else, to recognise that the language of the Act of 1831 not merely prescribed that the amount of the wages should be paid in current coin, but prescribed that the entire amount should be so paid, and probably it is owing to the omission to notice that that a certain category of mistakes may have arisen ?—I think we must give the Home Office credit for this, that if it is a mistake they are not responsible for making it. There is a case decided, with which you are no doubt familiar, in which this question was dealt with. It is Redgrave v. Kelly. In that case the Home Office endeavoured to maintain their position. If you have the Memorandum from the Home Office, it is quoted at p. 47. That case was appealed against. The magistrate decided that a fine was not a breach of the Truck Act.

9328. That judgment was affirmed ?—Yes, that judgment was affirmed, so that is the position at the present time.

9329. Nothing in that sense, I understand, ever reached the House of Lords ?—Nothing reached the House of Lords. Not that the Home Office require any justification from me, but they did endeavour at that time to put that construction on the Act of Parliament.

9330. That having been judicially affirmed they were bound to take advantage of and act upon it ?—Yes, they were ; they were bound to accept it. I suggest there is this difference. There is the difference between the deduction of a fine to which a man agrees and the deduction of a fine to which he does not agree, as in the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries. There is that difference between the two cases. It may be sufficient to except fines out of the Act and this case of Kelly's may be good law still, but I put it that if it is not good law, if it be the true construction of the Truck Act that nothing must be deducted from the wages, even by agreement, except those things provided for in the Act of 1831, then it should be amended, and fines, subject to certain restrictions to guard against any injustice being done to the workman, should be made legal, and I quote with very great confidence the precedent of last session which I hope may be of use.

9331. In one sense, if we were to report against fines altogether—take that as a hypothesis to work upon—it is quite clear that we might place the whole of our recommendations under Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, as it has been pronounced, because Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries was not a deduction but a fine eo nomine. It was in that case a fine of 10s. and the Lord Chancellor in Williams v. North said:—"However that may be it appears to me that an obligation rests upon the employer under the Truck Act, 1831, Sect. 3 to pay in coin (for we are not concerned with bank notes in this case), all the money payable as wages, and that in ascertaining how much is payable as wages he can subtract nothing except the deductions expressly sanctioned by Sect. 23." That judgment is so powerful as this that not only was it delivered from the Woolsack, but Lord Davey concurred in it. The question was one of set-off, and he said : "But set-off outside the court means nothing more than a claim of reduction and retention, and the detention comes to be whether the deduction of a cross-debt which might be the subject of a set-off in an action is a legitimate deduction, or whether the express enactment that the entire amount of the wages shall be actually paid in current coin can be so qualified." —I agree it is very strong, but of course the only distinction—I am not going to suggest to you that it is a distinction—the only difference between that case and the case of an agreement to pay a fine under the Act of 1896 is this that in one case the deduction is made with the man's consent and in the other case it is made without his consent. That is the distinction.

9332. That might be of use, yes, but of course if an order is made to pay out of a man's wages to somebody else something on account of the man, it is equivalent to paying the man himself ?—That has been decided. But there is the difficulty of the man being both payer and receiver, and perhaps it might be that that would make a difficulty. But however, my point is this, that if it should be that under Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries that fines cannot be made in future, even under the Act of 1896, because it is a violation of the Truck Act, we ask that the law should be altered so as to make it not a violation of the Truck Act.

9333. You have been perfectly frank in everything, and I thought it right to put the hypothesis to you that if we were to report in favour of the total abolition of fines, we could then say that the law for the first time laid down in the House of Lords, should be recognised by the Legislature as of universal application. If on the contrary we were to report that fines were legitimate with certain safe guards and under certain restrictions which we might set out, we should have, pro tanto, to report that the law of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries ought to be invaded to that extent, and that is what you would recommend ?—Yes, that is to say if you can report that fines, although not legitimate, are desirable under certain conditions.

9334. Yes, I mean suppose we came to that conclusion. That was why I put the alternative before you ?—Yes.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

9335. In regard to the Mines Regulation Act, when you do prosecute a man, what is the smallest fine as a rule that is imposed ? I suppose the magistrates do inflict small fines, do they not ?—Yes, or sometimes they merely make the man pay the costs.

9336. What is the maximum they can give ?—They can give imprisonment if they think that the offence committed was such as to endanger life, but the usual fine is from 5s. or 10s. to £1, and costs.

9337. Supposing you did not fine at all but took every case before the magistrates, including those cases that you described as trivial, what do you consider it would entail ?—It would entail a considerable loss of time. In the first place an official has to go down to the magistrates' clerk's office to take out a summons and there is part of a day lost in doing that instead of being at his proper employment. Then an official has to attend at the hearing before the magistrates and in mining districts it is not an infrequent circumstance for you to have to attend more than once because there is not a magistrate there who is capable of taking a mining case. But supposing you only attended once, there is still that time lost. Then there is legal assistance for both sides. The man has to attend the summons and he requires legal assistance. The costs in the case I gave amounted to 11s., and in addition to the costs, there is the amount of the fine and all the time that has been lost.

9338. The man himself may lose his day's work and in addition have to pay 10s. or 11s. ?—The least he would get off with is 10s. or 11s. and that is if he only had to pay the costs, but if there is the fine of 5s. in addition to that it would total up to nearly a sovereign altogether.

9339. If you continued to bring these trivial offences before magistrates, do you think you would always get the men fined ?—No, perhaps we should not, and whilst I do not say that every case that goes before the magistrate should go for conviction and not for trial yet, if you do not succeed in a case that you take before the magistrates, t is not conducive to discipline.

9340. Supposing you were to have the cases decided upon the law exactly as it is and you continually took all these cases before the magistrates, do you think you would get the magistrates to convict at all ?—Probably it would be a difficulty. I do not know how we could do it. The magistrates would have to sit oftener than they do now if all these trivial cases had to be taken before them. It is the discipline of the mine that everyone wants to provide for; it is not necessarily in order to punish the men, or for the sake of punishing the men, it is for the discipline of the mine, and in my opinion that would not be maintained as efficiently if the fining was abolished.

9341. My point was rather this, that would not the tendency be, where the men were constantly being taken before the magistrates, towards the lessening of the penalty ?—You mean in the way of familiarity breeding contempt ?

9342. Yes, and lessening the effect of the punishment upon the men themselves ?—I think it would.

9343. Might not the effect of constantly taking a man before the magistrates tend to affect the safety of the mine itself by making the men not nearly so careful not to commit offences in order to avoid going before the magistrates as they otherwise might be ?— Certainly.

9344. In view of those facts you do not think it desirable to do away with the lesser penalty of fines because you think the larger penalty of being taken before the magistrates would become familiar to the men, and would not act so much as a deterrent to the dangerous offences on the part of the men whilst in the mine ?—That is my opinion.

9345. The miners have a very strong union, of course ?—Yes.

9346. In your opinion that strong union is absolutely able to protect them in case of any injustice ?—That is my opinion.

By Mr. Walsh.

9347. I have been going over your précis. You speak here of special and general rules, and point out that the Coal Mines Regulation Act has established two distinct sets of rules, or at least one, the general rules. The special rules, of course, are not part of the Act of Parliament ?—That is so, but they are enforceable under the Act.

9348. Just take the question of safety. You say that the non-observance of the general and special rules is not always visited by prosecution. Have you found as a fact that the effect of fines has increased the safety of the mines ?—You will find that the safety of the mines has increased, that the death rate has decreased, and that in other respects accidents are decreasing, but to say that that is because we do not prosecute everybody is further than I would venture to go.

9349. Just following up the questions put to you by Sir Frederick, he placed a question or two before you in order to ascertain your idea as to whether the greater publicity and the consequent lessening, so to speak, of fear of proceedings, or the familiarity that would result from the publicity of them, would gradually breed in the minds of the men contempt for discipline. What do you say to that ?—I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view. Supposing a man was brought before the magistrates every other week, he would not think so much about it as if he was only brought up once a year. I understood Sir Frederick to mean that supposing you were constantly bringing the men up, it would have the effect upon them that they would get used to it.

9350. Have not you rather changed the personnel ? Is not it a reductio ad absurdum, to speak about taking a man up before the magistrates every other week, because I think you told us a little while ago that the owner and agent and the manager were equally liable with the men, and does not the fact of the man having to be brought so often imply that the owners and agents are equally liable ?—The owner and agent and manager are answerable for the whole of the efficiency of the mine. The workman is only responsible for his own offence.

9351. I agree with you the safety of those down below depends upon the care that each man exercises. One man might very easily imperil the lives of a large number of people ?—Yes.

9352. And an offence trivial in itself might very well have the most disastrous results to the whole of the people in the mine ?—That is quite so.

9353. Supposing we take it that that little trivial incident has occurred, are we to understand that the safety of the whole of the people, which after all is the greatest object, is served by getting hold of this man and taking him into the colliery office at the end of his day's work, and saying: "I will fine you 2s. 6d. for this," when we know perfectly well that the 2s. 6d. fine never reaches the knowledge of the other people engaged in the mine, who might very well have been affected by the consequences of the offence of which the man had been guilty ?—In some cases these fines are advertised, and if it is your opinion that they should be made generally known——

9354. I would rather you answered the question ?—I want to put another case, and that is this. Take the case of a man who has been a very good workman and who has made a slip.

9355. I am rather afraid you are adopting the American method of answering questions ?—And he has never been before the magistrates in his life. He has committed a slip and something must be done, or the inspector will require that some punishment should be inflicted. I think as far as that man was concerned it will be a very great hardship upon him to say: "I am very sorry, but you must go before the magistrates." At present the man says: "Do not take me before the magistrates, I would rather pay a fine, and I think so far as the man in the case I have mentioned is concerned, the discipline is just as well maintained by making him pay the fine as if he were taken before the magistrates.

9356. You are assuming that in every case. A little later down in your précis you place before us three or four alternatives ?—Yes.

9357. You place first of all a caution ?—Yes.

9358. In your answer to me you are assuming that the man either must pay a fine to which the man consents or that he must be taken before the magistrates ?—It depends on the offence; there might be an offence that you could not pass over with a caution.

9359. The case you put before us was that of a man who had made a slip ?—Yes, but still it might have been a very important thing.

9360. Yes, but if he has made a slip in which there has been no culpable negligence, do not you think a caution would meet a case of that kind even better than a fine ?—I am afraid not, because I do not suppose anybody does an act wilfully for the purpose of blowing up a mine. I cannot imagine that. It is these acts of negligence that cause mischief; it is not with any wilful intention to blow up a mine. It is the mistakes that are made that require to be guarded against most.

9361. I hope we will not rush to an opposite extreme. You speak of blowing up a mine. That is the most fearful catastrophe you can put before us ?—Yes, but no man would endanger his own life or anybody else's wilfully.

9362. It does not necessarily mean to endanger life; it may mean some small matter of discipline. There are a hundred and one small matters which do not affect life at all ?—If it is an insignificant thing, I agree that a caution is enough.

9363. From your own knowledge of course you know that the special and general rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act have necessitated the attention of Parliament for more than thirty years ?—I do not quite follow the special and general rules ? Do you mean the whole legislation, not merely general and special ?

9364. Yes, the whole range of legislation relating to coal mining at least, has necessitated the attention of Parliament of this country for well over thirty years. There cannot, therefore, be any small matter in those special and general rules ?—I do not quite follow you; there cannot be any small matter in them ?

9365. There can be no matter which is absolutely small in those general and special rules, can there ?—I should not like to say that. I think these rules provide for a great number of things which although they may be serious under certain circumstances yet are not as important as others.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

13 Mar. 1907.

9366. That is to say you do think there is a single matter in the general and special rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act which if violated can be met by the equivalent of a small fine?—I think so. I think there are a great many. I will put it in another way: the observance of all these rules is necessary for safety, or else they would never have been put here. You want to see how far you can secure their observance.

9367. Do not you think that safety is much better attainable, when any violation of the rules governing safety has taken place, by proper publicity, which after all is the very basis of the legislation, being given to such violation of the rules governing safety?—No, I think it would be a very harsh way of administering the Act to do that.

9368. Now we will take it a little further. You speak here of the bye-laws?—Yes.

9369. That in addition to the special and general rules there are bye-laws?—Yes.

9370. Are you not aware that after all it is not so much the fine for the breach of the special rule or the general rule or even the bye-law, but it is the hundred and one little matters dependent entirely upon the caprice of the official that causes the feeling of resentment against the fines?—I have not heard of this feeling of resentment—of course you are much more likely to have heard it than I am. The only way in which I can put it is this, that the Miners' Federation have brought to me complaints of a very great variety of grievances, and I have never yet heard of a grievance either as to a deduction for a fine or as to the deduction for the Permanent Relief or as to the deduction for lamp or oil. Of course sometimes a question of amount comes in, but never any question of principle.

9371. I would like you not to develop that too much?—I do not want to.

9372. In the first place I think you ought to know that the Miners' Federation has entered into a federation with the Permanent Relief Society?—I am not concerned with that; I am talking about grievances.

9373. I am afraid I am taking up a wrong attitude here just a little, but anyhow the Miners' Federation have entered into a federation with the Permanent Relief Society. It is known to all of us that the method adopted was a legal method, and therefore the federation has not troubled?—I put it in this way, that if this deduction for the Permanent Relief Society had been a serious grievance it would not have been passed over by the Miners' Federation. That is the only thing I can say.

9374. It has not been passed over, but it has not been brought to you?—If it has not been passed over, the extraordinary thing is that amongst the numberless cases which you have been good enough to bring before me from the federation, and that we have endeavoured to settle, this has not been one of them.

9375. It has been outside your ken and mine?—No, but it has not been brought up.

9376. As a federation we thought it was inconsistent with the law?—I want to press this, that whether consistent with the law or not consistent with the law, if this is a thing the men resented I cannot understand why 49,000 men should have accepted this and still no complaint of any injustice should have been brought before the employers.

9377. The injustice has been brought before the employers from time to time, of course?—I can only say I do not know of it.

9378. For instance, his Lordship raised the question of the leaving of a bow. In the low mines the bow is placed on the top of the box in order to protect the hands of the drawer who is drawing the box. Is the leaving of a bow in a moment of excitement in order to get on quickly with his work, a thing you would fine a man for?—The circumstances are not sufficient to enable me to judge. Was this left in a place where somebody would tumble over it, for instance?

9379. You cannot tumble over it?—I do not know sufficient about it. I am not going to say that every colliery manager is an angel, but he wants to keep within the law.

9380. I want to know whether you think fines under the existing Act should be tabulated so that the men should have some fore-knowledge of the particular incident for which a fine might be inflicted and the amount of the fine?—I say he has. He does not know the amount, but working at a colliery no one can say that if he offends against the regulations he is not liable to be punished in some way or other.

9381. I am trying to get you away from the regulations?—I am afraid I cannot get away from the regulations myself. If I am working a mine the regulations are necessary to the working of a mine.

9382. I am putting to you that there are a thousand and one fines inflicted for offences which are not offences against the regulations?—You say a thousand and one. His Lordship has instanced some few cases which I cannot say I could justify for a moment.

9383. In those cases how would you act?—How do you mean? Do you mean should I fine?

9384. Yes?—In such cases as have been mentioned to me I should not fine unless a man wanted it. If I found a man stealing my coal I should probably want to bring him before the magistrates, but supposing he says "Do not punish me, fine me. Let me pay something," you might say "Very well, I will fine you 6d."

9385. You would not have power to do that?—You may not have power, but which is the most merciful consideration towards the man—to bring him before the magistrates, or, when he begs you not to do so and asks you to fine him, for you to say to him "Very well, you must pay 1s. or 2s. fine?"

9386. I would like you to carry your mind to the time before the Act of 1896 was passed. You remember we came into the turmoil of a general election the year before, and when there was a great outcry made by the working people up and down the country as to the results of the existence of a system of fines being deducted from their wages?—I remember the difficulty at the time of the Act, and it was said that it would legalise fines.

9387. The Act was passed by a Conservative Government?—It is immaterial which Government passed it.

9388. I want to put to you that the Act was passed by a Government fresh from contact with the people, a Government I suppose that had taken into real consideration the resentment felt by the people against the results of the existing system?—I cannot admit that I ever heard of any agitation amongst coal miners, but I know from general knowledge that there were industries, tailoring establishments more particularly I have heard, where it was so very unjust that the women particularly did not know what wages they were to have—that there was one deduction for this and one deduction for that and one deduction for the other, and that what they had to take home at the end of the week was very little indeed, because it had been left in the employer's pocket.

9389. I want you to pay attention to the first portion of the Act of 1896 itself: "That agreement may be a part of his contract of employment, and if so the terms of the contract with reference to the fine must be contained in a notice kept constantly affixed?"—That is from the Act?

9390. Yes, I am reading your proof, which as a summary is absolutely correct?—Yes.

9391. "The terms of the contract with reference to the fine must be contained in a notice kept constantly affixed at such place or places open to the workman and in such a position that it may be easily seen, read and copied by any person whom it affects"?—Quite.

9392. "Or the contract must be in writing signed by the workman"?—Yes.

9393. Here all the conditions must be known in the first place, and they must be known not only to the man affected, but they must be in such a position as to be seen and read and copied by any person whom it affects?—Yes.

9394. Do not you think that the second alternative should also safeguard for the workman the conditions that are stated in the first?—That is quite impossible; the two things are entirely different. The first one provides that it is a part of a man's contract that he shall pay a fine, and he can be made to pay a fine for a certain offence. That is his contract, and it is quite right that that must be put up and advertised in the fullest possible way. But where there is no such contract to pay a fine, there is no obligation upon the man to pay it. He may, if he chooses, agree to pay a fine, but there is no necessity for him to pay; he can please himself absolutely whether he pays it or not.

9395. Do not you think that the general conditions which must be observed in the first contract ought to hold good in the second contract? The difference is that the contract is to be in writing in the one case and in the other it must be in print, and must be advertised in the sight of all men. The whole of the conditions of that first contract must be in the sight of all people so that it may be easily seen and read and copied. The second wording is: "or the contract"—it is not another contract?—The contract—that is the particular contract for this fine?

9396. "Or the contract must be in writing signed by the workman." In one case it is printed and in the other case it is signed by the workman?—That is not the distinction between these.

9397. Not necessarily, I know, but in the one case all the conditions must be easily observable?—Certainly.

9398. Is the contract in the second case not to have the main conditions of the first embodied in it?—No, because there is no such thing as a contract in existence under which a man agrees to pay a fine. The other contract is a contract which comes into existence when he is employed. The fine is to be for such an offence such-and-such a sum; you could not put: "And such a fine as the parties like to agree upon." You cannot advertise that, because there is no such contract as that in existence, there is nothing to advertise.

9399. Would you think that the term, "contract" ordinarily understood bore with it in the mind of any ordinary commonsense man that there should be some freedom of bargain when making such a contract?—There could be no such thing as a contract in law unless there were freedom of bargain; there is no such thing as a contract at all unless there is freedom of bargain. Any contract that was induced by duress would be mere waste paper.

9400. Therefore there must be absolute freedom of bargain between the party on the one side and the party on the other?—Yes.

9401. Supposing the employer called you into his office and said to you, "You must agree to this fine of 5s.," for a particular offence, whether you committed it or not, "or else if you do not agree to it you may get about your business," would you consider that to be a good contract?—I should consider that was on the border line of making such a contract as that open to question. I should consider that was on the border line. I daresay there are cases such as you suggest where the employer says, "You must do this, or you must go," and the man either says, "Very well, I will go," or he says, "I choose to pay." But now the question really is whether for the sake of meeting a few of such cases as that it is worth while——

9402. You are carrying it a good deal further?—I want to go a little further because you must not decide this question on an isolated case of that kind.

9403. We are not deciding it here you know?—No, but I must put my case to you. I agree with you that there may be such cases as that; it would be a most extraordinary thing if there were not; it would be the only industry where such a thing did not take place. The question is this, whether in order to avoid isolated cases of that sort you are going to inflict on the thousands of persons who willingly agree to be fined rather than go before the magistrates a very serious injustice.

9404. Your mind runs on the magistrates all the time. I am putting it to you that there is an infinite variety of little matters connected with a mine which are not and could not be taken before magistrates, but for which fines are inflicted, the amount in no case being known to the workman or to the boy—neither the amount nor the offence—and the whole matter is one of caprice?—I could not accept that as a statement of the general working of mines.

9405. If it were really brought to your notice that this condition of things existed, would you call that a contract within the meaning of the section of the Act?—Of course the section of the Act with reference to the contract is neither here nor there. There must be a contract, that is to say there must be an agreement in which each side is at liberty to contract. It is put before a man, "Will you give up your employment or will you pay this fine." Now, then, can you show that the man to whom that alternative is put is not in a position to say which he will do? If he is not in a position to say that, then it would be a contract probably which was tainted and which might be set aside. If, on the other hand, he was in a position to say, after weighing the advantages and the disadvantages, that he will do it and he chooses the one with the least disadvantage attached to it, I think if you ask me as a lawyer that is a good contract in law.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

9406. I am putting it to you that from my knowledge of these cases, extending now over a very great number of years, the vast majority of these cases have that alternative before them—either the acceptance of a fine, which is dependent entirely upon no existing contract, dependent entirely upon the filling in of an amount by the official and the consent to that amount by the workman—or else dismissal. Without carrying it any further, would you think that dismissal being an element in that bargain it would make that a contract under the terms of the section?—I think it would if you have stated all the facts. A man is perfectly free to accept one or the other, he is perfectly free, and as long as he is free I think it is a good contract. If you can show that a man is not free to contract then it would not be a good contract, but in the case you have put the man is free, he is at liberty to say either: Very well, I will not pay the fine, I will be dismissed," or: "I will pay the fine and I will keep my situation."

9408. I am not sure if I have put this to you before, but if I have will you allow me to repeat it? I submit to you that the ordinary meaning of the term contract implies on the part of the parties affected a pre-knowledge of conditions of the bargain?—I do not agree.

9409. You do not agree?—At least I mean to say that persons before they actually enter into a contract must know all about it, but I do not quite see what the object of the question is. Two men cannot enter into a contract without knowing something about it, and each of them think they know all about it no doubt.

9411. His Lordship put it to you that right away from 1831 down to 1896 the whole of the Acts having relation to fines and deductions had been Acts requiring great publicity—either publicity in an open place or publicity in a book?—I do not agree before 1896.

9412. Take the case of deductions, deductions, say, for house coal or deductions for sharpening of tools. Those had to be under separate conditions of agreement?—Yes, but there is no publication of the agreement that I remember under the Truck Act of 1831. It simply said that there must be an agreement, but one man's agreement is quite independent of another man's agreement, and there is no publication.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

13 Mar. 1907.

9413. Yes, but every man had to see the set terms before he entered into his employment, so to speak ?—I do not think it is quite that. The provision of the Truck Act of 1831 was this, that you must pay all the wages in money except that you might deduct from the wages for certain things by agreement, not a general agreement, an individual agreement with each workman.

9414. That particular agreement could not be made after the man had started working and was earning wages ?—I do not see why. If they are both agreed it should be made, then there is nothing in the Truck Act which says it should be made before you commence the employment. There must be an agreement before the deduction is made, but that it has to be made before you enter into the contract of service I do not know is in the Truck Act.

9415. From your knowledge of these matters, all these agreements were made before the man had positively actually entered into the service ?—The agreement for deductions under the Truck Act.

9416. Yes, for house coal, lamps, and so on ?—I should think the probability is that under the Truck Act when these conditions were made the agreements for deductions were made at the time he entered into the service as they are now.

9417. So that at the end of the week or fortnight, as the case may be, as far as these matters are concerned, he knew the maximum that could be deducted from his wages ?—I do not know that he knew the amount at all —I am speaking subject to correction—but I should think he only knew that in respect of certain items there could be deductions made from his wages.

9418. Yes, and he knew the maximum ?—If you take the fuel, for example, I do not know that he would know the maximum, he would know the price of fuel, but how much he would use I do not know that he would know, and in the case of supplying goods, it only follows that you must deduct from his wages a certain amount in respect of goods supplied, but I do not know that he would know how much you were going to deduct.

9419. I want to put this to you, that throughout the whole of the transactions from 1831 right away to 1896 the man had a prior knowledge of the deductions for these particular items that were to be made from his wages ?—With reference to fines he had no such information at all. If you are referring to fines he had no such information with respect to the deductions which were expressly authorised by the Truck Act. He had information I imagine that amounts in respect to those particular items could be deducted, but I do not know that he had any amounts given to him.

9420. He had a knowledge of the definite amounts which were chargeable against him for every article of deduction ?—I do not know.

9421. Yes, of course ; the Act requires that ?—No, I do not think it requires that anywhere.

9422. Anyhow we will not trouble about that. With regard to the fines, I want to point out to you that, so far as the deductions were concerned, there was publicity and he did know what the deductions were to be for ?—Not before the Act of 1896 in respect of fines.

9423. Keep your mind away from fines for the moment ? —You said you were on fines.

9424. I am trying to clear my mind so as to get on to the fines. With regard to this particular passage, "House coal, explosives, implements of work, spades, lamps," and all that, he knew at least that he would be debited with those charges. He knew that in his mind positively ?—I do not know what he knew in his mind, but what the Act of Parliament said was that it should be lawful—that it would not be a violation of the Truck Act—to make those deductions.

9425. They could not be sprung upon him summarily ? —That is not a part of the Truck Act at all. The Truck Act simply says it shall not be a violation of this Act that you make a certain deduction from the man's wages, but as between employer and man that you should give him notice.

9426. For instance, taking the first section of the Act of 1896, do you know a case where both are in operation ?—I know at the time in 1896 I made some alternative forms where they desired to adopt the first one, and where they desired to adopt the second, but I cannot call to mind any case where they are both in operation.

9427. In your opinion would it be illegal if they were both in operation because the phrasing is "or" there must first of all be a list or something else ?—I cannot quite follow how they could both be in operation, for this reason, that if the first is in operation you do not want the second. If it is part of a man's contract he will pay certain fines under certain conditions, and he does not need to make another agreement to pay them ; therefore I cannot see how you can have both in operation at the same time.

9428. Supposing I tell you there are many cases where both of these things are in operation where they have the scheduled notice of the amount of the fine and the offence, and not only have they that, but instead of adopting the expression "or" they use the term "and," and they impose fines, what would you say ? Would you call that illegal ?—I should say they have misunderstood the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and I should like to go and see a place of that sort.

9429. And that fines are imposed under such circumstances ?—I cannot conceive that anyone giving it any thought could have a state of things like that, because you do not want both ; you only want one. If you have a contract with a man that for a certain offence he shall be bound to pay you 5s. and you have advertised that contract, you do not want a special contract when the offence is committed that he is to pay you the 5s.

9430. You are under the impression, I think, that if that is the case such a person would be acting illegally ?—No, not illegally, but I should say foolishly. I should say he had misunderstood the meaning of the Act of Parliament. Do not you see the explanation I have given you is that you cannot have both ?

9431. But I am suggesting to you that there are cases where they are using both ?—The only reason I can give for that is that they must have misunderstood the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

9432. The provisions of the Act of Parliament would not allow them to use both if it were known of course ?—The second provision would be useless in a case like that. If you have got a contract with a man that he shall pay, say, for breaking a lamp 5s. and you have got that advertised, that is a part of his contract, and if he breaks a lamp he cannot help himself, he has to pay you the 5s. You do not need to have another contract with him that he will pay the 5s., because he cannot help himself. But if you have not got the first and it is no part of his contract and he breaks a lamp then you have to agree with him whether he will pay you 5s. or whether he will not.

9433. I put it to you that it would take a large schedule to contain the whole class of offences that may arise in a coal mine ?—I agree. I should think it would take a very big schedule.

9434. Yes, and that therefore an employer might be desirous of only scheduling certain offences and bracketting the amount of the fine against those offences and yet also be desirous of holding himself at liberty to enlarge the area of the fines as from time to time might be required? —I cannot say yes to that. If the employer is willing to be put in this position : "I will take my chance when the time comes as to whether I can get the men to agree to a fine or not," I do not see the use of his making a bargain with the man that he will under certain conditions pay a certain fine. If we had to start doing that we should just have the same difficulty that I was mentioning with reference to the lamps. You would have to alter the conditions of the employment that have been prevailing for years and there is no telling where the difficulty would end.

9435. With regard to the Permanent Relief Society I understood you to say that it was of great importance to the miners that these societies should be maintained ?—That was what was represented to the employers, and I agree with it.

9436. Yes, you said that it was of great importance to the miners that such societies should be maintained. I understood you to say that the owners paid a contribution up to the year 1898 ?—Yes.

9437. They paid up to that date right away from the year 1881 in order to compound their obligations under the Employers Liability Act ?—I believe that was so—no, I think they paid something before.

9438. Yes, in some few cases they did ?—I think they paid something before the Employers Liability Act was passed. In order to justify the contracting out of the Act they increased their contribution.

9439. Have you got the figures of membership of the Permanent Relief Society up to the year 1880 ?—Yes, I have them here. In 1874, 10,424; 1875, 14,430; 1876, 19,449; 1877, 22,977; 1878, 24,089; 1879, 27,281; 1880, 31,846; 1881, 32,073; 1882, 32,184; 1883, 34,372; 1884, 36,540; 1885, 36,866; 1886, 38,232. Then it goes on gradually increasing every year until 1898, when it was 53,924. It dropped down in 1899 to 41,581, but it has been increasing ever since until it has got now in 1907 to 49,622.

The Chairman.

9440–1. Mr. Walsh has a good deal more to ask you, Mr. Ellis, and as there are some other members of the Committee who also desire to put questions to you we should be glad if you would do us the favour of coming here again next week. If you could manage to do that we should be very much obliged to you. Very well.

9442–3. Our next meeting will be on Tuesday next at half-past eleven, if that is convenient to you. Yes.

Mr. Maddison.

9444. I am sorry but I shall not be able to be present.

The Chairman.

9445–6. Perhaps Mr. Maddison might put his questions to you now.—I should be very pleased.

By Mr. Maddison.

9447. I have just two or three questions to put to you. I gather from your evidence that your chief concern is with regard to discipline for the purpose of ensuring the safety of the mine ?—In connection with fines.

9448. Therefore in taking that view you want to find the best deterrent to offences, I presume ?—Yes, with the least harshness to the men.

9449. Mr. Walsh put to you a question as to the comparative or almost absolute privacy of these fines; that is to say a man may do something which may have been fairly serious—I know nothing about mine work, but I imagine although serious not known except to just a few of the men immediately around him. He is then taken into the office and is fined say 10s., which although that seems to be regarded as a serious fine, none of his workmates apparently would know anything about it, would they ?—Yes, I should think nearly all of them would, because it is known pretty well in the pit whether a man is fined or not. But in many cases—at least I will say in some—they are advertised. It is not popular amongst the men for them to be advertised, but I am told they are advertised in some cases, and the inspectors consider it desirable to do so where it has been found that the fine itself is not sufficient, but experience has shown that it is generally sufficient, although if necessary it can be advertised.

9450. You say it has been found sufficient ?—Yes.

9451. Is it a fact that apart from certain accidents in mines which have been met by scientific methods safety has really increased in mines. Are there less accidents now than there were formerly, do you think ?—I think there are less accidents, and that safety has increased. Of course the only person who can judge of the general discipline of the mine is the manager, because you must remember that he has got the responsibility. If discipline is not satisfactory he is responsible, and if he is satisfied that the method he adopts secures discipline it is rather for him as to how he should do it.

9452. I am trying to keep to the respective values of fines of a private character and the value of the publicity of being taken before the magistrates. Do you think this private method of punishment does make for safety as much as the more public form of it ?—I think in the cases in which it is dealt with by a fine it does. I know we have tried to ascertain this in connection with the other inquiry as to accidents in mines, but we have not yet had full information upon the subject. You cannot, however, point out in cases where they prosecute everybody that discipline is any better than where they partly fine and partly prosecute.

9453. Have you any figures showing where there has been a repetition of offences by the same man in different collieries ?—No, I have not got any such figures as that.

9454. What I want to know is, whether this fining system, as we have had evidence of in other industries, becomes a matter of course with a certain type of man. A man may be fined half-a-crown and if he is a careless sort of chap it does not affect him very much and he goes on getting fined?—The mining industry, I think, is different from any other, because the policy of the Mines Act is this, to place upon a head the responsibility. That head has to see that discipline is maintained, and if he does not do that he himself is responsible. If he is satisfied that he does succeed in maintaining the discipline in his mine by these means which are less harsh and less expensive to the men he is the only man who can give you information.

9455. That assumes that every offence is of a major character and not of a minor character. I think you will admit, without using the 1,001 illustration or method of estimating, that there must be in a large mine a large number of offences which do not endanger life at all, and which are not likely to endanger life at all—all sorts of carelessness which may impede the working of the mine without absolutely causing danger to the men. Of course I am totally ignorant of mining matters ?—Offences against the regulations outside a pit are very different from offences committed down below. You do not know what the result may be below, but assuming there was some offence committed down a pit which did not cause danger, but which was an offence against the rules, I should say in a case like that that the manager should have a discretion whether he should visit the man with the serious penalty of prosecuting him, or whether he should consider it would be sufficiently met by a fine.

9456. Yes, but in these non-dangerous offences, if I may use that term, in mining practice the ordinary effects of fines, which apply in any industry, operate, and you would admit, would you not, that continual carelessness may go on under this system of fining ?—No, I should not agree to that.

9457. Why ?—I think if the manager is to be held responsible for the discipline of the mine you must leave him a free hand as to how he is going to maintain it, provided that you safeguard the workmen from oppression. That is the principle which I put before the Committee.

9458. I will come to the question of oppression in a moment, I am now only wanting to get to know from you whether this system of fining becoming a stereotyped system and probably being repeated in the case of one man several times a year does really act as powerfully as a deterrent as other methods, such as bringing before the magistrates might do,?—The managers of mines I believe, are of opinion that the system which is adopted now is sufficient, and does sufficiently safeguard discipline.

9459. Yes, but may not that arise from it being more convenient, because of the saving of their time and all the rest of it? That is no proof, is it, that it is a better deterrent than the public form of punishment ?—I think if you find that it is the general experience of men who are responsible that it is a sufficient deterrent in small cases that their opinion should be deferred to, and that it would be a very harsh thing to the men to say: "Now then, we will compel every case to be taken before the magistrates regardless of the cost to you and the time you lose; we will prohibit any other method of maintaining discipline except by going before the magistrates."

9460. You have already admitted, and it seems to be so, that there are a large number of offences for which you could not take the offender before the magistrates ?—I should not say there was a large number. There are offences that you could not prosecute under the Mines Regulation Act, but I do not know whether you could not prosecute under some other Act.

9461. Take the case of the breaking of a spade, for instance ?—A spade might be broken under circumstances that would enable you to prosecute him for wilful damage before a magistrate. You cannot tell from looking at a list like that without knowing. the conditions how far it is serious and how far it is not.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

13 Mar. 1907.

9462. Have you any figures from any large colliery showing the number of fines in any given year, the number or the amount will do ?—I have not got them, but I have no doubt I could get them. I have a list here from one colliery. It is not a large colliery, but I suppose they get 300,000 or 400,000 ton a years. This list, I believe, is all there are in ten years.

9463. How many would there be on that list ?—There are thirty to the page, and I have five pages here, so it would be about 150 in ten years.

9464. How many men will they employ about ?—I am afraid I can only tell you roughly.

By Mr. Walsh.

9465. Six hundred or 700, I should think ?—I should have thought more than that, but you will know better than I.

By Mr. Maddison.

9466. You would say from that, that the number of fines in a colliery is not very heavy ?—I do not think they are very heavy, but it is so difficult to say, because in a great many cases the men would rather be fined than be taken before the magistrates.

9467. Have you any information which would afford a comparison between those mines where the practice of fining for almost everything except very serious offences prevails and those where they more generally take the man before the magistrates ?—I asked the inspectors who were giving evidence in the Accidents in Mines Inquiry, and some prefer fining and some taking the man before the magistrate. I asked them whether they had anything to show with regard to whether discipline was better maintained at one mine than at another, and they said they did not think there was any difference.

9468. In your examination by the Chairman you said you objected to a published contract ?—Yes, I said I came to the conclusion that it would not work. I did draw out a suggestion for those who wished to try it, but I think they found the other system was more convenient.

9469. What is your main reason for objecting to the published contract ?—My first objection is this, that it is a difficult thing to agree with a man that under certain circumstances he must be fined. Then the next point is what are you going to fine him, because the same offence committed under certain conditions might be serious, whereas committed under other conditions it might be much less serious, and if you put up that maximum fine for committing such an offence is so much, it does not convey anything to the man. Then, as Mr. Walsh said, the number of offences that can be committed in connection with a colliery are so numerous that I found it impossible to make any classification that was of any use. Therefore I came to the conclusion that it would not be worth complicating the conditions of employment, which are that he is to be employed and to work for so many days a week, with the extra conditions that under certain circumstances he shall be fined a certain sum of money.

9470. I gather from your evidence that you think it is a perfectly fair thing for a man to enter into what you call an agreement after an offence has been committed to pay a certain fine ?—For a man to enter into an agreement to pay a fine I think is a perfectly fair thing to do. I point out this, if I may venture to ask you to look a little wider at it than what Mr. Walsh has put about the man's ability to enter into the agreement. It is always a question of degree, to what extent a man may be under pressure. But here a man has an alternative which he may accept or decline. He may either cease to be employed at the colliery, because there are plenty of other collieries, to which he can go, or he may pay the fine. There are many cases where a man has to accept an alternative where he likes neither the one nor the other, and I am of opinion that it is a perfectly good form of contract. There are many cases where a man has to accept one or two alternatives neither of which is very palatable to him, but that is no reason for saying that the man should be protected from the employer.

9471. Do you know of any case where one side has imposed an agreement upon the other without the man having any opportunity of revising it or entering into its fairness. This contract is fixed already apparently ?—No, I beg your pardon, he does not take a fine out of the list; he says: "You have done this," and he says, "I shall fine you so much money, or if you do not agree to pay the fine I will summon you before the magistrate." There is no injustice in that, because the man can choose which alternative he likes.

9472. But it is a condition of employment, is it not, that he shall accept the assessment of damage done or of the gravity of the offence by a person who is an official of a colliery. He has no appeal from it, he cannot argue about it, he must take it or leave it ?—That is just exactly what it is not, it is not that at all. It would be that if it were done under the first alternative and advertised, and the contracts were affixed. He would have no appeal then, but in this case he is not bound to accept it at all; he can please himself.

9473. The only alternative is dismissal ?—It may be or not; I do not know what the alternative is, but I will assume that the manager says: "Very well, you have done this, I must either dismiss you or I must bring you before magistrates." The man in all probability then will say, "Do not do that, fine me." I will assume that the man does say that, and that the manager says: "Very well, I will give you a choice of either of the three."

9474. I will put it to you in this way, does the man who pays the fine imposed by the colliery officials get the same opportunity of arguing about either his committal of the offence or the gravity of the offence as he would if he were brought before the magistrate ?—I have never been present when one of these fines has been imposed, but my experience is that the collier takes the opportunity of objecting when he thinks he ought to object.

9475. Have you known any case of a colliery remitting the fine on objection by the man ?—I cannot tell you of one.

9476. I gather from your evidence that the man is supposed to have committed a certain offence, and that the colliery manager says to him——?—I should rather put it that the man has committed a certain offence.

9477. I should rather put it that he is supposed to have committed an offence in the absence of evidence that he had actually done it ?—The man would not pay if he had not committed it. These men are not children, and they would not pay if they were unjustly fined. They have a very powerful union behind them, and if the man could not protect himself he would get his union to protect him.

9478. This Committee has to take into account all men, whether they are helpless or whether they are powerful ?—I think they might make an exception probably in the case of miners.

9479. I agree that in most counties you can fairly do that. However, I do not wish to labour that; I do want to get my mind clear on this point. As it appears to me, the colliery official says what he thinks the offence should have as punishment. All the man has to do is to pay, or, if he likes to carry it to an extreme, to leave ?—Or he can say "I will not pay." All he has to do is to say: "I will not pay it."

9480. Can you conceive an official keeping a man who said he would not pay ?—What I should do I think if I were the official would be that I should take some other remedy for the maintenance of the discipline. I should consider whether I should discharge him or bring him before the magistrates. It would depend upon the offence, but if the man said "I will not do that," I should do something else with him.

9481. What else would you do with him ?—I should have to consider whether it was a case where it would be a sufficient remedy to dismiss him. I think it would be probable that that would not be a sufficient remedy, and that we should have to take proceedings against him.

9482. Assume that it is an offence where you cannot take proceedings against him, what would you do then ?—You are putting a hypothetical case to me, but if I was a manager and had come to the conclusion that a man had committed an offence in respect of which he ought to be punished, if he had been stealing something for instance —— .

9483. Take the case of 1s. fine ?—If he had wilfully damaged something the offence is the same whether the fine is 1s. or £1.

9484. Certainly ?—If I had any legal remedy against him for the fine I should consider whether it was worth my while proceeding with that or whether I should simply dismiss him or prosecute him. I am dealing with discipline. If it is a question affecting the safety or discipline of the mine I think I am bound to prosecute.

9485. I am dealing with a case which does not affect the discipline of the mine or the safety of the mine but one of these admittedly minor offences where the man considers the fine too much or considers that he is not really responsible for the act or where there may be some other objection and the man says "I will not pay." In your answer you have given me nothing yet but dismissal as the alternative ?—I do not know that I can give you anything else. If the manager is of opinion that the offence is of such a character as to require to be punished at all then if he says to the man, "Now I will give you the chance of accepting this punishment," and the man says, "No, I will not have it," as he has quite a right to do, the manager must then consider whether it is worth his while to let it alone or to dismiss the man, or, if it is a case for the magistrates, he has to consider whether he should bring him before the magistrates. That is in a case affecting the man himself, but if it is a case affecting the safety or the discipline of the mine he may say "I must see that my discipline is maintained, and I must enforce it."

9486. So that it works out as a condition of employment that you must pay any fine imposed upon you or leave ?—No, there is no condition of employment at all. The Act of Parliament says distinctly that there shall not be.

9487. I am not talking about a legal matter. I am talking about how it works out in practice. Would not you say that it is a condition of a man working in that particular mine that he accepts and pays any fine imposed by an official ?—No, no more than you would be entitled to say that this man is entitled because of the conditions of his employment to do anything he likes in the mine with impunity. I should not allow it and he would not allow it if he did not want to be fined.

9488. I put it to you that this is an arbitrary imposition ?—He can choose whether he will pay it or not.

9489. That is not the point. Has the man himself, or anybody representing the man, the slightest control over the amount of the fine ?—What more control can he have than by saying, "I will not pay it at all" ?

9490. That will not give him any control over the amount ?—Surely if he says: "I will not pay anything," he has control. Of course if it is an offence for which the man says: "I ought not to pay," he has full control because he says: "I will not pay the fine." I will go as far as I possibly can, but I really cannot go to the extent of saying that where No. 2 alternative is in itself a condition of employment that the man shall pay any fine that the official likes to ask.

9491. I will put it in this way; does the man who agrees to pay a fine have any voice in its amount ?—Only this, that he need not pay it unless he likes.

9492. It is no good putting that because he has paid it. Here is "A" has paid a 2s. 6d. fine. Had he any voice in the fixing of that fine ?—I am afraid I cannot make myself understood more than this. If he chooses to say, "I will not pay anything," he has a voice in it, but if it happens in this way, that the official says: "You must pay a fine of 2s. 6d.," and he says: "I will pay it," he has a voice in it because he agrees to pay it. If he says: "I will not pay it," he has also a voice in it.

9493. Assume that the man did pay the 2s. 6d., before he paid it had he any voice in the determining the amount of the fine ?—Only this voice, that he had the choice of saying: "I will pay," or "I will not pay." It seems to me he has a very important voice in it.

9494. Of course that does not answer my question ?—I will answer your question as fully as I can, but I cannot see quite what it is you want me to say. I cannot say that he has no voice in it because he has a voice in it as to whether he will pay it or not. Of course he does not fix the 2s. 6d. The manager fixes that.

9495. The manager alone ?—The manager alone, but the man has a voice in it because he can say: "I shall not pay it."

9496. Do you really think that a fine imposed by one party without the other party being able to get a penny off it is what you would call a fair and reasonable agreement ?—So long as you can say that the other party has got the right to say: "I will not pay it at all," I think it is a perfectly fair thing.

THIRTY-SIXTH DAY.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq., (Secretary).

Sir FREDERICK HARRISON, called; and Examined.

Sir F. Harrison.
19 Mar. 1907.

By the Chairman.

9497. You are general manager of the London and North Western Railway?—I am.

9498. You have had, I believe, for upwards of forty years, experience in connection with railway management and looking after the employees in the service?—Yes.

9499. As you are aware this Committee has had a remit made to it by the Home Office to inquire into the subject of fines and of deductions from wages?—Yes.

9500. We are all agreed, I presume, that particularly in railway service, discipline ought to be maintained?—I think we are.

9501. Without that the consequences might be of a most serious kind to the railway service, and not only to the carrier but to the travelling public?—I think very serious consequences would be likely to ensue otherwise.

9502. You have a certain opinion which I should like you to express with regard to the public policy as to weakening the authority or discipline?—I think it is highly essential for the safety of the public and the efficient service by railways, that those in authority over what I will call the rank and file working staff should be able to maintain discipline in the way that they think best, and not subject to control as perhaps other employments are.

9503. Before Parliament or the public can assent to that view the general lines of the way the railway companies think best will have to be, of course, exposed?—Yes, I imagine so.

9504. I mean so as to be ratified by the good sense and the good feeling of the public, otherwise, of course it would be a secret system, which you undoubtedly would have no desire to propagate?—What I had in my mind more was that looking at the Truck Act (although I do not profess to be fully informed of the provisions of it) and the variations that have been made in it at different times with regard to the relations, more particularly in the matter of punishment, the supervision between the employers and the employed, I think if Parliament were to legislate in that direction with regard to railway employment, in my humble opinion it would be a very disastrous matter for the safety of the public and the efficiency of the railway service.

9505. You remember, of course, very well, Sir Frederick, the state of matters prior to the passing of the Truck Act of 1896?—Yes. I had prior to that for a good many years intimate connection with the working staff on the London and North Western Railway and other railways, and the mode of punishment that was in force then. I have also had acquaintance with it since, but not perhaps so intimately in association actually with the working man—more as general supervision.

9506. Before being general manager what position did you hold?—I was assistant traffic superintendent at Liverpool; then district superintendent at Chester and then for some ten years I was practically in charge of the out door working both goods and passenger on the London and North Western Railway generally.

9507. Resuming the reference to the Act of 1896, could you describe to the Committee generally one or two points that I shall put to you in turn. In the first place, I should like to know what was the category of things, speaking as I say, generally, for which fines were imposed?—It would be almost impossible to define it. It ranges from incivility to the public, inattention to their duty, neglect of duty and a number of other offences.

9508. Lateness?—Yes; of course that is neglect of duty. Then there is want of intelligence in carrying out what was obviously the proper course of conduct. It really covered the whole of what you may call inefficiency.

9509. Quite so. Then the second point which I wish to get from you generally is could you tell me the scale of the imposition of fines?—There was no recognised scale.

9510. Let me give you one or two illustrations. We shall suppose the case that you first mentioned of incivility. What would be the fine for that?—It a great deal depended at that time upon the individual, and the particular extent of the incivility, whether it was rudeness through want of intelligence or through his natural manner, or whether it was a deliberate act of incivility and the only person who could judge of that would be his superior officer when he had ascertained all the circumstances. There could be no scale of fines for that.

9511. Was there no antecedent scale of fines?—No. I do not know in all my experience until after the passing of the Act of 1896 of any scale of fines being in operation for particular offences.

9512. The third point is, who was the authority that imposed those fines?—In some cases it would be, I will not say his immediate superior in the same rank of life as himself, but taking a station like Crewe where, I suppose, there are probably 500 men employed, it would be the station master in the first place. If that, however, was questioned at all that would be submitted to the superintendent, but the station master would make his recommendation in the matter of fine. He would report the circumstances to his superintendent, and the superintendent would decide the fine, but he would decide that on hearing what the station master had said.

9513. Just to go a step further, his report would be handed to the cashier, would it?—Yes.

9514. Then the cashier would treat that as a debit item?—Yes.

9515. And would pay the man so much less?—Yes; and those fines were always entered up in proper form, and it came under the review of the directors periodically.

9516. When the Act of 1896 came into operation would you describe what was the change in your practice in order to square with the provisions of that Act?—The North Western and some of the other companies, almost all the other companies, attempted to frame a schedule of fines for particular offences in cases of misconduct and they fixed them at the maximum for each offence, reserving a discretion within the amount set down, as to what might be carried out according to the circumstances of the particular case. There was considerable difficulty felt in practice in carrying that out, and it was resolved by some of the companies, including the North Western, to abolish a direct pecuniary fine for the offence, but to either deal with the men by reprimand or by removal from their position or suspension from duty, with loss of pay, or by dismissal.

9517. Under the system preceding the Statute of 1896 of course in any gross cases, cases where you thought that a fine did not meet the situation, you had, of course, the power of dismissal and I suppose you exercised it?—Oh, yes Even prior to 1896 when fines were in operation more generally than they are now, there was still the power of the company, that is the master, to deal with its servants as it thought best in the interests of the service that they were employed in, and they repremanded, removed, degraded, or dismissed according to what they thought the offence warranted.

9518. I gather that you have found it expedient, in view of the restrictions imposed in the 1896 Act, to adopt the threefold system of warning, suspension and dismissal?—Warning, suspension, degradation or dismissal.

9519. That is four-fold. Have you found that that system so substituted for the fines preceding 1896 is satisfactory?—I think so. By that I do not mean to say that the preceding system was not satisfactory also. I do not think the discipline of the North Western, speaking for the North Western, has been either strengthened or weakened by the change that the legislature made.

9520. I might put it axiomatically to you that the good discipline of the North Western has been maintained under the changed system?—Yes.

9521. A suggestion has been made to the Committee that some check ought to be put upon the system of suspension?—Yes, I have heard of that; I have read Mr. Bell's evidence.

9522. I will come in detail to the questions that were submitted to you that were answered by Mr. Bell, but speaking generally on the question of suspension, would you tell me now how, in practice, it works out, so far as the authority suspending is concerned. Who is that?—In some cases it would be as I said in the case of fines, the responsible officer immediately in charge of the men. To keep to my illustration of Crewe——

9523. Yes. Take the case of a guard at Crewe who has committed some delinquency. Just give us an illustration of what he might do?—Unhesitatingly his superior officer has the power to suspend that man from duty and it is absolutely essential that he should. All that he does of course comes under review afterwards.

9524. Yes, but I just want to get, so as to make it vivid, a case of a guard. We will suppose the delinquency to be that he is found intoxicated on the platform. Does the station master suspend him on the spot?—Yes.

9525. So that in the interests of the public and of the company he is taken off the service at once?—At once.

9526. To whom does the station master report?—He reports the circumstances to the superintendent in charge of the district.

9527. The superintendent then makes inquiry?—Yes.

9528. Does he make inquiry of the man and of the station master?—Both. I should say a wise superintendent would make inquiry of both; he would not take it from one side only.

9529. Thereupon, I fancy, he confirms the suspension and fixes it for a certain period?—Yes.

9530. Shall we say a week or a fortnight?—The probability is in the case you have put of a man being found intoxicated on duty, he would be suspended and if the superintendent was satisfied it was so it would not be a case for suspension then. He would not resume duty until the superintendent was satisfied, and it would be a case then for the superintendent to decide whether he should re-enter the service, or be removed to another position and given another trial or how he should be dealt with.

9531. Is there anything that occurs to your mind as to giving the man or the company any right of appeal to anybody—say the Inspector?—At the moment?

9532. Yes?—No, I do not think you could at the moment go beyond the authority of the officer in charge. It is quite possible that the station master in charge, if he had any doubt, and I should think he would if the superintendent happened to be there, or one of his assistants probably say:—"Is this man in a fit state to remain on duty?" But every man in the service has a right to appeal through his superior officer, and ultimately through him to the directors against anything that he considers a grievance, whether it is as to punishment or in any other way.

9533. Is that right of appeal known?—Oh yes; it is in the rule book of the company.

9534. Is there any appeal to any outside authority—any Government representative?—No.

9535. Do you approve or not approve of that?—I disapprove of it absolutely.

9536. You think it would be inconsistent with sound discipline?—Absolutely, and not only with sound discipline but the consequence would be unsound discipline.

9537. Am I to understand from you that after the Act of 1896 the system of fines was not adopted at all?—Not by the North Western. We abolished it.

9538. Do you happen to have the rule book by you that you referred to just now?—Yes. (Producing book.) The book is rather a big one, but at the bottom of page 38 of the London and North Western book of rules and regulations the rule is:—"Should any servant think himself aggrieved at any time he can memorialise the board, but in such case the memorial must be sent through the head of his department."

9539. What is the number of that rule?—There is no number to it. I may explain that the general rules and regulations that I am quoting from are those generally adopted by all the companies, but some companies felt that the whole book of rules would not meet all the cases that they desired should be met, and in the particular way they desired to meet them, and therefore they put in supplementary instructions, and those are not numbered. With the North Western they are in the front part preceding the general regulations.

9540. Is the passage you have read preceding the general instructions?—Yes.

9541. Do you think it would be in the interests of the men if suspensions were rendered illegal?—Personally I do not. I have rather a strong view that suspension is not only better for disciplinary purposes, but it follows almost as a matter of course, better for the men themselves.

9542. Tell me about the suspensions, to what period do they extend—from what period to what period?—There is no arbitrary rule.

9543. For a couple of days?—They extend to a week.

9544. From a couple of days to a week?—From one day to a week. I think that would cover it. There may be cases of ten days or so, but they are very, very rare.

9545. Beyond that it would be a case of dismissal?—Or degradation or removal in some way.

9546. There is something in your proof about the railway companies endeavouring to get over the difficulty by publishing a list of the fines for various offences?—Yes. The North Western drew up a list of fines, and we were about to issue it, but we were told that there was a question whether that would sufficiently comply with the provisions of the Act. Our lawyers told us that they did not think it would. That list was drawn up, as I think I said before, to provide for the maximum penalty. I should say with regard to suspensions why I think it in the interests of the men as well as of the service is that I think, if I may be credited with having a good deal of consideration for the welfare of the men as well as for the welfare of the service, that it is a far better object lesson to the man when he has done wrong, if, instead of leaving his home in the morning and coming back at the end of the week with 6d., 1s., 2s. or 5s. less than his wages, he has to stay at home, and let his better half become aware that there is some reason for his being unable to go to work. That has a better moral effect than his having to go home at the end of the week short of what his wife knows to be his proper amount of wages, and he has in some cases then to make excuses for how he has got rid of it. In the case of suspension he has not the same opportunity. He may go out, but he does not go with his tin of food in all probability in the way that he usually does.

9547. That seems to be going one point further than you went before when you were contrasting the pre-1896 system with the present. You seemed to think then that the preceding system was not better than the present system ?—There were suspensions previous to 1896.

9548. Suspensions or disrating ?—Both. The only difference is that on the North Western we do not fine at all now. We used to fine and suspend as well.

9549. You do not fine at all now, but in lieu thereof you do those other things which you say have a good moral effect ?—I think enquiry would show, and speaking from my general experience of it I believe that probably the reprimands take the place of the small fines, the sixpences and the shillings, and the half-crowns.

9550. Can you give us now any information as to the extent of this system with regard to the numbers of men affected. How many men are in the employment of the London and North Western—between 70,000 and 80,000, are there not ?—Yes. That includes the clerical staff, but I should say there are 70,000 under this system.

9551. In the course of a year how many men have been dismissed absolutely ?—I could not tell you. I could get it, of course, but I have not that information here.

9552. How many have been disrated, do you know ?—No.

9553. Would your assistant be just so kind as to note these points—the numbers of dismissals and disratings and suspensions for short periods, and warnings ? I fancy it would be difficult to get the list of warnings because, there would be no record of that, would there ?—There is in a great many cases. I do not wish to hesitate about giving you the fullest information that you desire, and that can be got, but it would be a very voluminous statement and rather costly to go through all the books that are kept to find all these facts with regard to all these matters.

9554. We want it only as illustrative for one year ?—I know, but if you realise for a moment that we have got some, I suppose, 25 district offices, or more than that—we have that number nearly for the Traffic Department alone—and they keep, certainly so far as reprimands are concerned, that information there; that means it has to be collected from each office, and brought together and the same with the removal from one position to another, and degradation. A man may be removed from one position to another not because he has committed a particular offence on a particular occasion, but because perhaps he is found not to realise the expectations of those who have put him into the position that he has recently been occupying, and to obtain all that information by examination of the books of the North Western would mean a vast labour.

9555. Then we shall take out of that questions of reprimand, but the Committee is anxious to obtain, if it can, the numbers under those three heads of temporary suspension, disrating, and dismissal. I wonder if that could be furnished for one year—any year you care to select. Suppose for instance, you take one year within the past four or five years ?—I should not like to say no to that. Nothing is impossible, and I should not like to discourage the idea of your getting information, but also I should not like to say off-hand that it could be got without an amount of work that I do not think it would be fair to put upon the company to incur, but if you will leave it with me I will inquire of those who are competent to advise me how long it would take, and what the cost would be, and I will let you know, because it would all have to be done by the people who get out the information in addition to their ordinary duties, and it is no small matter

9556. I do not presume to judge about it, Sir Frederick, I agree about the reprimands, but so far as regards the other three heads one would say that it would not be such a stupendous undertaking ?—With all submission, if you will allow me to confer with those who will be responsible for getting the information out, they will be able to give me some idea as to how long it would take and what it would cost, and I will let you know, and it will be for you to decide whether you will require that or not.

9557. Would you mind taking this alternative from me that if you find over the whole system that it is beyond the scope of reasonable labour, you might confine your effort to, say, a selected district. Suppose you take Crewe, then you could by a simple multiplier let us know, I fancy, how it affects the rest ?—No, I would not undertake to do any arithmetical sum of that kind. I am quite accustomed to dealing with figures, and I know the fallacies that can be created by dealing with averages and arithmetical calculations when you mutiply one figure by another.

9558. What would you say as to Crewe alone ?—Crewe is an important junction station in what we call the Northern Division under the charge of the superintendent for passenger purposes at Liverpool, for goods purposes at Crewe, and the permanent way outdoor engineer's head offices and for locomotive purposes at Crewe, are at Crewe.

9559. I think you said there were about 500 employees there ?—That was for the passenger station alone, and the shunting yard, but Crewe, I suppose, has got in all the departments that are centred there something like 12,000 or 14,000 men, but I am speaking quite without reference to any figures.

9560. Quite so. It is just to give us a general idea ?—I have an idea that if on enquiry I find the work very great I shall have to put it to you, I think, to decide as to whether the work would be too stupendous for you to call upon me to carry it out, but I will give the alternative of a fairly representative point in the way of a district or locality.

9561. Yes, a fairly representative point ?—I can tell you now, if you will take that as part of the information the number of cases in which there were temporary suspensions for a year, or in fact for a series of years.

9562. You could do that now?—Yes, I can give you the number of cases for two years prior to 1896, and since.

9563. This would be quite a convenient opportunity if you can give us that now ?—Yes. In 1894 there were 2,150 cases of suspension and 3,690 cases of fines. In 1895 there were 2,406 suspensions and 3,526 fines. Then in 1896 there were 2,246 suspensions and 3,209 fines. In 1896 the fines ceased, or I suppose they did—at least the statement goes then to 1902. In 1902 there were 7,736 suspensions ; in 1903, 6,638 ; in 1904, 5,674 ; in 1905, 5,248 ; and in 1906, 4,996. So that there has been of late years a gradual reduction in the number of cases of suspension, but they vary very much.

9564. Still for five years that does seem a pretty steady decline ?—Yes.

9565. I fancy that points to an acquiescence in both parties to the system, and a more effective discipline ?—Yes, I dare say it does. Of course, it is impossible to draw any sound conclusion from these figures, in that direction at all events. You can imagine it, but it does not follow that the conclusion you arrive at is sound.

9566. Those figures at least seem to justify this conclusion that the suspensions in point of number seem to have been equal to the number of fines ?—Yes. If you will take the last year of 1906, and the last year when there were both suspensions and fines, 1895 or 1896—there is not much in it—the number of cases are between 500 and 1,000 less in the later period.

9567. That is no doubt true, but I should hardly fancy that you would care about that, because the nearest approximation would be to get as near to 1896 as possible, and the nearest you can get to 1896 is 1902, according to the figures you have given me ?—1902 is rather above 1896—a good deal.

9568. Yes, and so is 1903 ?—Yes.

* Sir Frederick Harrison has since forwarded to the Secretary a return of punishments of the Wages Staff for the month of November, 1906, showing that in that month the number of men warned or reprimanded was 631, the number disrated 22, the number reduced in position without change of pay 1, the number suspended 477 and the number dismissed 93.

9569. Very well, we can make what conclusions we like. We are very much obliged to you for those figures. We see you have a certain amount of material ready to hand. You will take note of the request the Committee makes that you will select some representative district and assist us to the best of your power about it ?—I will with pleasure.

9570. You have considered, I believe, the evidence that was given by Mr. Bell ?—Yes.

9571. I call your attention to Question 4731 on page 369 of the evidence. You observe Mr. Bell is asked this question: "Who would be the officer who would take stock, so to speak, of the delinquency and make the assessment; would it be a clerk ? (A.) That would vary with the different companies," and so on. What is your view about that ?—I think Mr. Bell is quite right there; no doubt the practice does differ upon different railways, but whether he intended to imply that the fines or punishment—he deals with fines there, and I suppose he is not referring particularly to the North Western, but he says another company give more authority to subordinate officials, and we get what we may call a local foreman of a locomotive shed, and they give him authority to fine the men. We do not fine, as you know, but we should in such cases as the local foreman or station master felt that, for the proper discharge of the duties he is responsible for, a man must be suspended from duty, he would have power to do it, immediately reporting the case. The check upon him as to whether he exercises that authority or discretion properly or not would be that he has to report it to a superior official, and if necessary that superior official's action comes under review.

9572. Now I call your attention to 4746, where Mr. Bell refers to a case of three North Western brakesmen at Stockport, who were suspended for one day for errors in making out the drivers' tickets ?—Mr. Bell treats it rather lightly there. He treats the punishment as a severe one and the offence as a very light one, but that punishment, I find on inquiry, was inflicted when it was found necessary to bring the men under proper control. They had disregarded the reprimands they had received, and it became necessary to make an example of them.

9573. Is the duty of correctly making out the drivers' tickets important ?—Very important.

9574. Why is that ?—It is the record of his work, and it is necessary for the company to have a check upon that for various purposes.

9575. These cases occurred, but I gather from you that it was considered necessary to make an example in such cases ?—Yes.

9576. There are other questions, 4757, 4849, and the Questions 4890 to 4902. Those are cases of Crewe drivers being suspended for emitting black smoke and for blowing off steam. Mr. Bell treats the case as one of an officious foreman on the platform at Rugby reporting a man ?—Yes. At one of the subsequent questions he appears to refer to what he had said before and attributed the punishment to some officious foreman on the platform at Rugby reporting a man for blowing off steam in the case of a train running from London to Crewe.

9577. What do you say with regard to that ?—I say there is absolutely no foundation for such a statement. Mr. Bell does not give in his evidence much chapter and verse for what he says, but I say unhesitatingly, and I am confirmed in that by the officer in charge of the locomotive department, that even if an officious or any other kind of foreman was to report a driver for blowing off steam when he was running from London to Crewe and not stopping at Rugby—blowing off steam when passing through Rugby station—he would not be attended to. He would be looked upon as a foreman who was not fit for his place. The man would be expected, having run down to Rugby and having to slow down to go through the station, to blow off steam; but if he was standing in Rugby station blowing off steam to the annoyance of the people on the platform and to the waste of the coal and water that he had got in his engine, the foreman would be perfectly right in reporting him, and it would be for his superior officer to decide whether he should be blamed or not.

9578. So that it might have been a case of the latter kind, in which case you say the punishment would be quite justified ?—Yes. If Mr. Bell adheres to his statement that a foreman reported and obtained the punishment of a man running with a train through Rugby station from London to Crewe blowing off steam, I say he is incorrect.

9579. Then as to the engines emitting black smoke ?—As the Committee know, the company are liable to be taken before the magistrates and fined if they improperly emit black smoke from their engines, and we have been fined on occasions and there is no excuse for a driver doing it if he knows his work and attends to his work properly. Therefore if a man is reported for that and still continues, and is reported more than once, we will say several times, he has to be punished or removed to some other class of work.

9580. The next matter Mr. Bell refers to is at Questions 4763 to 4765. He gives instances of drivers being suspended for dropping lead plugs ?—With all deference to Mr. Bell, I do not think he knows much about what he is talking about, when he is speaking about dropping a lead plug being a minor offence.

9581. Will you just explain it to us ?—The lead plug is a plug of lead in a certain position in the boiler-plate, and if the water falls below that, the lead gets melted and the engine becomes out of use. It may even cause serious damage, because the engine is there useless on the line causing obstruction in the working, and, as I say, may possibly cause accident to the two men on the foot plate and damage to the engine, and there are very few cases of it. Mr. Aspinall, when he comes, will be able to explain, perhaps, more vividly to you than I can the result of this dropping of lead plugs, but there are very few cases in which, when a driver drops a lead plug, there is not gross carelessness on his part, and I have known cases in my own experience where they have dropped their lead plug for the purpose of shielding themselves from other neglect, perhaps neglect in making steam properly.

9582. Are these cases treated on their merits ?—Absolutely.

9583. In what way: is there an opportunity of explaining ?—Yes. The man is first of all bound to make a report of it himself, and that goes through his foreman. The foreman sees the engine when it comes into the shed. With the North Western there is generally an expert attached to the shed—a boiler-man. He makes his investigation and the driver is had up and has an opportunity of saying all about it, and in the end the superintendent decides whether he ought to be punished or not.

9584. There is one serious statement which has been made by Mr. Bell at Question 4798. He says that men are suspended pending inquiry, and then when found free from blame they are not paid for the time of their suspension. What do you say with regard to that ?—With regard to the North Western, that never has been the case. Whenever a man is suspended pending inquiry his case is fairly heard. It is not prejudged by the fact of his being suspended, and if it is found that he is not to blame, he is paid for the time that he is off work.

9585. There is a series of questions beginning at 4800, as to the signalmen's bonuses. You have something to say with regard to that; have you not ?—As far as the North Western is concerned, I think Mr. Bell is quite under a misapprehension. The bonus given by the North Western Company to signalmen is in no sense part of their wages. They are of varying amounts according to the class of signalmen, and they are given at the end of twelve months if their conduct has been good and if they have been free from irregularity or accident during the preceding twelve months. There are cases in which a man may have had some irregularity during the period, but on the superintendents and the chief officers going through the list at the end of the twelve months when these cases are brought up they see them, and if the man has had perhaps one or two irregularities that in their judgment they think are not sufficient to deprive him of the whole of the bonus he is deprived of half or perhaps a quarter of it; in other words, he has not been sufficiently good in his work during the whole of the twelve months to earn the full bonus.

Sir F. Harrison.

9586. What is the wage of a signalman in an important station signal box, for example ?—It goes up to 30s. a week, 32s. 6d. some, and his bonus would be £3 10s.

9587. Supposing he has a clean record for a year, his bonus is £3 10s. ?—They tell me that it goes up as high as £5. I think it goes from £2 10s. up to £5. That is from the lowest class of signalmen up to the highest, but it is in no sense part of the wages. It is really very much on the same principle, as some of the Committee know, as the quite common system in marine practice where the captain of a vessel will have a certain fixed rate of pay, but if he navigates his vessel for twelve months without accident, he has a bonus varying from £50 to £100.

9588. Is this bonus made a matter of contract as a rule ?—No, we could withdraw it at any time.

9589. When was this system instituted ?—In 1882. Then again I should say if the man is deprived of part of his bonus or the whole of his bonus—if his bonus is not allowed him and he feels that he has not been fairly treated he has a right of appeal and that comes to me and goes to the directors in the same way as any other grievance he has.

9590. He can memorialise the directors ?—Yes.

9591. You refer here to a meeting of officers held each half-year ?—Yes.

9592. What is that ?—The signalmen are all under the superintendents of the different districts. A superintendent will have perhaps—it varies according to the density of the traffic in the district—from 100 to 200 and they meet annually and go through the list of signalmen and decide as to whether they ought to be deprived of any portion of their bonus or not, but prima facie it is treated as if they were entitled to it.

9593. Is it consistent with your experience that that system of memorialising is ever adopted ?—Yes, I do not think there is a month but what in one department or another there will be a memorial from the men. I say monthly, because the committees meet monthly.

9594. Quite so. The men, of course, are an organised body—I mean they have their own unions, have not they?—Not to an appreciable extent on the North Western. Mr. Bell represents a certain number of men on the North Western, the Railway Amalgamated Society's Union, and the skilled mechanics are in their trade unions, but, speaking generally, by far the larger proportion, a very large proportion, I should think 80 or 90 per cent. of the North Western have nothing to do with Mr. Bell or any other union.

9595. That is not exactly what I was aiming at. I was rather aiming at this; you can understand that in a case of suspension which might be a considerable grievance to an individual man he might not report it, whereas if he was backed up by his union it might, so to speak, articulate the grievance as a class one and bring it before the directors ?—I can imagine that, but then perhaps I have a powerful imagination. That is not the fact in practice on the North Western. I do not know of one case in fifty where an appeal of the man that comes to the directors, or comes to me, has any indication that it is supported by the union or otherwise. He appeals entirely off his own bat and without hesitation to his superior officer. I think if the North Western men were polled they would say "we have no hesitation if we think our immediate superior or the next one above him is harsh"—because they go in grades—if the man thinks his inspector has been harsh upon him he has no hesitation in appealing first to his superintendent and then beyond him to me, and to the directors.

9596. That answer induces me to inquire whether there is any existing means such as there are in other parts of the country and in other trades of, so to speak, convening the employer interest and the workman interest together ?—Not with railways.

9597. Now we will come to another point, as to the friendly societies. That is referred to in Mr. Bell's evidence at Question 4812 and various other Questions ?—It is rather difficult to follow Mr. Bell in some of his statements.

9598. Just take your proof and see what you say ?—Yes, perhaps I had better read from that rather than trust to my memory.

9599. Do you think Mr. Bell's account is correct or authentic ?—No, not at all. I do not think he has mastered it with his usual determination to investigate.

9600. With regard to the insurance company on the London and North Western, what do you say ?—On the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, the North Western Railway abandoned any attempt, because it was made illegal by the provisions of that Act, to contract themselves out of the provisions of the Act. They accepted their liability under it, but it is well-known, no doubt, by the Committee that under the provisions of that Act the liability only commences after the expiration of two weeks from the date of the accident.

9601. Of course that by last year's statute is reduced to one ?—Yes, by the statute running from July 1st next. The insurance society that Mr. Bell speaks of provides an allowance to the men injured for the period before the company's liability takes effect—that is for the first fortnight—and also in case of temporary disablement a supplementary allowance to that provided under the Act and for which the company are liable. Therefore, beyond the company's liability under the Act the insurance society supplements that so as to bring it nearly up to the full wages or as nearly as the funds may afford.

9602. There is also an allowance in case of death ?—Yes, there is an allowance in case of death or permanent disablement arising from accident in the discharge of duty in those cases where under the Act the company is not liable—there are cases where the company is not liable under the Act—and an allowance in case of death arising from other causes than accident.

9603. Now the subscriptions ?—The subscriptions vary from 1d. to 3d. per week. The accident pay for the first two weeks ranges from 8s. to 24s. per week, and the supplemental allowance during the continuance of disablement from 4s. to 12s. per week. The natural death allowance varies from £5 to £15 and the allowance in case of death or total disablement where the company is not liable under the Act, varies from £20 to £60.

9604. Is there any supplement to the sum allowed where there is liability in case of death ?—Yes. There is no liability in the case of natural death.

9605. But in cases under the Act, you leave that to be assessed under the Statute ?—No, they are supplemented by the insurance society.

9606. To what extent ?—In case of temporary disablement they are supplemented to the extent of from 4s. to 12s. per week.

9607. It is the death cases I am pointing to. There seems to be a hiatus there you see ?—They are supplemented to the extent of where the company are not liable under the Act in case of death by sums varying from £20 to £60.

9608. Yes, but it is the case where the company is liable ?—In that case we accept our liability under the Act.

9609. You allow that to be assessed and there is no supplement from the insurance society ?—I suppose not. The company have practically nothing to do with the society.

9610. I know. I just want to get how it stands ?—The company have nothing to do with the society and they accept their liability in case of death or injury and the society steps in and says "We will supplement that by so much."

9611. The affairs of the society are managed by a committee are not they ?—Yes, they are managed by a committee composed of twelve members nominated by delegates elected by ballot to represent the members of the society. The company nominate three additional members to the committee of management, but, as will be seen, the management is really vested in the men themselves, who have a majority of twelve to three on the committee. The company do not contribute to the funds of the insurance society at all—they accept their liability under the Act—except at the commencement, they supplied a sum of money to start the fund, so that there should be something in hand without waiting for the weekly contributions to come in.

9612. Is membership of the society optional ?—Yes. it is optional for the insurance society.

9613. I think notwithstanding that there are upwards of 50,000 members ?—Upwards of 50,000 belong to it.

9615. On leaving the service there is no portion of their contribution given back of course ?—No.

9616. The ordinary insurance principle applies ?—Yes. There is another society for the benefit of the men on a different footing to deal with natural causes of disability from earning. That is called the Provident and Pension Society.

9617. May I ask you this before you pass from the insurance society. The company act as receivers of the money practically as bankers, do not they ?—Yes.

9618. That is of course a matter of great convenience to the men ?—Yes.

9619. And the credit of the 3d. is taken off their weekly wages ?—Yes, it is deducted from their wages. The company act as the bankers and pay 5 per cent. interest upon the money.

9620. You were referring to the Provident and Pension Society ?—That is on a different footing in some respects, but it is managed in the same way by a committee elected by the members. The company have three nominees on the committee out of fifteen and the company contribute to the funds of the society. I observe in one of Mr. Bell's answers that he states that the men have only two or three representatives, and that the management of the society is in the hands of the officials—I suppose he means the officials of the company; but that is not so, and I do not see how if he took pains to inquire he could have got such information. There are men of his own society who are on the managing committee of these two societies, and there is not one of them that would tell him that. They are very good men; they are good servants, and very intelligent, and give us in the management of these societies very great assistance; and for anybody to represent, or misrepresent rather, the facts in this way is beyond my comprehension.

9621. What are the objects of the society ?—To provide a weekly allowance in case of illness, a retiring gratuity for old or disabled members, and a death allowance to representatives of deceased members, and a pension to old or disabled members.

9622. In that case the membership of the society is compulsory, is it not ?—Yes. The committee perhaps would like to know one of the reasons for that. It was felt by the company when this society was formed that it was a good thing for provision to be made for the men under the circumstances I have just mentioned, and it was felt that it was not fair to the company, and to their fellow workmen who did join the society, that their fellow workmen, when the time came for them to be either ill or disabled or die that they should throw themselves on the charity of the company. The Company could not when a man had been working for a number of years simply turn him out into the street because he was unfit for work any longer, and they said, "You cannot see quite so far ahead as we can perhaps. So in your own interests this fund will be formed and first of all those who like to join it may join, but after a certain time all will have to join it or they will not be considered by the company to be doing their duty to themselves."

9623. Although it is called a provident and pension society, substantially you represent it as a universal system of deferred pay ?—I suppose that would be so.

9624. What I have in my head are the representations which are made in Parliament and so on as to superannuation to the police; it is always treated on a principle of deferred pay ?—Yes.

9625. In those cases have you any system for repayment supposing a man is leaving the service of the company ?—Yes. Members retiring from the service from any cause other than voluntary resignation or misconduct before reaching pension age are entitled to the return of one half of the premiums they have paid in respect of pensions.

9626. Can you tell me how much these credits of 3d. amount to in the course of the year ?—Perhaps the most simple way would be to hand one of these balance sheets to the Committee.

9627. Yes; if you will be so good as to give me the figure first ?—For the twelve months ending 31st December, 1906, the members' premiums and something for cards—that is the same category as premiums—amounted to £55,448 6s. 1d.

9628. A contribution is made by the company is not it ?—Yes; During that year the company contributed £10,921 8s. 6d.

9629. Upon what principle is that computed ?—We started the fund with a certain amount, and we have increased that from time to time until it has come up to this figure according as the membership increases and the fund seems to want assistance, and we have just obtained authority from the shareholders to subscribe as may be necessary from time to time an additional £5,000 a year.

9630. What I am rather pointing to is—one has of course to keep these things in view—would it be within the competency of the company to discontinue the contribution altogether ?—I suppose it would.

9631. Of course the likelihood of that is out of the region of all possibility ?—I think so—at least there is no knowing what changes may take place. But at all events they do not appear to be very imminent seeing that the company have gone on increasing their contributions regularly since the fund started. It was started by their own initiation, and they have gone on increasing, and up to 1904 they had subscribed £146,404 19s. 1d. in the next year they subscribed £6,827 and last year, that is 1906, the figure I have mentioned, £10,921, and within two months of the end of that year, that is in February last, they appealed to their shareholders for authority to subscribe up to another £5,000 a year. I do not think, seeing that the fund has been in force since 1883, that there has been much indication that the company intend to run away from their responsibility towards it.

9632. Still the question that I put to you remains. Is there any indication of a proportion of the contribution that is in the view of the company expedient or proper being withdrawn ?—No.

9633. It stands at present apparently about one-sixth of the whole, I mean relatively to the workmen's contributions ?—About that.

9634. Now will you turn to Question 4861 in Mr. Bell's evidence ?—Mr. Bell there is a little bit wrong. He says that the company recently formed a pension fund for the locomotive men without consulting the men at all, and made membership of it compulsory on appointment or promotion.

9635. How do the facts stand ?—The facts are really that in the early eighties the men in the locomotive department preferred to have a separate pension fund of their own, and one was established in 1883, but some dissatisfaction arose, and in 1889 the society was dissolved at the men's own request and by their own action and the fund was divided. Recently within the last year or two finding that these locomotive men were not provided for in old age as the men in other branches of the service were, they applied to the directors to establish a new fund for them. The directors were of opinion that the establishment of a new and additional fund was unnecessary seeing that there was already in existence a society established in 1889, comprising upwards of 45,000 members in other branches of the service, while the number of locomotive men requiring to be provided for did not exceed 12,000. There was no necessity to have several funds going. The case was, therefore, met by the withdrawal of the restriction which had hitherto precluded the locomotive men from joining the existing society, and a considerable number of them have since joined, although it was quite voluntary on the part of the men already in the service. The men in the service appealed to be allowed to join a fund. The directors said, "There is a fund established already, and you are not allowed to join it, but you shall be in future if you desire to do so under the rules of the society," and the men managing that society—the directors having allowed the rule to be altered so as to enable these locomotive men to join—the committee of management of the Society formed by the men, then drew up a scale of payment by which they might be admitted, but it was decided that men who obtained promotion in the service or joined the service after that time, should be required, as the existing 45,000 members had been, to join the society.

9636. So that it is made a condition of service in fact ?—It is made a condition of service.

9637. Is there any hardship in that, in your opinion ?—I do not think so at all.

9638. Who fixed the scale of contribution ?—The men's committee of management.

9639. Do you supplement in that case ?—It is part of this society.

9640. Now Question 4874 : That is the case of a North Western engine-driver ?—Yes. Mr. Bell mentions the case of a North Western engine driver who had been unable to obtain an allowance he claimed from the insurance society in respect of injury in the course of his employment. The facts are that the company paid him what he was entitled to under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the allowance he claimed was from an insurance society attached to the locomotive department, which is in no way supported by the company, and in the management of which they have no part. It has nothing to do with this society at all. It is purely a voluntary association formed amongst the men themselves, and managed by them, so that the dispute is one between the man in question and his fellow-workmen, while it is put forward as a grievance against the company. In this connection, Mr. Bell says, "There are many such cases where the men cannot get their reasonable due because the societies are largely in the hands of the officials of the company who dominate the whole policy, although the men are compelled to join." I think I have explained sufficiently to the Committee that on both the societies that the company take any part in, their membership of the committee of management consists of three members and the men of twelve, and the three representatives of the company on those two committees are really more to give the men advice, good or bad as it may be, and not to take a controlling part in the conduct of affairs.

9641. Then Question 4941 ?—Mr. Bell states that all the societies are badly insolvent, and that there is no guarantee for their solvency. He does not say what is his authority for the sweeping statement.

9642. Do you believe it ?—No, I do not think so. It has never been actuarially investigated, but I do not know that an actuarial investigation even would prove that it is either solvent or insolvent. The North-Western Provident and Pension Society, at any rate, has a balance in hand at the present moment of upwards of £220,000, and the guarantee for its solvency is that the contributions and benefits are fixed by the members through their delegates, and could be adjusted, if necessary. If the members and their delegates consider that the fund is insolvent as Mr. Bell does, it is a simple matter for them to reduce the benefits so as to fit with the contribution.

9643. Or increase the contribution ?—Yes.

9644. Then questions 4990 and 4996 ?—Mr. Bell apparently makes it a grievance that when a man belongs both to the Insurance and Provident Societies, if he meets with an accident, he cannot draw accident pay from the Provident Fund, while if he is laid up by ordinary sickness, he cannot draw benefits from the Accident Insurance Fund. Seeing that the two funds are established for two different purposes, this would naturally follow, but where a man belongs to both these societies, in case of death from any other cause than accident on duty his representatives do receive an allowance from both. So that Mr. Bell totally inaccurate in that. In the same way if a man is permanently disabled by an accident in the discharge of his duty, but for which the company is not liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, or is only liable up to £10, he would receive an allowance from both societies, namely his pension from the Provident Fund, and the permanent disablement allowance from the Insurance Society.

By Mr. Walsh.

9645. I suppose, Sir Frederick, even when your system of fines was in existence there would still be the reprimand ? —Yes.

9646. Many times when fines were not inflicted at all ? —Yes.

9647. And the caution, I suppose ?—That is the reprimand. The reprimand and caution are the same.

9648. They would be convertible terms then ?—Yes. I think the committee would be rather surprised if they were to see—in some cases I know it often surprises me—the number of times a man gets cautioned without any other punishment, until at last he happens to commit himself, and the wonder is that he has not been disposed of before.

9649. You put it to us that there are a good many cases where nothing except a caution is administered ?—Yes.

9650. At last, however, the offence becomes a serious one and the man is suspended or possibly dismissed ?—Yes.

9651. So that in addition to the figures that you gave us up to 1896, the fines and the suspensions, there really ought to be added those cases of reprimand ?—Yes, those cases are on all fours ; those figures did not include reprimands in either period.

9652. Both classes of years do not include reprimands ? —No.

9653. I notice since 1902 there has been a very considerable drop in the number of suspensions ?—They have been gradually going down I think.

9654. It is very considerable if we compare the last year with 1902. There has been a very considerable drop indeed ?—Yes.

9655. A fall of about 2,800 ?—Yes.

9656. Or getting well on for 30 per cent. of the suspensions in the year 1902 ?—Yes.

9657. So that that would seem to imply that after all the fines had not a very elevating effect upon the morale of the men so to speak, does it not ?—You can infer a good many things from these figures but my own personal feeling is that the suspension has a better effect upon the morale of the men than fines, but that is only my own view, everybody does not agree with it.

9658. We are all quite certain that the management of your company has not deteriorated, and inasmuch as it is found year after year that the number of suspensions is very considerably going down, we are driven to the conclusion or at least I am driven to the conclusion, that the suspension has a better moral effect on the men. In the case of these two societies where Mr. Bell complains that if a man meets with an accident he does not receive provident pay I understand you to say you do not see there is any real grievance in that. You fail to perceive a grievance if one exists ?—Yes.

9659. I notice from your evidence that you say they are two distinct societies ?—Yes.

9660. Under separate managements ?—Yes, but a good many of the men are on the same committee, if not entirely.

9661. There are two distinct elections ; two ballots are taken ?—Yes.

9662. And the personnel of the committees will vary somewhat ?—Yes, I think they do somewhat, but it is insignificant if it does.

9663. Still, admittedly, they are two different societies ? —Yes, they are for two different purposes.

9664. Supposing a man were to pay to two distinct societies in any other respect would he not get two distinct classes of benefit—I mean supposing these societies were not in existence at all just for the purposes of the moment ?—May I put it my way ; I dare say it will meet your point.

9665. Yes ?—If a man insures with a public insurance company against accident, and he dies a natural death he would not get paid by that accident society unless it was part of the conditions of his policy. I think if he insures his house against burglary with one office and against fire with another, that both offices will not pay him in the event of the burglary.

9666. Supposing now that I had insured against sickness —there are companies that insure against sickness ?—Yes.

9667. And I met with an accident in the course of my employment, would that company not pay me during the time I suffered from the results of that accident ?—I should say it depended entirely upon the conditions of the policy.

9668. I will put it in another way: do you know of any ordinary friendly society that does not pay to the member his sick benefit when he has sustained an accident in the employment of some company ?—That is part of the conditions upon which he joins the society. He joins these two separate societies, one of which he need not join at all unless he likes. But my point really is—I do not see that there is any unfairness in the present conditions of the two societies, but if the men think there is they can consider what alteration of the rules would be necessary in order to remove it. But I think it would be found rather a difficult matter to get the men who are in the one society and not in the other to agree to alter the rules and to make both societies provide for the same thing.

9669. Have you any knowledge as to what proportion the payments made by the men to the insurance society bears to the ordinary payments to the various friendly societies throughout the country ?—No, I have not 9670. Have you any knowledge as to what the proportion of weekly payments made is to the benefits received ?—No.

9671. Are you aware whether the ordinary Friendly Societies, the Foresters, the Oddfellows, and so on, make payments for sickness to their members when they meet with an accident ?—I do not really know.

9672. You are not aware ?—No.

9673. With regard to the areas—when a man meets with an accident have you surgeons appointed for particular areas ?—The society have surgeons—doctors.

9674. For the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act the company will have surgeons appointed ?—We have our own doctors in different parts of the country.

9675. It would be absolutely necessary, I take it, that the man's case should be reported as quickly as possible for the company's own purposes, and that for the purpose of treating the case there will be surgeons in attendance as quickly as possible ?—Yes.

9676. Is the surgeon for the company generally the same surgeon as attends for these societies—is he one and the same person ?—I cannot say. I have not inquired what the society do really; the society manage their own affairs; I could not tell you.

9677. You could not inform the committee as to whether the surgeon who attends for the company when a man has met with an accident is the same surgeon to whom the cases are reported for the provident and insurance societies ?—I am not sure myself. I do not know of my own knowledge, but if the Committee desire somebody who is more intimate with the affairs of the society than I am he can come and tell you.

9678. Is that information not in the possession of your assistants who are present ?—Here is the secretary of the society, but he must not pass that through my mouth; I am not going to interfere with the affairs of the Society. If I did I should be accused later on by Mr. Bell of having taken an active part in its affairs, and I cannot give evidence with regard to it.

9679. You may take it from me that I am not troubling in any way with Mr. Bell's evidence. Every one of these questions is prompted from my own practical knowledge as to how these matters are carried out ?—I would sooner not speak of matters connected with a society that I am not acquainted with. There happens to be a gentleman in the room who is possessed of the information, and he can come here and answer any questions on that.

9680. Perhaps the gentleman who is present can go into the witness chair ?—If the committee desire it.

9681. I do not think it is necessary just at the moment. However, the complaint of Mr. Bell is that the management of these societies is largely in the hands of officials of the company ?—Yes.

9682. You have given to that, I will not say a blank denial, but a fairly effective denial ?—I meant to.

9683. A blank denial ?—I meant to.

9684. Of course, it is difficult to say what the full meaning of the term "official" might be. Is it a fact, however, that these two societies are largely dominated by men who are looked upon as your officials—officials of the company ?—No—absolutely no. They are officials of the company, of course, or they could not be in the society, but that their influence is directed at all by the company I distinctly deny, I give to the words "officials of the company" the ordinary acceptation of the words, and the one that I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that Mr. Bell intended to convey to the committee was that the business of these societies was controlled, or influenced, I do not know which word he uses, by the officials of the company. I say it is distinctly untrue that it is controlled by officials of the company. They are employees of the company, but the men whether they are drawing wages at a weekly rate, or at a monthly rate, are officials of the company; therefore, strictly perhaps, Mr. Bell is correct in saying that the affairs of the societies are controlled by the officials of the company. That is the only excuse I can make for him, but that is not the impression he intended to convey.

9685. I rather think he was giving a narrower significance to the term "officials" ?—So do I.

9686. He was referring, I imagine, to salaried officers rather than to men who were simply in your weekly service, or fortnightly service, as the case may be, and receiving wages in the ordinary sense. With regard to the pension fund that was recently instituted in connection with the locomotive department; you say it is now a condition of service in the case of new appointments that the men must contribute to that fund ?—Perhaps I did not make it quite clear. There is no pension fund recently established in connection with the locomotive department. The pension fund that exists has opened its doors to the men in the locomotive department to become members if they desire.

9687. An intimation was sent out several months ago, I suppose from your offices at Crewe, to the locomotive men. Anyhow new appointments in your service are dependent upon membership of that fund ?—Yes.

9688. And promotion, even in the case of old appointments, is also dependent upon membership of that fund ?—I believe that has come into operation now.

9689. Do you not think that that is rather a hardship upon the men ?—I do not think so.

9690. I only ask you that because you say here that if there is any hardship in that you fail to perceive it. You say: "If there is any hardship in this, or it constitutes any grievance on the part of the men, witness fails to perceive it" ?—Yes, I do not see any hardship in it.

9691. I would like to put this question to you. Many of these men who are forty-five years of age will have been in your service a great many years, I take it ?—Yes. I should say that the rules of the society prevent anyone of the age of forty-five years and upwards being admitted.

9692. Forty-five and under, I am speaking of ?—I beg your pardon.

9693. Those who are forty-five, or even a few years under, of course have at present to join if they look for promotion ?—Yes.

9694. Promotion is naturally sought by every man in your employment I suppose ?—I hope so.

9695. And they accepted employment in the reasonable hope, if they gave you efficient service, of promotion ?—Yes.

9696. Without any such condition as this being then in existence ?—Yes.

9697. Do you not think that is rather a hardship ?—They also, I think, I am entitled to say, expected that when they reached the end of their period of service with good conduct, the company would, if they had not made provision for themselves, give them something in their old age.

9698. But that would be quite conditional upon your own good will, would it not. They would have no claim upon you, although it has been done to the amount of some thousands of pounds a year for these particular men. I am submitting this point to you for your consideration that these people under forty-five years of age, many of them comparatively young men but getting on to middle age, when they accepted service in your company, they accepted service under open conditions, a condition which is now existent not being then imposed upon them, and that inasmuch as the men are giving you—otherwise they would not be in your employment—effective service, that they ought to have a reasonable hope of promotion, but that if that promotion is now dependent upon other conditions the knowledge of which they did not possess a little while ago, I submit to you that there a hardship is imposed upon these men. Do you still think there is no hardship upon them ?—I do. I do not think any hardship has been imposed upon these men. I should like if you can give me an instance or two where that has been the case.

9699. I suppose papers have been supplied to these men pointing out——?—Why not be practical for a moment ? Why not, instead of generalising in this way, be practical and say if you know of any cases where a man has been refused promotion because he has not joined this society.

9700. Let me say this : I will be practical for a moment : I have seen the papers that have been supplied from your Crewe office ?—I can quite imagine that.

9701. And one of the conditions is to this effect ; that promotion in the case of people under forty-five will be dependent now upon their joining the society ?—How long ago did you see it ?

9702. I think I am rather being cross-examined myself. I saw it a few months ago. It came from your Crewe office and it is signed by a gentleman whose name is Mr. Whale, I think. I saw the printed matter myself.—As I am being cross-examined by a gentleman who evidently will not show the information which he has got, I will read what I have got at all events which may assist the Committee in forming an opinion. The gentleman who issued a notice from Crewe is the head of the locomotive department and his name is Whale. His printed notice which I can hand to the committee is dated October 3rd and it says that workmen obtaining in the ordinary course or specially an advance in the rate of their wages are not to be thereupon required to join the provident and pension society, but may like any other eligible person, join voluntarily. I think that answers your question.

9703. Was not an earlier notice than that sent out ? —There has been no later one.

9704. Was one sent out in May, or about May, of last year ?—There may, or there may not have been.

9705. Are you aware that the condition I stated was upon the notice sent out in May last ?—I am not aware of it. I am aware of the present instruction, and that is it. (Handing in document).

9706. But you do admit that promotion is dependent now in the case of all these people who have been years in your service upon their joining the society ?—I do not say anything of the kind, and I do not see how you can draw that conclusion. If that notice is adhered to, as I believe it is, you can get promotion, or an advance of wage, and it says those who obtain promotion or an advance of wage, are not to be required to join the society. How can he obtain promotion without a advance of wage ?

9707. An advance of wage is not neces arily promotion ?—Is not it.?

9708. You are evidently a much higher authority than I am, but I suppose a man's wages can be advanced without his being necessarily promoted ?—Is it profitable for us to discuss these questions ; I do not think it is.

9709. I think it is, if you will pardon me. You see you make a definite statement here that you do not perceive any grievance in a certain condition which is now imposed. May I read your own statement : " It is certainly now made a condition of service on appointment or promotion " ?—Yes.

9710. This thing is now being compulsorily imposed upon the men. It is made a condition of appointment and it is also made a condition of promotion. It is quite a new condition which was not laid before the men when they started in your service sixteen, or possibly twenty years ago, and I ask you, do you think there is no hardship in that ?—I have said more than once that I do not think there is a hardship in it. Mere repetition of the question and answer will not make it any more forcible.

By Mr. Delevingne.

9711. I think the salaried officers of your company are under a different pension scheme from the wage-earning members ?—Yes.

9712. The salaried officers therefore would not be members of the provident and pension society ?—No.

9713. Would they therefore be eligible for election on the committee of management ?—No, except as one of the three representatives of the company.

9714. So that the twelve representatives of the members on the committee of management must all be wage-earning servants of the company ?—Yes.

9715. And not officials in the ordinary sense of the word ?—No.

By the Chairman.

9716. May I ask your attention to this document signed by Mr. Whale just in order to clear it up. It says : " Following up my circular No. 2603 of the 1st ultimo "—do you happen to have that circular ?—Yes I have a copy of it here.

9717. Can we have it ?—Certainly. (Handing in document).

9718. The date of the circular I see is September 1st ? —Yes.

9719. It is followed by this placard which you have handed in which is dated October 3rd ?—Yes.

9720. Both in the year 1906 ?—That is so. Perhaps I should explain that the directors were approached, by the locomotive men, who, I think, number between 11,000 and 12,000, with a strong desire expressed, as I said in my evidence in chief, that they should have a society formed for those purposes, and after consideration the directors felt that they could withdraw the prohibition against their belonging to or joining the present society, and I think they not unnaturally concluded that there would be a desire on the greater part of the 11,000 or 12,000 men to join, and the first intimation that they would be at liberty to do so conveyed also the intimation that they would be required on promotion or on new appointments to join. That attitude caused a grievance amongst some of the men and it was then decided to suspend the compulsory joining of the society for a time until it was hoped the men would see the reasonableness of joining what they had asked for.

9721. This circular of September 1st, 1906, starts by this reference : " Certain grades of workmen having desired to be provided for by pensions payable on old age or on incapacitation, I hand you herewith a copy of the general manager's circular No. 3163 embodying the terms upon which they can be admitted into the provident and pension society." Can I get that circular ?—Yes, this is the circular. (Handing document.)

9722. I just want to get at the bottom of this mysterious document ?—Quite so.

9723. That circular is dated September 1st, 1906 ?—Yes.

9724. I see it starts by the statement : " It has been decided to allow the staff employed in the locomotive department to join " ?—Yes.

9725. Then it gives the scale of payments ?—Yes

9726. It will be seen that only men under forty-five years of age are eligible ?—Yes.

9727. "The company's regulations will in future require that men otherwise eligible shall join the society upon receiving an advance of wages" ?—Yes.

9728. I think we are now getting at it ?—Yes.

9729. That no doubt has been probably the secret of the source of Mr. Walsh's information ?—No doubt.

9730. At any rate so late as September 1st, the company's regulations were stated to require that men otherwise eligible shall join upon receiving an advance of wages ?—Yes.

9731. To that extent it is modified, is it not, in the circular of October 3rd, by saying that the workmen obtaining in the ordinary course or specially an advance in the rate of wages are not to be thereupon required to join the provident and pension society, but may do it voluntarily ?—That is so.

9732. I am sorry I cannot give you any further contribution to elucidate it, but so far, that is correct ?—That is so. That resolution was suspended for the time.

9733. Is there anything which was antecedent to those circulars of the September 1st, 1906, with regard to the joining of this provident and pension socity. If so I would like to have it ?—No, not with regard to the locomotive men. There is a book of rules of course for the society if you would like to have that ?

9734. Can you give us the reference to the rule affecting this subject in the book of rules ?—The society existed prior to these circulars, but the London and North Western Company had made a rule that the staff in the locomotive department would not be eligible to join this society.

Sir F. Harrison.

19 Mar. 1907.

9735. Can you give me the reference to that rule ?—That was a minute of the board.

9736. That was the state of things in the autumn of 1906 ?—Yes. They withdrew their minute of prohibition, I suppose, in August.

9737. They came to a decision to allow the staff in the locomotive department to join ?—Yes.

9738. Was that information on September 1st the first information giving a scale of contributions ?—Yes.

9739. There is nothing else you can give us to clear up this little matter is there ?—No, I do not think so. I hope the point is clear that the directors having received an application of almost a universal character from the men in this department to have some fund formed for provision for them in case of sickness or old age, said: "Well, at present our instruction debars you from belonging to the existing provident and pension society, but we will withdraw that instruction and ask the committee of management of that society to draw up a scale of contributions and benefits under which you can be admitted," and the committee of management did so and I intimated by that circular to the staff of the locomotive department that those were the terms upon which they could be admitted, and then Mr. Whale, as the head of the locomotive department, passed this on with his own intimation, as you see by those two circulars.

Mr. JOHN AUDLEY FREDERICK ASPINALL, called; and Examined.

By Sir Frederick Cawley (in the Chair).

9740. You are the general manager of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company ?—I am.

9741. You are in the habit, of course, of controlling a large number of men ?—Yes.

9742. You speak from an experience of over thirty years ?—Yes. For a number of years previous to my appointment as general manager of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway in July 1899, I had been chief mechanical engineer of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company, after having been on the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland, controlling a large number of men employed in the running of trains, and in the various locomotive and carriage and wagon-building workshops.

9743. You are very much impressed, I think, with the necessity of having proper discipline and some means of maintaining it amongst men ?—Yes. It is essential that you must have some method of maintaining discipline with any army of men such as you have upon a railway and unfortunately you sometimes have to punish if you sometimes have to reward.

9744. Your staff numbers something like 33,000 ?—About 33,000.

9745. Does that include the clerical staff ?—No, that does not include the clerical staff; those are the wages staff. That is a round figure.

9746. After the Truck Act of 1896 was passed, you instituted a new scale of fines ?—Yes, we issued a scale of fines which might be imposed by the company for certain acts or omissions which were mentioned in the notice, though, of course, such a notice cannot possibly cover the multitude of things that may happen on a railway.

9747. That was a reduction of the fines that were previously imposed, was it ?—That arrangement was come to as a matter of experience from the fines which had been previously imposed.

9748. But necessitated by the 1896 Act ?—Yes.

9749. Those rules and regulations and list of fines are supplied to all your staff, are they ?—Yes, the rules and regulations are supplied to all our staff, and every man who comes into our employment signs a form in which he agrees to abide by our conditions.

9750. Any fines are, of course, taken off his wages at the end of the week ?—Yes, and the men are quite aware of what they are subject to.

Mr. J. A. F. Aspinall.

9751. Have you a scale of the fines here ?—This is the kind of thing that was issued. (Producing document). This is headed "Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, Truck Act, 1896. For inattention whilst on duty. Absence from duty without leave. Coming late on duty. Leaving duty before proper time, or before being relieved. Coming on duty without proper rest, or otherwise unfit for duty. Permitting relief by men unauthorised or unfit for duty," and so on. Those are all fines of 2s. 6d. Those are the maximum fines.

9752. Have the tendencies in your management been to do without fining so much, or do you still continue as you began in 1896 ?—We still continue to fine, but we have believed that we can, what shall I say, make the punishment fit the crime. The fact is that there are two views; you have heard one expressed this morning and I do not know that they contradict one another really, but it is a question of graduation. We rather felt that if we were to have suspensions only, we might sometimes punish a man more severely than the actual offence warranted, and therefore, we thought we ought to retain the system of fining. We explain that by saying that supposing you have a driver earning 7s. 6d. a day, and you suspend him, he loses a day's work, and that is a 7s. 6d. fine. If you have the power to fine him, perhaps you would consider, supposing it was his first offence, or a comparatively trivial offence, or for any other reason which might appeal to your mind as affecting the question, that half-a-crown would be quite sufficient, and the reason why we have retained our fining system has been merely on the side of moderation.

9753. Might I put it in this way, that although you would agree with Sir Frederick Harrison that suspension might be quite as good for discipline as fines you think that suspension is rather harder upon the men than fines ?—I do not think I should say that right away through. I think it may be harder in such a case as the one I have mentioned, and, of course, the figures which were given to you by Sir Frederick Harrison rather tend to show that the result of suspension as put by one of the members of this Committee has been to reduce the number of occasions for suspension. That may be due to the system being one of greater severity.

9754. Or because of greater efficiency ?—Whichever way you like to put it, but it may be that the punishment for an offence is so serious that it produces greater discipline. It is arguable either way I admit.

Mr. J. A. F. Aspinall.

19 Mar. 1907.

9755. It would be a matter of argument whether severity of punishment and efficiency are more or less synonymous, or whether one follows the other ?—I quite agree, but I think you can argue either way, as I said just now.

9756. You desire, as I understand, to keep on your present system of fines in preference to adopting such a system as the North Western adopt, who rely upon suspension and do not have fines at all. You prefer your system ?—I should prefer to go on with our present system of suspension and have fines where suspension is unnecessary. I think you must have some form of punishment. The only thing is that you have to take care that your officers deal with the men justly and fairly.

9757. You do not consider that your system is any harder on the men than the North Western system ?—No, I think not.

9758. You have read the evidence given before this Committee by Mr. Bell ?—Yes.

9759. You would like to refer to some of the statements made by him ?—Yes.

9760. Will you take Questions 4724, 4727, and 4728, where Mr. Bell refers to the scale of fines in force on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, and states that there is no general list or schedule supplied to the men ?—That I have already handed in. That statement is quite incorrect.

9761. He then goes on to say that the fixing of the fine for the particular offence is left to the caprice or will of the employer ?—I think not. The schedule shows what the fine may be. Sometimes the fine is less than the amount which is shown in the schedule, but I should say no fine is inflicted without the greatest consideration. We do not put it in the power of minor officers to fine our men, and any fine which is inflicted has to be agreed to, or rather has to be imposed—because he is the only man who can impose it, by the head of the department concerned. In the event of any offence having been committed it is the duty of the subordinate officers to make their recommendations to the head of the department, and he may, or he may not, agree with them. If the head of the department even then fines a man, or suspends him, that in the ordinary course goes up to the general manager for review, and is finally submitted to the directors. I may say that there are a number of checks upon any injustice.

9762. Then you disagree with Mr. Bell altogether in that respect, and you think that fines are not imposed capriciously or injustly ?—I disagree with him entirely and I think it is a most disagreeable duty which has to be performed by the officers, which they, as they are obliged to punish the men, dislike very much, and therefore they take the very greatest care to see that their punishments are just. I should like to add if I may that it is suggested at question 4729 that the employee does not know what amount he will be fined for the breach of regulations. I have already explained to the Committee that the man is always told in writing what amount he has been fined, and he knows beforehand from the published list of fines what the deduction is as a maximum, and, of course, it may be less, you see.

9763. Then at Question 4731 Mr. Bell states that the locomotive shed foremen have authority to impose fines? That is not the case on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway ?—It can only be done by one of the chief officers of the railway, and even then it is subject to revision by superior authority.

9764. With regard to the Question numbered 4735 what have you to say ?—The fine is mentioned in Clause 5 of the printed notice, so that the statement that he does not know is not correct.

9765. In that case it was stated that a driver at Accrington was fined 3s. 6d. for causing wagons to get bufferlocked at Accrington from the 7th to 10th November. (Under Clause 5, notice dated October, 1899), and the witness added that the entry is signed in the name of the chief mechanical engineer but really initialled by somebody else, " Very likely some subordinate officer has had the authority given to him " ?—Yes. It must not be inferred, because a document or letter is initialled by somebody else that the chief officer, the chief mechanical engineer, has not given the instruction because in such a department there are hundreds of letters which must be signed by somebody other than the chief officer although it can only be done with his authority.

9766. And now with regard to Question 4780. Mr. Bell in his evidence gave instances as to Wigan on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, stating that the total number of cases in which fines were inflicted during the ten weeks ending May 18th, 1905, amounted to ninety-five, and the total amount of fines was £13 5s. 3d?—That is entirely inaccurate. As for the period in question there was only one case of a fine at Wigan shed, namely, 5s. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the number of fines inflicted in our traffic department during the same period in the Wigan district and find that there were only four cases. I cannot understand how such a statement as appeared in his evidence could have been made by Mr. Bell. He must have been absolutely misinformed. It is, I think, evident from the interrogations by the Chairman of this Committee that he could not believe Mr. Bell to be right.

9767. With regard to Question 4784 Mr. Bell there mentioned a case of seven cleaners fined 2s. 6d. each and one cleaner 5s. for the week ending March 16th, 1905 ?—Mr. Bell's evidence appears to indicate that the seven cleaners who were fined 2s. 6d. each and the cleaner who he says was fined 5s. were employed at Wigan, but this is not so. The men were employed at Sand Hills and the fine of 5s. should be 3s. for card playing. If men are not to be fined for absenting themselves from their work and playing cards I don't know what they are to be fined for.

9768. Will you please now notice the three succeeding questions put by the Chairman in Mr. Bell's evidence which read as follows :—

> " Question 4786 : I wish to ask you specially about the proportion that those cases at Wigan bear to the number of men employed. The depot at Wigan has 230 men and boys employed there ?—Yes.—I was going to say about 250.
> Question 4787 : It is out of that number that in ten weeks there were ninety-five cases ?—Yes.
> Question 4788 : The point I wanted to get from you is, are you quite sure of that figure, because there seem to have been in ten weeks ninety-five employés fined out of 230 ?—Yes.
> Question 4789 : You observe that is about three-eighths of the whole staff ?—Yes."

—It is quite clear that the Chairman of this Committee could not quite believe that Mr. Bell was accurate and gave him every opportunity of putting the thing right. Mr Bell is absolutely wrong.

9769. Mr. Bell has been communicated with and he writes :—

> " I have made a full enquiry from those who supplied me with the information and I desire to inform you that I was led to understand all the cases is question happened at Wigan. This turns out to be incorrect. The information was copied from a list periodically posted on the Lancashire and Yorkshire system giving particulars of cases which have happened all over the line ; particulars from the list posted at Wigan were sent to me in a way which caused me to believe that all the cases had happened at that centre instead of throughout the system. This list is of a very similar character to that which I handed in in connecttion with the London and North Western Company. The cases quoted will stand good with the correction that they do not apply to Wigan alone but also to other depots on the line. I regret that there should have been any error."

—A strong statement of the kind in question ought not to have been made without proper enquiry and foundation.

9770. Do you rebut the evidence, apart from the fact that the cases did not occur at Wigan alone ?—The force of the statement lies in the fact that so many fines were said to have been inflicted upon a body of 230 men.

9771. Do you agree that the evidence is accurate as applying to the whole system ?—No doubt it is approximately accurate if it is applied to the whole system, but the whole system means 33,000 men. The average amount per annum of the fines imposed on the staff of 33,000 in the employ of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company during the last four years amounted to £161 3s. and last year (1906) it was £121 15s.

9772. You do not take these fines at all for the benefit of the company ?—Oh no, certainly not. They are paid to the credit of a special fund out of which charitable grants are made to men or their dependents who have been employed by the company from time to time in necessitous cases where there is no other fund of the company to draw upon, and I may say that frequently the company adds considerably to the amount.

9773. With regard to the institutions which you have in connection with your line will you tell us what they are ?—In connection with large railway works there are generally some institutions of which the men like to become members. We have, for instance, a mechanic's institution for which the men pay a subscription. They enter it entirely at their own pleasure and at their written request. For their convenience, the subscription is deducted from their wages and paid over by us to the institution, but that is only done upon their own formal written request, which they are at liberty to withdraw at any time.

9774. Have you any pension fund such as there is on the London and North Western Railway ?—We have an insurance fund for which the men pay 1d. per week, which is deducted from their wages. They manage the insurance fund entirely themselves and we have nothing to do with it.

9775. The company do not contribute to it ?—Not to that. The men manage it entirely and pay their own secretary, but we give them a room and some office facilities.

9776. Is it a condition of their employment that they should join ?—Yes, no man is taken on, unless he joins the insurance fund. The workmen elect their own delegates from the different districts and manage the whole thing through their own committee.

9777. Is that the only fund of the kind you have ?—We have a superannuation fund for the officers of the company. A certain number of other employees were formerly admitted, drivers and firemen, but we do not receive them now. The company are about to establish a pension fund which has not yet, however, come into force. We got powers under an Act of Parliament last session to guarantee that fund, and it will be brought into operation this year.

9778. You heard Sir Frederick Harrison's evidence, and with reference to it what I wanted to know is have you any institutions analogous to those which he spoke of in connection with the London and North Western Railway ?—Not similar to those he spoke of. I have mentioned those that we have, namely, the superannuation fund for the officers, the pension fund that is to be and the insurance society which the men manage themselves.

9779. What do you mean by the officers ?—That term covers all the salaried staff. The doors of the fund were opened some few years ago to a certain number of drivers and firemen, but they are not now admitted to that fund

By Mr. Walsh.

9780. Is the printed Truck Act notice produced a copy of the notice shown and posted at your works ?—It is a copy of the notice posted at all the various depots but not of the notices posted at the workshop where the indoor men work under different conditions from the outdoor men.

9781. You have said that the conditions of employment are in the companies book of rules and regulations supplied to every member of the staff. Does that book contain these conditions ?—Yes.

9782. May I take it that there is a large variety of offences that are not named here ?—The outdoor men,—that is, the men conducting the traffic, drivers, firemen guards, shunters, porters, signalmen, etc., every class and grade conducting the traffic—come under that notice, but the workshops are on a different footing.

9783. I suppose there would be a large variety of possible offences that cannot be included in the Truck Act notice ?—The notice is so drawn as to endeavour to cover everything.

9784. The interpretation could be of an expansive character ?—No doubt it could.

9785. You say that the men know beforehand from the published list of fines what their deductions may be ?—Yes, what they may be.

9786. Anything under the maximum ?—Yes, quite true.

9787. And perhaps it is in that sense that Mr. Bell spoke of the capricious amounts ?—I am quite willing to believe it.

9788. You got the fines down last year to about £121 as the total amount ?—Yes.

9789. Which is a little less than 50s. per week over the whole of your system for 33,000 men ?—Yes.

9790. Does not this suggest that you could nearly do away with the fines, when the total gets so low ?—I don't think so. I think that these fines becoming known to everybody have a moral effect in preventing others from committing offences. It is not only the effect upon the delinquent himself, but the effect on the rest of the men that we have to consider.

9791. Do you think that these fines, which must have been very small in individual cases, can, after all, have a very deterrent effect on other individuals ?—Yes, I think so, because men don't like to see their names on the fine sheet.

9792. Referring again to the evidence of Sir Frederick Harrison, whose company is largely run on lines similar to your own, do you not think the deterrent effect could be brought about by suspension ?—No doubt. My own view with regard to suspension is that it sometimes punishes a man rather too severely; but we do suspend in some cases. Perhaps I might mention that some years ago when I had charge of the mechanical engineers department there was an occasion when a number of drivers and firemen came to see me upon certain questions connected with the conditions of service, and they made a special request that the system of suspension should not be adopted. They strongly urged that we should adhere to the system of fines instead of suspension. I give your committee that for what it is worth.

9793. A complaint has been made that many of the fines are inflicted for what perhaps can hardly be described as offences. Mr. Bell, for instance, spoke to us about an engineman who was fined for pulling the guard's van off the track. He may have manipulated the engine so as to pull the van too quickly or with greater power than was necessary. Mr. Bell pointed out to us that this would not be done by an engineman willingly and that for such an act as that a driver ought not to have been fined ?—That depends entirely upon how the guard's van got off the line. If, through carelessness, the driver sent it through the trap points and thereby blocked the road it would be a serious offence. Is the whole railway to be held up because a man is careless ? Vans may come off the lines in a dozen ways, and I don't know the circumstances of the case in question, but if the man was careless and so brought the van off the line that would be a serious offence, and not a trivial one.

9794. Might not many of the alleged offences depend on matters on which there might be wide diversity of opinion—for instance, permitting relief by men unauthorised or unfit for duty. How would one man know that the other man was unauthorised or unfit for duty. Is not that a matter upon which there might be diversity of opinion ?—I don't think so. Suppose one man gets on to an engine to relieve No. 1 although he has been told that he has to relieve No. 2. That would upset all organisation. It is the officer in charge whose business it is to determine the relief. He knows where the man is going to and what he can do with him next. It would never do if each man was to take his own course.

9795. I do not suggest that ; but is the man who is relieved always informed beforehand who is to relieve him ?—He cannot possibly, but he will know whether he has got the right man or not.

9796. How ?—He will know whether his relief has been sent from the shed. You may depend that there have been cases where arrangements have been made by men between themselves that have led up to this rule.

Mr. J. A. F. Aspinall.

19 Mar. 1907.

9797. Mr. Bell gave us to understand that, whilst in the old time drivers had the same engines constantly under their charge, engines are now changed and there is a good deal of "swopping" that sometimes leads to men being held responsible on account of things for which they are not themselves really to blame ?—That is an argument often used to get out of responsibility ; but a driver has always an opportunity, when he takes over an engine, to examine it and see whether it is all right.

9798. Supposing a man is relieved by another, how is the relieved man to judge of the other's fitness for duty ? —He could see, for instance, whether the man comes on the foot plate the worse for drink.

9799. But this does not refer to drink ?—That is one of the things it is intended to refer to.

9800. A man may be unfit for duty because of many reasons other than drink ?—Perhaps you would suggest some.

9801. He might be unwell ?—Please do not suppose that a driver would be punished on account of his relief being unfit for duty owing to sickness or illness.

9802. The schedule seems to reserve to the employer the right to do that ?—But you must agree that there is a sense of justice in dealing with these matters. Considering the sieve that all these matters go through it is scarcely possible for a man to be punished unless he is guilty.

9803. The amount of the fines certainly would seem to show that there cannot have been any great injustice done.

By Mr. Delevingne.

9804. Could you give us any figures showing the number of suspensions in the course of a year ?—I am afraid I have not the numbers here at hand.

9805. It might be interesting to compare them with the London and North Western statement, so perhaps you could put them in later ?—I shall enquire about that.*

9806. Is it your practice to visit an offence which is not of too serious a kind with a caution in the first instance—reserving a fine for the second offence ?—Yes, in a great many cases an offender is reprimanded, and that is recorded against him.

9807. Have you a black list ?—I don't like to call it that. We have a record of the services of each man ; but then this difficulty comes in, that when you have a record of that sort, which starts with a reprimand and goes on for a year or two to fines and suspension, you may come to a case where a man is dismissed because of an offence which appears to be comparatively trivial in itself ; but it may be the last of a series of offences that have gone on for a long time, and it is the last straw which breaks the camel's back.

9808. May the Committee take it that you have no practice of imposing fines indiscriminately for offences, but that your system is carefully graduated, commencing in most cases with a caution or reprimand, and gradually leading up in the case of persistent offenders to suspensions or dismissal ?—Yes.

By Mr. Yarrow.

9809. You were telling us of the pension fund that is to be and the superannuation fund that is. Are these got up only in the interest of the workmen ?—Mainly. The pension fund was started after an urgent request on the part of the men that we should have it. That meant of course, a large contribution on the part of the company. We started the movement some years ago in response to that request, but we delayed the commencement of operations until we got powers last year to guarantee it.

9810. Then, in reality, the railway company is practically a loser by these funds, at all events by the amount it subscribes to them ?—Yes, absolutely.

9811. You heard what Sir Frederick Harrison said about doing away with fines. If I understood him right he said the discipline of his railway was equally good now without fines as it formerly was with fines. Suppose that Parliament wished to dispense with fines on all railways, could you see your way to maintain discipline equally well without fines ?—If Parliament so decided, we should have to fall back on suspensions.

9812. Are you of opinion that the discipline of the line and the safety of the public could be equally well ensured without fines ?—I should say so. That, of course, applies to the men working the trains and not so much to those employed in the workshops.

9813. I see that your fines work out at something like one penny per man per annum, which cannot have a serious deterrent effect ?—You have to look at the moral effect, quite irrespective of the amount.

9814. If suspensions were the usual expedient, could you manage the line almost equally well ?—The only fear we should have would be that some men might be punished too severely.

9815. Would you be influenced by the inconvenience that might be caused to the railway by suspending a man suddenly and not having another ready to take his place ?—I don't think we have looked at it from that point of view.

9816. Is the superannuation fund compulsory ?—Yes ; every officer who comes into the service must join the fund.

9817. Is it the view of the company that by making the fund compulsory you secure a more thrifty lot of men as compared with those who might not care to insure ? —The object is to secure that they shall have something in their old age when they have to retire.

9818. Is that purely in the interests of the men ?—I should not put it quite that way. I think it cuts both ways. It is also in the interest of the company that it should have men who feel safe and contented.

9819. Don't you get a more thrifty lot of men who look to the future ?—I do not think that follows : because in this case the men are made thrifty by compulsion.

9820. But those who were not of a thrifty disposition might not care to join the service in consequence of the compulsory rule ?—Possibly.

By Sir F. Cawley.

9821. You heard the answer given by Sir Frederick Harrison to Mr. Bell's allegation that men were sometimes suspended because of letting steam off in a station or making smoke in a station or an account of a fusible plug giving way ?—Yes. The fusible plug is put on the top of the fire box in order to show whether or not the boiler is running short of water. If the driver permits the boiler to run short of water, it is supposed to give way as a safety appliance. It is better it should give way than that the boiler should be blown up. If the driver allows the water to become low, he may, without observing it, have got the top of his fire box red hot, and if he then turned fresh water into the boiler, I do not know where the driver or his boiler or the engine itself might go to.

9822. Are there not cases in which an unsuitable metal might be put in the plugs so that they may give way ?—I do not think so. They are carefully tested. If any unsuitable material did by any chance get into the boiler, it would soon be found out and put right.

9823. But that might be after the man had been fined ? —Then you might argue that the material in any part of the engine might be inferior and that he might be fined for anything that had gone wrong with any part of the engine. I do not think that idea would stand examination by any jury of engineers. With regard to the other point, if a man permits his engine to blow off steam at a station, it makes a hideous noise, offensive to passengers and everybody. It is also wasting steam and coal, and he is doing wrong. If on the other hand his engine is blowing off steam when passing through a station, that is not an offence in any way, and I do not think anybody would suggest that it was.

9824. Then with regard to the emission of smoke ?— A great deal of smoke can be prevented if the drivers are careful. It is not possible absolutely to prevent it ; but that fact is taken into consideration by the locomotives department. The locomotive engineer knows what class of coal a man is burning. In some cases he is burning nothing but South Wales coal which gives off no smoke ; in other cases he may be burning smoky Scotch or Lancashire coal which requires a great deal more care. We expect and require our officers to deal fairly with all these considerations.

9825 Your company has been fined before now by the local authorities for smoke nuisance ?—Yes, I am afraid we have upon more than one occasion.

9826. And you want your men, as far as possible, to save you from being brought up and prosecuted ?—Yes.

9827. But you would not fine or suspend a driver for the first offence, i.e. he would be cautioned more than once ?— I do not go so far as to say that. If a man were grossly careless, he might be fined in the first instance, but, speaking generally, our system is one of reprimand first followed by more severe punishment.

* Mr. Aspinall has since informed the Secretary that the number of cases of suspensions in all branches of the service during the year 1906 amounted to 625.

16 April 1907.

By Mr. Walsh.

9828. I think that when business was interrupted we were discussing the question of the Permanent Relief Societies?—That was so.

9829. You suggested that it was very necessary that those societies should be continued?—Yes, that is my opinion.

9830. Largely on the lines of deductions in the pay office for that purpose?—Yes—that it should be permitted to make a deduction from the wages at the request of the men for their contributions to such societies.

9831. And that if it had to depend upon entirely voluntary payments, as against the system of deductions from wages, you thought it was extremely probable that the societies would suffer considerably in their membership?—When this truck question was being considered in the House of Commons a short time ago, Mr. Fenwick spoke upon the matter, and with reference to the Miners' Permanent Relief Society in his district he strongly urged the necessity for the collection of the money as at present, as necessary for the maintenance of the society. The reference to his speech is Vol. 152 of Hansard, No. II., of February 27th, 1906, page 1087. He is reported to have said: "In the counties of Northumberland and Durham and Cleveland they had had for over forty years what was known as the Miners' Permanent Relief Fund for widows and orphans, and it also provided superannuation for aged and infirm miners. Deductions for this purpose were made at every colliery from the wages of the miners. Would such deductions be regarded as truck? If so, he would very much regret that any action which this House might take should interfere with an arrangement like that, because before they adopted the plan of having these deductions made from the wages in the office of the colliery the contributions of the workmen were very often neglected through carelessness, and when accidents happened it was frequently found that the workman had allowed his contributions to lapse, and when the widow expected relief it was often found that no compensation was forthcoming. Now that these contributions were deducted in the colliery office no such cases occurred, it had added considerably to the stability of the fund, and, therefore, he should regret any action which would interfere with or put an end to an arrangement of that kind."

9832. Do I understand that your own conclusions are largely on the lines of Mr. Fenwick's remarks?—My own opinion—yes—from the information given to me by the officials of the Permanent Relief Society. I should like to say that in putting this matter for the Lancashire Relief Society I am putting it from the men's point of view, not from the employers' point of view.

9833. Anyhow, of course Mr. Fenwick is a very great authority on many matters, but you agree with his conclusions there?—I see no reason to differ from them.

9834. Are you aware of any very large colliery companies where payments are made by the men to such societies as these—payments, not deductions from the wages?—I think they are all made by the authority of the workmen.

9835. I did not ask that. I mean the money handed over by the man after receiving his wages at least in full, so far as any particular payment is concerned, handing it over voluntarily?—I believe that in the Wigan Coal and Iron Company the system is that a workman is supplied with the amounts that have to be deducted or paid by him; he receives from one window his full wages, and he passes to another window very near, in which he pays out of his wages the deductions which are put upon the paper as the deductions that he has to pay.

9836. You say "the deductions that he has to pay." I think that is rather a strong expression?—I mean that he has agreed to pay—the deductions that he has agreed to pay is what I mean when I say deductions that he has to pay.

9837. But liberty is left to him to the extent that he may receive his wages in full and then the payment is a voluntary action on his part?—Of course he could go away without paying if he chose, but I have never heard of a case in which the man did not pay the money.

9838. I put it to you, that these societies would not necessarily go down if the payment was made by the men instead of deductions being made in the office?—I think it would be a serious danger to the societies if you altered the system. It has gone on for a great many years. The grievance of what is called the New Permanent, so far as I have understood it, is not that it is any injustice to the men to deduct it, but that it is an injustice to that society that it is treated differently to the other society.

9839. I do not know that I have brought in any New Permanent yet; we had better keep to the matter in hand for the moment. The whole contention of these societies is that they depend and rely upon the voluntary payments of the men?—I have not heard that contention. Which of the societies contends that?

9840. We had a very large deputation here, a deputation of four very strong men, with a very big memorandum, in which the whole contention that they rely upon is that these payments are made voluntarily by the men, and that they really meet the men's needs to such an extent that the payment is really a voluntary one?—I suppose that would include representatives from the district for which Mr. Fenwick speaks. I have given you his view on the subject.

9841. But they represented a separate "association for the relief of distress caused by mining accidents," so that they really represented the whole country?—You heard what Mr. Fenwick says; that they frequently find that a man omitting to make his payment and then an accident happening is very disappointed to find that he is to get no relief.

9842. Now you know of course that the employers paid largely to these societies, and to the Lancashire one in particular, up to 1898?—Yes, I think they increased the payment when the Employers' Liability Act was passed. They used to pay, up to 1898, 25 per cent. on the men's contributions.

9843. When the Employers' Liability Act was passed, they were paying about 10 per cent., broadly speaking, to these societies, were they not?—Up to that time I think so; I cannot tell exactly what it was. I have had prepared this memorandum showing the whole progress of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society. (Harding in Memorandum.)

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

9844. In 1880 Parliament imposed an entirely new obligation on the employers?—Yes. It extended the Employers' Liability Act; it extended the persons for whom the employers were responsible.

9845. Parliament made a new Act altogether in 1880?—But the principle was that it made the employer responsible for an extended class of persons.

9846. For the purpose of meeting these new obligations the employers paid an increased contribution to those funds?—It gave the parties power to contract out of the Act, and as a consideration and a condition of that contracting out of the Act the employers agreed to increase their contribution to 25 per cent. upon the men's contributions.

9847. It was held, broadly speaking, to be an equivalent to the new obligations?—It was accepted as an equivalent to the new obligations.

9848. In 1898 these obligations were extended?—In 1898 contracting out of the Act was made impossible except by an agreement for something better than the Act.

9849. And so because of these extended obligations the employers withdrew from these societies?—They did not withdraw from the Lancashire and Cheshire Society. At that time there were a great many encumbrants on the fund, widows and orphans. The employers wished that these funds should be as far as possible safeguarded in order that these encumbrants might be taken care of. Now there were two courses; one was to have the society wound up; at that time actuarially the society had not 20s. in the £, and it was urgently pressed by the representatives of the men upon the permanent relief societies that this would be a very unfortunate thing to do, because, although some people thought that the Act of 1897 would put an end to permanent relief societies, other people thought differently, and considered that they might be continued. Then it was agreed that the employers should continue to retain their position as having representatives on the Board of Management as before, and that they should undertake practically that the method of collecting the contributions which had been in existence since the commencement of the society should be continued. They did not pay any money contributions, but that was supposed to be a very valuable assistance to the society. Now it was further provided that in order to see how it went along, instead of having a quinquennial valuation, there should be a biennial valuation, and if at the end of two years matters did not seem to be improving there should be a readjustment in order that it might gradually become solvent. The result has really been better than was expected. From that time the number of members of the society has been increasing; they have got the largest number at the present time that they have ever had, as you will see by this paper, and their financial position is pronounced to be very satisfactory. It is not quite yet 20s. in the £, but it is on the high way to getting to that, and as I said it now represents very nearly 50,000 members.

9850. So that in order to get the society into a position of meeting 20s. for every £, the employers have not paid any contribution; they have given the use of their offices, so to speak, that is all?—They have continued the collection of the contributions as before.

9851. For which of course a distinct percentage is charged?—Not to the coal owner; he makes nothing out of it.

9852. But the coal owner or the colliery proprietor pays nothing?—He pays no contribution directly, but he gives the use of his office and various other assistance, which is considered an equivalent. What the employers wished was that they should be able still, so far as they could, to safeguard the funds of the society by retaining their position on the Board of Management. It is well known that the actual working of the matter is not with the employers at all, but with the ordinary members of the Board of Management, who are directly representative of the men, many of whom are members of your Federation and some of whom are officials in your Federation. The result showed that that was getting upon the right lines, because the financial position has very greatly improved.

9853. I am not questioning the result of the procedure of 1898. I just wished to ask you whether the employers have paid anything since, to help to reduce the insolvency that admittedly existed in 1898?—No money contribution has been paid by the employers.

9854. Now because of the amplified obligation imposed upon them in 1898 they felt it necessary to establish an indemnity association of their own, or two or three did that, did they not?—Many mutual insurance companies were established in various parts of the kingdom.

9855. Certain benefits that had been given to the men in 1880 were also enlarged in 1898?—The employer in 1898 was made answerable for every accident of every kind except such accidents as were due to serious and wilful neglect on the part of the man himself. Before that time the law only made the employer answerable for his own negligence or the negligence of somebody else for whom he was responsible.

9856. In 1880 certain restricted benefits, so to speak, were conferred on the men, and in 1898 these benefits were practically extended to almost every class of accidents?—The benefit extended in 1880 was this, that the employer was made responsible for persons whom he placed in control; he was made responsible for accidents happening by reason of defective plant, and that was a very considerable increase upon his previous responsibility. Now it was a question of bargain. If the employers were to continue as they had continued, taking part in the management of the Miners' Permanent Relief Society, it must be upon certain terms to be agreed upon, and those terms were that as a condition for contracting out of the responsibility their contribution should be 25 per cent. upon the men's contributions.

9857. I do not wish to press this matter very much further except to ask you this: was the reason that the employers left the societies in 1898 because certain extended obligations from which it was difficult to contract out were imposed upon them; was that the reason that they left the societies?—They never did leave the societies.

9858. They unburdened themselves of their financial obligations?—The employers ceased to make a contribution in money, but the employers representation on the board of management continued as it was before.

9859. Except that now they are simply honorary members?—They were honorary members then.

9860. But their continuing as honorary members entirely depends on the willingness of the men to have them as honorary members?—So it did before. There are a certain number of honorary members appointed from the employers' side and a certain number—a large number—of ordinary members. All these are appointed at the annual meeting. There has been no change in the constitution of the society. Subsequently to the Compensation Act they stopped paying the 25 per cent., but as a consideration of their being allowed to retain whatever share they had in the management of the society they continued to collect the funds as they had been doing before, which was considered by the representatives of the men on the board of management to be essential in order that the society might continue its operations. The effect of the Act was to make the employers responsible for every accident except such as might arise from the serious and wilful misconduct of the men; they could not contract out of the Act; they could not get out of their liability. They could get out of their liability before upon contributing that 25 per cent., because it was permitted under the Act to contract out of it, and the men had to look for relief to the funds of the society; therefore the employers being relieved from the Act of 1880 properly contributed a money support towards the funds of the society from which the men received their compensation.

9861. Now there was, as you say, a very large number of accidents that would not have been provided for under the Employers' Liability Act, and the men really made their contribution of 3d. or 4d. a week because of this vast mass of accidents that would not otherwise have been provided for ?—No ; I think you must go back to the establishment of the fund in 1872. Before that time there was no provision made for the men, and (you will remember it perfectly) it used to be a very sad sight in the colliery yards on pay days ; you used to find people there—widows and orphans—collecting what they could from the men as they left their work.

9862. I am only speaking of the time when a legal obligation became imposed upon the employers ?—It was then that the men agreed to pay the contribution towards these societies in order that there should be some organised provision made for widows and orphans, 9863. In 1880, however, the first legal obligations—except those at common law—were imposed on the employers practically ?—You say the first legal obligations ; I should prefer to put it, if I might, that the obligation of the employers was extended considerably. The employer had a legal obligation before, but of a different character ; his obligation before was for his own negligence.

9864. There was a vast mass of accidents that would not have been met under the Employers' Liability Act ?—It is very difficult to commit yourself to say a vast mass of accidents. After the Act of 1880, unless the claimant could prove that there had been some negligence either on the part of the employer or on the part of somebody for whom he was responsible, or that the accident was caused through defective plant, there would be no compensation, and so far as those cases where that could not be proved were large, you might say there would be a large number.

9865. The men really paid for a big range of accidents that they would not have received compensation for under the Employers' Liability Act ?—They did nothing that had not been done before ; they had been paying for a time so much to this society ; there was no change on the part of the men ; the change in 1897 was that the employers said that they could no longer contribute to these societies.

9866. I am speaking now of 1880. In 1880 it was made compulsory upon the men. I think if you remember—it was made a condition of employment—to become members of these societies, one in particular ?—Yes, I believe it was in the conditions of employment.

9867. Practically throughout the county of Lancashire that was made a condition of employment ?—I think you are right about that.

9868. If you will go through this list you will see that tens of thousands of men were forced into this society who had not been previously in it ?—I would not like to say that men were forced into it. I agree with you that it was made a condition of employment, but I think the great majority of the men very willingly adopted it. It might be that there were some people who would not wish to contribute at all, and those men who would not do what was reasonable in the view of other reasonable men you might say were forced.

9869. As all accidents, with very few exceptions, are now compensated for under the Act of 1897, does there seem to be any special need why these societies should remain in existence ?—If I were speaking from an employer's point of view—I offer this opinion with considerable hesitation—I should probably say that the employer would have less compensation to pay if there were fewer of these societies ; and I will tell you why. Manifestly—statistics show it—the greater the number of societies in which a man is and the greater benefit which he is given when he is hurt, the longer he continues absent from his employment, and therefore I should think probably the employer would have less to pay ; he would have shorter time to pay. But speaking from the men's point of view (and in speaking of this Permanent Relief I wish it to be remembered that I am speaking from the men's point of view) I consider it very desirable that the men should not be merely dependent upon the half wages that they get from the employer but that they should have something else for which they are prepared to pay.

9870. That seems to be rather a kind of undue solicitiousness on the part of these societies ; the men would probably be members of outside societies such as the Oddfellows or the Foresters and so forth ?—But you must remember that in those societies there is a limit of time during which members can receive compensation ; it is a benefit for sickness and not, as a rule, for accident. I cannot help feeling, if you will excuse my saying so, that a good deal of this arises from what is called the New Permanent Society. That is a society established locally. It does not extend to other parts of Lancashire than the neighbourhood of Wigan ; it is a society of 13,000 members. There is no such society anywhere else. They complain not that it is an injustice for the men to have these funds collected at the collery office, but that it is an injustice to their society that their contributions are not collected whilst the contributions of the Permanent Relief Societies are collected. Now I see in the report of the New Permanent for 1904 there is this statement, "and in all cases where pressure is being brought on members to force them against their will to pay to the old society, to inform the board and they will deal with it." There seems to be an impression on the part of those who have the management of the New Permanent Society that there was some pressure put on the men to join the old society. I am instructed (and I have made very careful inquiry since the last meeting of this Committee) that there is no such pressure at all. A man is asked when he joins "Do you want to be a member of the Permanent Society ?" If he says "Yes" his deduction is made ; if he says "No" his deduction is not made. I could give statistics, but I do not want to trouble the Committee with such detail. In many of the collieries they have a large number of men who are not in the society. Now the employers have refused to collect the funds of the new society ; they think, rightly or wrongly, that it is a mistake to have two societies and that the better plan is to support a society which is firmly established, which has a membership of 50,000 men, instead of supporting a society which is struggling along with 13,000 members, and, therefore, they do not think it is right to support this new society at the cost of the existing society. That is the whole story.

By Mr. Delevingne.

9871. I take it that one object which the owners and managers have in view in this system of fining is the maintenance of a proper standard of discipline in the mines ?—That is entirely the object and the sole object, and they think that they can do it with less harshness to the men and less friction than if they were compelled either to prosecute a man or to dismiss him.

9872. Are we to understand that the contention of the owners is that the discipline of the mine depends not merely on the observance of the special and general rules, but on a number of points, many of them small, but in the whole going to make up the order and discipline of the mine ?—That is so.

9873. Would you draw a distinction between definite offences against statutory provisions or against the special and general rules and a number of miscellaneous things not directly making for the safety of the mine, but which are of importance in the interests of good order and discipline ?—I should only draw this distinction, that in respect of the first there is a statutory obligation upon the owner if he does not himself see to the best of his ability that the rules are carried out ; in reference to the other cases, there is no such responsibility upon the owner, although, as you say, those things are necessary in the interest of good order and discipline.

9874. You think that in addition to the rules there are a number of things which are not put in the rules and which probably could not be put in the rules, but yet which are of importance as going to make up generally the good order and discipline of the mine ?—That is so.

9875. Leaving apart the question of special and general rules for the moment how would the owners enforce their standard of order if the power of fining were taken away from them ?—By dismissing the man.

9876. Have you considered what alternatives would be open to you if Parliament took that course ?—I do not see what alternative would be open to us except that the discipline might become slack.

9877. There is of course the power of suspension ?—I do not quite understand what is meant by suspenson what power you could legally suspend a man. A man is engaged for a certain period; you can discharge him by giving him notice, or you can discharge him summarily if he has committed any act which justifies you in discharging him summarily, but I do not understand what power you can have to suspend a man.

9878. We have had evidence that that is what is done in the case of some mines?—I know; but I am not sure how far it is a legitimate practice. You might put it in his contract, I suppose, that he should be liable to suspension upon certain conditions; but any alteration in the terms of contract in a great industry like the coal trade is sure to lead to trouble.

9879. Assuming for the moment that suspension would be legally available, do you consider it a satisfactory method of dealing with the matter?—I should not think it at all a satisfactory method. You must have somebody to do the work; there is no surplus labour about a mine; there is no room for people who have no job to do; each collier must do his work; you cannot find another man in a day or two to fill the man's place. I think it would be a very unsatisfactory method to suspend a man even if you could do it.

9880. It has been put to the Committee in the case of other industries that the necessary discipline of great works can be maintained by careful supervision on the part of the managers and foremen without any necessity for fining?—I can only say that as long as human nature is what it is, I think you must have some punishment; there must be some penalty.

9881. Would you say that the circumstances of the mine and the circumstances of the factory were similar or different in respect of the possibility of maintaining a high standard of discipline by means of supervision?—I think the circumstances are very different indeed.

9882. In what way?—Take the circumstances of a mine, the danger that results from breaches of the rules is very serious; what appears to be a very trifling thing may result in a great explosion.

9883. I was not thinking so much of the rules, because the manager or owner has his remedy by a prosecution if he likes?—Well, I do not suppose there is much difference between the mine and the factory so far as regards these insignificant things that you refer to, such as insubordination and things of that kind which are not necessary for the safety and good working of the mine.

9884. Is it as easy to maintain discipline in the case of a mine as in the case of a factory?—I should not think you can say that it is as easy as in a factory. In a factory you are in the light and there are always plenty of people about who can see what is going on; in a mine the people are scattered all over the mine; and it is dark. There are many difficulties in finding out a breach of discipline which would not exist in the case of a factory. If you find out a breach of discipline I do not see what difference there would be between a breach of discipline by a factory hand and a breach of discipline by a mining hand.

9885. I may take it that you do attach great importance to maintenance of a high standard of discipline and order in a mine?—Absolutely; it is most essential to the safety of the mine. Then may I point out this—in the first place the man has to agree to the fine; secondly, the fine has to be reasonable and proper; thirdly, the man has to have the fine on his pay ticket in order to show what the fine is; then it has to be registered; it is subject to the examination of the inspector and the inspector is entitled to prosecute the owner if he thinks the fine is excessive for a breach of the Truck Act, and the man is entitled to recover the excess of the fine. I cannot conceive how a man could be more protected than he is against any improper exercise of the right of fining on the part of the employers.

9886. It is rather difficult, is it not, for the inspector to examine each of these separate contracts that are made with regard to fines?—He can examine the registers.

9887. Still it is very difficult for him to exercise any effective control, is it not?—I do not know that it is difficult. First of all, suppose there is no complaint——

9888. I am thinking of cases where there is no complaint?—Then the inspector has got a list there; I do not know what more he could have.

9889. He can only really form an opinion as to the fairness and reasonableness of the fines by special inquiry into all the circumstances under which the fine is imposed?—If he sees anybody with a grievance—and they very soon communicate with him—he can find it all out from inquiry.

9890. Do not you think it would be fairer to the men to have a general notice posted at the pit-head of what the fines imposable are?—Suppose you make it part of a man's contract that for a certain offence he shall be liable to a fine of a certain amount. That amount must be the maximum, because you could not prescribe in each particular case what the fine should be for a particular offence; an offence might be committed under circumstances which would justify a very small fine, and the same offence might be committed under circumstances which would justify the maximum fine; if you put up on your notice the maximum fine you give the man no information at all about it except that he cannot be fined beyond that maximum. If you adopt that course the man has no option but to pay the fine; it is part of his contract and he has to pay. I think the man is very much better off, if when the offence is committed you say to him: "Now will you agree to have a fine and to have a special contract." That is provided for by the second part of the conditions under the Truck Act, and then the man could please himself whether he would adopt it or not.

9891. But suppose the men themselves prefer to have a notice put up at the pit-head showing the things for which they were liable to be fined and the maximum amount of the fines that could be imposed. Do you see any objection to that?—In connection with the iron and steel industries I have something to say about that, but in reference to the coal trade I have never heard any complaint as to the present system, and I should hesitate very much indeed to alter a system which I think is very necessary for the maintenance of discipline unless I saw clearly that that system was working badly.

9892. We are only on the question of the alternative between posting a notice and having an individual contract in each case after the offence has been committed. As regards the system of fining that would not be affected one way or the other, would it?—The owner is not bound to fine; neither is he bound to take a man before the magistrates. He can let the matter slide if he likes, and if you make it too difficult you run the danger of his doing that. If the Committee should think there is any use in putting up a list of maximum fines—if that is any advantage—and that that should be held as a part of the man's contract, of course it would have to be done; but you would then have to revise all these contracts with the men; in the case of many hundreds of thousands of men employed under the existing contracts you would have to insert in their contracts the condition, "You are liable to be fined according to the list we are going to put up at the pit-head." I anticipate that there would be very serious difficulty and very great friction in settling any such new contract.

9893. Now one or two questions upon a point that came up last time. A list was handed in to the Committee which was shewn to you on the last occasion, including fines for such things as breaking glass and breaking a spade. They were treated as fines under Section 1. Is it possible that although they were so called they were really deductions for damage under Section 2?—I think it would be more in the shape of deductions for damage in the case of breaking a spade.

9894. Is it customary to treat deductions for damage which properly come under Section 2 as fines under Section 1?—I am afraid there is no great distinction between Section 1 and Section 2 with reference to such matters as you mention. No doubt strictly the requirements of the two sections are the same.

9895. Not quite?—You have to give the same particulars and it has to be by agreement.

9896. But in the case of damage the deduction must not exceed the cost to the employer?—Quite so. I cannot say that the distinction is very clearly recognised in collieries.

9897. Would you say how deductions for damage are made; are they also individual contracts?—Yes.

9898. Not under a notice posted up ?—No.

9899. Is there ever an audit by the men for deductions for sharpening tools ?—There may be, but I have never heard of one. There is a provision in the Truck Act of 1887.

9900. Section 9 of the Truck Act of 1887 requires the employer to make out a correct account of the receipts and expenditure in respect of such deductions, and submit the same to be audited by two auditors appointed by the workmen. Can you say whether the employers do make up such an account ?—I should think they make up such an account.

9901. Do they submit it to the workmen ?—I do not know. I have never heard of the workmen asking for such an account. I suppose they would be entitled to it if they asked for it.

9902. But the section requires the employer to do it—it is not merely at the request of the workmen ?—I suppose if two auditors came and said: "We want to see this account," the employers would have to show it; it does not oblige the employers apparently to submit it to the workmen.

9903. The employers do not treat it as a matter of course that it is their duty to render the account ?—I could not say that they do not make out the account but I have never heard of the workmen asking for such an account or its being submitted to auditors at all.

9904. Are you aware that fines are imposed for improper filling ?—That is a matter that I mentioned at the end of my proof that I should like to say something about if I may. That is the question of Section 12 of the Act.

9905. I am not on deductions under the Coal Mines Act; I am on the subject of fines imposed under the Truck Act as a penalty for improper filling, not as a deduction under the Coal Mines Act ?—I believe there are cases, and I think I have heard of them in North Wales, where it is part of the agreement with the men that there shall be a certain fine payable in case of improper filling. For instance where the men ought only to send a certain class of coal up the pit—round coal and not small coal—and they send a larger proportion of small coal than they are entitled to send, then I think there are in some cases fines for that breach of contract.

9906. Do you consider, in view of the fact that Parliament has provided in the Coal Mines Act a means by which deductions may be made in respect of small coal or dirt sent up, and has imposed very strict restrictions as to deductions that are to be made, that it is proper for owners to put aside that procedure altogether and impose fines by way of penalty for sending up small coal or dirt ?—Parliament having provided a section which it is quite impossible to understand to begin with, and which if you could understand you could not carry out, I suppose the excuse is that some other method must be adopted to punish breaches of contract.

9907. Do you consider this legal ?—I should like to know a little more about it before answering the question. Suppose it is part of a man's contract that he is not to send up small coal or more than a certain proportion of small coal, and he sends up that excess of small coal, that is a breach of contract on his part; then the owner would be entitled to set that off against the man's claim for wages. Now until the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries it was assumed that having a right to set it off he could deduct it from the man's wages, but that case distinctly says that he cannot do anything of the sort at all. I am bound to say that if that case is good law he would not be able to set it off against wages either by way of fine or in any other way.

9908-9909. I am rather taking the case that you have brought to our notice where the deduction has not been made by way of set-off at all, but has been made as an actual fine, a penalty, a punishment for doing something which the employer considered the man ought not to have done ?—I think you would have to see the contracts. I think, speaking from recollection, I at one time appeared before the county court Judge in Wales defending one of the colliery owners for charging a man; there it was by way of deduction for improper filling, and the court held in that case that the employer was entitled to do it—that under the contract it was part of the man's contract, and he had been guilty of a breach of contract and that therefore he was liable to pay a certain amount to the owner. Until the Williams v. North's Navigation case we were under the impression that in that state of things we were entitled to deduct it from what we owed the man. We could do it by going to court, but it was thought that we could do it without going to court; if he owed us money it was a foolish thing to pay a man who was not a capitalist something that we owed him, and not deduct something that he owed to us.

By Mrs. Tennant.

9910. I gather from your reply to Mr. Delevingne, that you are of opinion that if Section 1 of the Truck Act of 1896, Sub-section 1 (a) were enforced, there would be friction between the mine-owners and the workmen ?—I think this. We have got at the present moment contracts of employment; these contracts do not include any power to make deduction from the men's wages for fines. Now if we had to work under Sub-section 1, we should have to include in the men's contracts the right to make that deduction, because Sub-section 1 says that the contract must be advertised; that means that there must be in existence a contract in order that it may be advertised, and therefore, there must be in existence between the employer and the workman a contract to deduct these fines. I think that to endeavour to introduce that right would cause a great deal of trouble and friction.

9911. You think that if the men understood, as the legislature in our opinion intended they should understand from that provision, that they were liable to be fined, that they would resent that liability ?—I do.

9913. But if the fine proposed to be imposed were not reasonable the inspector could step in ?—Certainly. Now we make a special contract in each case under the latter words of that clause.

9914. You act under Section 1, Sub-section 2 (b), which provides that particulars shall be given in writing showing "the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed ?"—We do that.

9915. But the sub-section to which I am referring is Sub-section 1 (b), which provides for specification of "the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed," not "which is," but "which may be ?"—May I point out that there are two parts of that Sub-section; the first is that the terms of the contract are to be advertised; the second is that the contract is to be in writing, and signed by the workman. Now, we adopt the second part.

9916. Will you forgive me for a moment, and continue reading. If you will go on to (b) you will see that it must be read with (a): "The contract," that is, the contract referred to in (a), "specified the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed ?"—We do that.

9917. You do it "in respect of which the fine is imposed," which is mentioned in (b) of Sub-section 2. There is a great difference between "may be" and "is" ?—Well, that had not occurred to me before, but we do carry it out in this way. I quite understand what you mean. The word "may" in (b) implies that the man must have notice that he is liable to be fined for certain offences, and then having that notice we could continue to make our special contract in writing in each particular case for the fine, leaving the man at liberty to pay the fine or not as he thought fit.

9918. But what you really give him now is not a contract; it is what one might call an invoice. If I, as a householder, ask to have a contract for the supply of so many tons of coal, and I afterwards have the coal supplied, I expect to receive two documents—one, the contract to deliver, and the other the invoice of delivery. In this case the workman expects to have the first document under (a) and then secondly the invoice under (b) ?—That view had not presented itself to me before, but I cannot quite understand that being consistent with (a) Suppose that this was what had to be done: that you might either have it as part of the man's contract that he is liable to be fined to a certain amount, or you might advertise, without making it a part of his contract at all, "Fines may be imposed at these works for the following offences," without putting up any amount at all. Up to that point there is no part of the contract which intimates to the man that he is liable to be fined. Then the contract in writing would be, "I agree to pay so and so," and, so long as that was in respect of some offence which the notice had intimated that he would be liable to be fined for, it would fit in with (b); but when you look again at (a) it does not contemplate that there is to be a notice put up that the man is liable to be fined; it is a notice of "the terms of the contract," that is, the contract under which the man undertakes to be fined. The two things do not seem to work together. I admit the point you make, that it does look as if there must be some arrangement by which a man may be fined, but (a) contemplates more than that; it contemplates that there is a contract in writing by the man undertaking to be fined for particular offences.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

16 April 1907.

9919. As an alternative to the general contract with all the workmen. You have the alternative of a general contract with the workmen or a particular contract with the individual workman; and the contract which is I think in your mind, his hiring contract, is not a contract under the Truck Act. He may or may not have a contract under which he engages to do labour for you, but he does require a contract under the Truck Act if you wish to fine him?—If that is the legal construction of this, and this remained the law, that would not be answered as (a) is now, but it would make (b) understandable if you put up the notice "A man is liable to be fined for any breaches of the Mines Regulation Act, or any breaches of discipline." Then under (b) if he commits an offence for which he may be fined or an offence to which his special contract would apply he undertakes to be fined for that offence.

9920. Then according to your view there must be repugnancy?—I think, if your view is right, that the words "may be" under (b) contemplate that there must be some notice that a man is liable to be fined. That is a good deal less than what (a) contemplates, namely, that there must be a contract that he will be fined.

9921. But why do you suggest that there must be something less. When you speak of (a) are you speaking of paragraph (a) of Sub-section 1?—Yes. Sub-section 1 (a) makes two alternatives; the one is that "the terms of the contract are contained;" that is to say the contract under which the workmen you are going to fine has agreed that he will pay a fine; or "the contract is in writing signed by the workman." Now you raise this difficulty, that when you come to (b) which is another condition of fine the words are "the contract specified the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." Now if it had been "in respect of which the fine is imposed" no difficulty would have arisen; but your suggestion is that the words "may be" there contemplate that there is some regulation of the mine that a man may be fined for certain offences. That may be quite apart from the contract that he will undertake to pay a fine. It may be that if you put up a notice, "Persons employed at these works are liable to be fined for certain breaches of the Coal Mines Regulation Act," that would be quite sufficient without making it a part of a man's contract that he would be fined, to make (b) fit in with (a), but that is something which is not provided for at all. It is not provided that a notice that a man can be fined is to be put up, it is a notice of the terms of the contract under which you are entitled to make a fine.

9922. I am afraid I cannot agree. It seems to me that Section 1 is perfectly clear. It is divided into two parts. The first part deals with the contract and its nature. By the first part I mean Sub-section 1 of Section 1. It says in the first place that an employer shall not make a contract at all, unless he makes it in accordance with requirements—the requirements which are set out in (a) (b) (c) and (d). It goes on to say that provided he satisfies the law in respect of these requirements he then may not make a deduction unless he satisfies another set of requirements. In the first instance his contract might be illegal unless these conditions are satisfied. In the second instance the deductions that he endeavours to make may be illegal unless he satisfies a second set of conditions. Of course if he does not satisfy the first set of conditions he cannot make any deductions at all, because the law says that he must not make any deductions except in accordance with these conditions, which implies that you have a satisfactory contract?—If you refer to the beginning of Section 1, Sub-section 1, you will see "an employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid."

9923. Unless the terms of the contract are contained in it?—Exactly; that is to say, it assumes that a contract has been made with the workman for a deduction from his wages and then it says that that contract shall be advertised.

9924. I think you are not grasping my point, which is, that there is a distinction between the requirements of Sub-section 1 and the requirements of Sub-section 2. The requirements of Sub-section 1 require the workman to be informed beforehand of his liability to be fined. Sub-section 2 requires that he shall receive particulars of the fine imposed. That is why the Legislature says in the first place "may be" and the second place "is." Surely there is a distinction between "may be" and "is"?—I cannot quite agree that there are not two distinct methods of fining in Clause (a)—I mean two methods of legally fining. The one is where the contract exists, and if it does exist it must be advertised; the other is where there is no such provision but the employer and the workman enter into an agreement which is signed by the workman that he will pay that particular fine. I admit that when you come to Clause (b), the words "may be"—whether that was the intention or not it is impossible to say—do imply that there should be some notice or some knowledge on the part of the man or some regulation of the works, you might say, which has given him notice that he may be fined; I think that is something quite different from the contract which has to be advertised, which is an agreement which the workman has entered into that he will be fined.

9925. These are details which have to be in the contract whether it is an advertised contract or whether it is a personal contract. It says clearly that the contract must specify "The acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed"?—We do that in our contract.

9926. In your invoice, if I may so call it?—Well, it is an agreement.

9927. I think you say yourself that you are satisfying Sub-section 2 (b) by those particulars which you give. If I may turn to my old illustration, do you think that I as a householder, making a contract with a coal merchant for the supply of coal, could be held to have had my requirements satisfied if I receive only one document, the invoice which accompanies the delivery of the coal?—I think if you signed a paper saying that you were willing to pay for one ton of coal at a certain price you would be held responsible, and that is exactly what we do in our contract. I handed in a form of contract which is:—"I ( ) agree to pay a certain sum for 'so-and-so,' and I request you to deduct this from my wages." That is his contract.

9928. That could not be a contract of any value to me if I receive it only when I receive the coal. The moment of the imposition of the fine is the same to the workmen as is to me the moment of the receipt of the coal?—If you sign a paper to say, "I have received this coal and I agree to pay for it," it would be binding upon you, I think. The workman says, "I agree I have committed this offence and I agree to pay a fine."

9929. I agree, but my point is that the price of coal is possibly fluctuating, and in January I make a contract for the supply of coal four months ahead at a certain price: say in April the price of coal has risen; I am not supplied with coal; I can take no action at all against the contractor if I have no document to show that he has promised to supply me with coal at a certain price?—With very great respect, I do not think that that is a parallel case. The parallel case would be this: In April you get a document which you sign, in which you say, "I agree to pay so much for this coal." That is what the workman does.

9930. But I may have made a contract for coal at 30s. a ton; I may be presented with an invoice in April at 40s. a ton?—Then you do not pay. So the workman says, "I will not pay the fine."

9931. But I have no remedy, and I have to buy at the higher price from somebody else. If I have a written contract I then have a guarantee that I shall receive my coal at 30s. a ton, or I have my remedy against the contractor if I do not get it at 30s. a ton. I wish to show that there are two distinct documents required if you ask for a contract in writing, and afterwards for written details of the performance of the contract. I think here it is quite clear that there is a contract asked for in writing in the first place, whether it is a general advertised contract or a particular one, and afterwards something which I call an invoice—the particulars in writing of the fines imposed under that contract?—I cannot agree. I think the word "contract" there is something more than notice. It must be the terms of the agreement between the employer and the workman by which the workman agrees to pay a fine, and that has to be advertised if it is a general contract. The workman does not escape from it; he can be made to pay. The other is that there is no such arrangement as a part of the contract of service, but all the parties themselves agree that at a particular time they will agree to a fine for a particular breach of the law.

9932. There is one other point I would like to put. I suppose coalowners, like all other employers, wish to avoid friction?—We do.

9933. And you speak of a prosecution as a matter which is apt to cause friction. Now, in the circumstances you have described, the system under which you act, it is only open to the inspector to prosecute if he finds, on looking at the register, that a fine which he considers unreasonable has been imposed?—We should be guilty of a breach of the Truck Act.

9934 And the remedy then is by prosecution?—By prosecuting us. But if you look at Section 5 of the Act of 1896 you will find that the workman is given his remedy there.

9935. But the point to which I am coming is that under your system the remedy is prosecution after the offence has been committed, and an attempt to recover after the overcharge has been made. We will assume that an offence has been committed. Working under the system that is generally adopted when the terms of the contract are advertised, or the inspector is able to see them in the hands of the worker, he can say to the employer, "This would be an unreasonable fine; if you threaten to impose it I shall feel obliged to recommend a prosecution." Would not his taking that course be likely to avoid friction?—Of course, you cannot prosecute a man until he has committed the offence; he is not liable to be prosecuted until the offence has been committed.

9936. He is liable to a prosecution, on our reading of the section, for a contract which he is not allowed to make?—Yes, it is a breach of the Truck Act.

9937. It says under Paragraph (d) Sub-section 1: "The amount of the fine is fair and reasonable"; you may be prosecuted for having a contract in which are exhibited fines which are not fair and reasonable?—Yes, you may be prosecuted for fining at all unless you comply with all these requirements. Then one of the grounds upon which you violate the Act would be by imposing an unreasonable fine, and we could be prosecuted for that; and the man can recover any excess, where it is a question of amount only, under the provisions of Section 5.

9938. My general proposition is that a warning is less likely to lead to friction between say the employer and the Home Office than a prosecution would be. Do you agree to that?—I should say that if the warning would be sufficient to maintain the discipline of a mine no one would wish to do anything but warn.

9939. This is not as between the mineowner and the worker, but as between the mineowner and the Home Office?—I am not so sure. I have frequently had cases in which the inspector has said that he requires you to prosecute, and some of the inspectors make complaints because there are not prosecutions.

9940. But on the general principle that if an inspector saw exhibited a fine which he thought unreasonable he could draw the attention of the mine-owner to the unreasonableness of the fine—do not you think that would be less likely to lead to friction than if he could only prosecute after the offence had been committed?—I think it would be less likely. I think if there was a list of the fines such as you suggest, or a notice that the men would be liable to be fined an amount not exceeding £1, then the inspector might come along and say, "I think a limit of £1 is too much." That again is most difficult. You have a great number of offences which would present a difficulty in this way: the same offence may under certain circumstances be deserving of much greater punishment than under other circumstances, and the difficulty is in advertising (to be of any use to the man) the fine which you are going to inflict for any particular offence. The extent to which you might do it, it seems to me, is to say: "Persons committing any breach of the Act or any breach of the rules or by-laws of the colliery will be liable to be fined a sum not exceeding" so much money.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

16 April 1907.

9941. That is a very common system, is it not; you find notices up for example that if a certain offence is committed the offender is liable to a fine not exceeding so much; if the limit is 40s. he may be fined anything from 1s. to 40s.?—Yes, railway companies and others advertise the maximum penalty; I think they are bound to do so.

9942. You said just now that apparently a small offence might lead to very serious consequences in mines?—What might appear a small offence.

9943. Do you think it should be left to the judgment of the manager of the mine whether the offence is likely to lead to serious consequences or not?—Whether it had led to serious consequences. Of course he would know what the result had been.

9944. But a certain offence might, we will say fortunately, not have been followed by serious consequences owing to the absence of some conditions; but that absence may not have been within the knowledge of the workman, and so far as the culpability of the workman is concerned that would not be taken into account?—Just so.

9945. Do you think that it is wise to leave the judgment in a matter of that kind to the manager of the mine?—Yes, with the provision that there is in the Coal Mines Regulation Act which is that the owner is himself responsible for the act of anybody unless he can show that he has done what he can to secure the maintenance of discipline and the observance of the rules. That being the case, I should leave it to him very largely to say in what way he is going to maintain the discipline of his mine. If it is not satisfactory, under Section 5 of the Act, the inspector can summon him. That being the case I think you should leave him as wide a discretion as you can as to the way in which he shall maintain the discipline of his mine. He would not wish to do it in a way unduly harsh to the men or in a way likely to cause friction. That he should not be too easy with the men is I think guarded against by the fact that he is himself responsible if he does not, in cases which are proper to prosecute, prosecute, and if he fines in cases where he ought to take a more drastic remedy.

9946. It has been put to us in evidence that the prosecution designed under the Coal Mines Regulation Act is often avoided by the manager because of the expense, loss of time and the probable friction with the miner?—If you will add to that "and very frequently at the request of the man himself" I should agree.

9947. Do you think that with those elements involved it may safely be left to the judgment of the manager to decide whether there shall be a prosecution or not?—I think so, with the safeguard that he himself is made responsible it he does not do his best to maintain discipline in the mine.

By the Chairman.

9948. A large portion of your evidence necessarily has reference to the construction of the Act of Parliament, and I am afraid that we must not detain you much longer upon that; but might I ask you two or three questions so as to get clearly into our minds the view which you are recommending on the part of the employers. I gather that your advice is proceeding and has been followed since the passing of the Act of 1896 on this view: that there are two classes of contracts provided for, one is the general contract publicly notified and the other is an individual contract in writing?—That is so.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

16 April 1907.

9949. And the individual contract you have further advised, if in writing, can be made in writing after the matter in respect of which the fine is imposed has occurred?—That is so.

9950. Would you now please address yourself to these two particulars under the section. Look at Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a). With regard to the public notification of the general contract, there is no repugnancy at all in the section so far as any of us can discover; that is to say, all the other parts of the section get into a publicly notified contract?—Yes, I should agree with that. I do not see that there is anything inconsistent.

9951. So that the difficulty that arises has reference to the private contract in writing. Now observe the language:—"Or the contract is in writing signed by the workman, and (b) The contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." In order to make your reading correct you would require that instead of that language it should run in this way: "The contract is in writing signed by the workman, and (b) The contract, but not the contract last mentioned, specifies the acts or omissions in regard to which a fine may be imposed"?—I do not think I should want that in it, because the contract—that is whatever the contract is, whether the general or the special contract—is to "specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine may be imposed." It is the words "may be" that cause the difficulty. What you do want to make them quite clear (and I would remind you that it is not always that you get an Act of Parliament of any kind that is perfectly clear) is, "specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed." Then I should put it that it would be made quite clear if there was an obligation to notify, not as a part of any contract at all, but to notify the offences for which the man could be fined.

9952. We are not going to argue it, but suppose you had the language "is imposed," you observe that that would apply to the particular contract which you are referring to which arises after the offence has been committed and the fine is imposed. That again would not apply to a case of antecedent notification of the general contract?—I do not quite see that.

9953. It could not apply—surely you must see that—for this reason. If you antecedently notify a general regulation, that is not a contract under which a fine is imposed; it is a contract under which a fine in certain eventualities will be imposed?—Yes, but this (b) is when the fine has been imposed.

9954. I am asking you to consider my language, namely, that the general contract of regulation which publishes antecedently what is to be the relation of workman and master does not impose the fine, but stipulates what in certain eventualities will happen. You must agree to that?—I cannot quite agree, for this reason. It seems to me that supposing you have the words "the fine is imposed" this (b) relates to the time after the offence has been committed—I am submitting this with very great respect of course.

9955. Then I will take it on your own footing. Your own footing is, that in order to make it equate with your view the language would be in this form: "In respect of which the fine is imposed"?—"Is or has been imposed."

9956. I take it that that is your view?—That is so.

9957. Now, that being your view, let me present to you another matter. We are agreed, are we not, that sub-section 1 applies to the making of a contract?—Yes, it applies to the prohibition of a contract; you are not allowed to make a contract.

9958. Are we agreed that Sub-section 2 of Section 1 applies to the making of a deduction?—A contract for a deduction.

9959. Pardon me, that is not the language of the Act. The language of the Act is, in Sub-section 1 of Section 1, "An employer shall not make any contract." Sub-section 2 of Section 1 begins, "An employer shall not make any deduction"?—I have got here Sub-section 2 in this way, "An employer shall not make any contract for any deduction."

9960. Where do you get that?—That is the Truck Act of 1896.

9961. That is Section 2 that you are looking at?—I beg your pardon, I was mistaken.

9962. I think that now you will see, by the mistake that you have made, that your view would have been sound if Sub-section 2 of Section 1 in its language had been the same as Section 2, but I again point out to you that it is not so; that Sub-section 1 declares: "An employer shall not make any contract with any workman," and Sub-section 2 declares "An employer shall not make any such deduction or receive any such payment"?—That is so.

9963. Then we are agreed that Sub-section 2 applies to making of a deduction?—That is so.

9964. Now observe the conditions: "Unless the deduction or payment is made in pursuance of or in accordance with such a contract as aforesaid." Does that not suggest to your mind, or would it not suggest to anybody's mind, that the making of the deduction is to be in terms of something which has been done under Sub-section 1, namely, the antecedent making of a contract?—I cannot agree. I think it may refer to either contract.

9965. I have put that point to you. Now the next point I put to you is this: "And (b) particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed, and the amount thereof, are supplied to the workman on each occasion when a deduction or payment is made." Does not that suggest to your mind that there is an antecedent contract and that on each occasion when there is an offence there are to be particulars of each deduction?—Well, I give you my own opinion, and I give it with very great deference to your Lordship. I think that means this; that when you make the deduction the particulars must be given to the man as to the deduction which you make from his wages. That we think we have complied with, and we have not acted in this matter upon my advice merely—it is of course a very important matter, and I took the best advice I could get—we think we have complied with that by, when the deduction is made, putting on the pay ticket particulars of the deduction.

9966. In fact the document which you employ and which has been sanctioned by your advice, which I have no doubt has been very skilfully and conscientiously rendered, comes to this at all events, that you so read the Act that instead of a contract under (a) of Sub-section 1 plus particulars under (b) you round the two up together, and instead of supplying particulars on each occasion, you make a contract on each occasion, which contract embraces the particulars?—Not quite. We make a contract on each occasion; the contract specifies the offence and the fine imposed, and we give the man the particulars when we make the deduction. The deduction is not made until the time that he comes to receive his wages, when we give him a pay ticket upon which we show the deductions we are making. The contract is made when the offence is committed; the deduction is not made until the week's end or whenever his wages become payable; then we give him the particulars of the deductions required in (b) of Sub-section 2.

9967. Now I think we have elicited your views upon the Statute, and we will go to the other matter to which you wish to refer?—I wish to call the attention of the Committee to Section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1897, That provides as follows: "Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed at a place as near to the pit mouth as is reasonably practicable." That you will see provides first of all that where the persons employed are paid by weight the actual weight they send up the pit, "mineral gotten," which would include mineral contracted to be gotten and mineral not contracted to be gotten, has to be truly weighed. That is the first point. It is the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed. In other words, what we have to weigh is coal and stones and dirt and other things that we do not want bringing up the pit at all if we can help it. Now, manifestly of course, to pay the man for the whole of that weight would be an injustice. We employ him to get coal. Then the proviso is "Provided that nothing in this section shall preclude the owner agent or manager of the mine from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than mineral contracted, which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten." That is the first thing; nothing shall prevent the persons agreeing to deduct from the total weight, the weight of the mineral not contracted to be gotten; or we may agree to this: "or in respect of any tubs baskets or hutches being improperly filled in those cases where they are filled by the getter of the mineral or his drawer, or by the person immediately employed by him such deductions being determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon, between the owner agent or manager of the mine on the one hand, and the persons employed in the mine on the other, or by some person appointed in that behalf by the owner, agent or manager or (if any check weigher is stationed for this purpose as hereinafter mentioned), by such person and such check weigher, or in the case of difference by a third person to be mutually agreed on by the owner agent or manager of the mine on the one hand, and the persons employed in the mine on the other, or in default of agreement appointed by a chairman of a Court of Quarter Sessions within the jurisdiction of which any shaft of the mine is situate." Your Lordship sees that all that can be done there is to agree to deduct from the total weight the weight of that which is not contracted to be gotten. That gives to the coal owner no compensation whatever for the loss which he sustains by the workman bringing up the pit dirt and refuse and stones, which it is not part of his contract to get and which on the other hand he ought not to get. The extent of the relief that can be given is that we may subtract as far as we can by agreement that which he shall not get from the total weight which comes up from the pit, and we get no compensation for any loss we sustain by having the dirt brought up the pit. Now, it is recognised I think by everybody that this as it is is not a fair nor is it a workable provision, and various arrangements are made at present by agreement between the managers of the mine and the workmen in the mine, entirely outside this section. In some cases it is provided that the dirt is put on one side and divided amongst the whole of the men. That of course is a rough and ready way of doing something, but it is not a fair thing to the men, because a man who sent his coal up pretty clean has to suffer for one who sends up coal which is far from clean. Then in order to give the employer some compensation for his loss there is provision made that if there is more than a certain quantity of dirt in a tub, the whole tub is forfeited. But your Lordship sees that is contrary to the provisions of this Act of Parliament; because then the man is not being paid for the mineral contracted to be gotten. You must pay him for the coal. This, I may say, is not a new question. In the year 1895 Mr. Asquith, the then Home Secretary, brought in a Bill to amend the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and he endeavoured to insert a clause recognising that this is wanted. His Amendment provided this: "Any agreement to vary wages in accordance with the amount of stones or substance other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, or in accordance with the mode of filling any tubs, baskets, or hutches, shall be treated as an agreement for deductions under Section 12 of the principal Act. In estimating any deduction under that section, regard may be had not only to the amount of the stones or substance aforesaid, or to the nature or extent of the improper filling, but also to the diminution in the value of the coal, or to any additional expense caused thereby. And such agreement for deductions, and any deduction made in pursuance thereof, shall be illegal, null, and void unless the agreement is evidenced by a memorandum in writing signed by the workmen, and the deduction authorised by the agreement is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case. Any deduction made in pursuance of any such agreement shall not be lawful unless particulars in writing, shewing the nature and items of the deduction are supplied to the workman on each occasion when the deduction is made."

9968. You are reading from, as I understand, the sections of a Bill?—I am reading from the clauses of a Bill which Mr. Asquith introduced.

9969. Do you happen to remember what happened to that Bill?—It did not go through. It was a General Bill—this was only one of the suggested amendments—and the Bill did not pass. Then in 1896 the then Home Secretary, Sir Matthew White Ridley introduced a Bill to amend the Act, and he also inserted clauses substantially the same as Mr. Asquith, viz., enabling an agreement to be made between the workman and the employer that the deduction might be made from wages—not from the weight—but from the wages—in respect of the coal or dirt or stones improperly sent up the pit, and protected them pretty well in the same way as Mr. Asquith proposed to protect them in his clauses. That did not get through. In speaking upon Sir Matthew White Ridley's amendment in 1896, Mr. Asquith said this:—"As to the promise of the Right Hon. gentleman to omit all those provisions which did not come within the category of life saving, or life protecting provisions, he viewed with regret the disappearance of the clause as to check-weighing. The state of the law at the present time was nothing short of scandalous. When he was at the Home Office he used to take opinions from the law officers on the subject, and as the law officers changed frequently he got a great variety of opinions. . . . He did not believe that there was any mine owner in the country who at this moment knew whether the system of deductions observed in his mines was legal or illegal, and whether he was not carrying on a system which might even have been agreed to between masters and men, exposing himself to daily penalties. The law being admittedly in that condition, it was regrettable that an attempt to make it clear such as was contained in Clause 3 had to be abandoned. It was a clause which had been the subject of much misapprehension outside, and he hoped, if not in the present session, then in subsequent years, such modifications as had been shown to be necessary might form the subject of a separate enactment. But he agreed that the clauses of the Bill ought not to be imperilled by the introduction of disputable matter which was extraneous to its primary purpose—the protection of life. Therefore the right hon. gentleman would have with him the universal approval of all in abandoning for the time being those particular provisions, and in asking the House to concentrate its attentions on what was so necessary for the safety of the mining populaton." Now in that Bill of Sir Matthew White Ridley's these check-weighing clauses were dropped. There was strong opposition on the part of the workmen. The opinion of Mr. Asquith, as I have just read, was that the state of the law on that subject then—and it is the same now—was nothing short of scandalous. Then last session there was a Bill introduced, at the instance, I think, of the Miners' Federation, to amend the provisions with reference to the check-weigher. We attempted, on the part of the coal-miners at that time, to introduce these clauses in order to remove this scandal from the Act of Parliament. Very strong opposition was made on the part of the men. It was represented that this was a desirable amendment as to check-weighmen, and that they had no objection to it, but it was also stated if we persisted in pushing forward these clauses we should wreck the Bill. It was stated then by the Home Secretary, that there would have to be some amendment of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, when this matter would be considered. Under these circumstances, I invite your Lordship and the Committee to consider some amendment to this clause. The amendment we want is in the direction of either Sir Matthew White Ridley's or Mr. Asquith's amendment—that instead of this unworkable method, we should have the means of deducting from the wages, under proper restrictions, something in respect of the loss that we sustain by their sending up from the pit something which should not be sent up.

9970. You want power, I gather, to make a deduction from the wages?—We do.

9971. Under the Act of Parliament there is power to make a deduction from weight?—Yes.

9972. Does not that come to the same thing in the end?—No, for this reason; we want something more than the actual quantity of the minerals.

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

16 April 1907.

9973. You want a certain allowance for the in-cost in sifting and so on ?—Yes, it is a very great expense.

9974. Some of the difficulty is possibly due to confusion in the original Act of Parliament ?—No doubt.

9975. Have any of these eminent men called attention to the fact that the amount of wages depends " on the amount of mineral gotten by them ; " that seems to be entirely repugnant to the remainder of the clause, which all assumes that there was something beyond the mineral gotten. If the clause had stopped near the beginning there, it never could have been construed to include in the mineral to be gotten this stone and dirt and so on ?—If it was not for the proviso ; but the proviso does assume that, apparently. But the whole clause together is not a clause that is workable or that is attempted to be worked at the present time. Both Home Secretaries have endeavoured to get an amendment, and we ask this Committee to give the matter their consideration.

9976. I am not quite sure whether it is within our functions as a Committee, but since you have mentioned it, may I put this point to you ? In so far as you wish to make a deduction from the wages which is more than the value of the illicit material per weight, it is a charge for improper filling plus a charge for the expense of sifting ?—It is. It is a breach of contract ; that is really what it is.

9977. Now, in so far as it is a charge for improper filling, that, of course, would fall under our purview, because it might be considered as a sort of ancillary to the question of discipline ?—I think that may be so. I suggest that it comes under these words in the terms of your reference. You are a Committee " to enquire into the operation of the Truck Acts and to consider and report what amendments or extensions of these Acts or changes in their administration are desirable ; particularly whether fines and deductions from wages should be prohibited."

9978. Is it upon that point that you are representing to us the opinions of the iron and steel manufacturers ?—No ; that is entirely as to coal. I may just add that it had been suggested that this provision really should form a part of a Truck Act and not part of the Coal Mines Regulation Act.

9979. Now I believe you have something to lay before us quite additional to the evidence we have so far had from you ?—Since the last meeting I have communicated with the principal iron and steel manufacturers in the kingdom, enquiring as to their opinions upon the subject of fining, both with reference to the maintenance of discipline in their works and also as to whether they have received any serious objection from the men upon it. I have got reports from the Lancashire Bar Iron Manufacturing Association, the South Yorkshire Bar Iron Association, South Staffordshire Iron Makers' Association, Steel Ingot Makers' Association and North of England Iron and Steel Manufacturers, Scottish Iron Masters' Association, Scottish Steel Makers Association, Birmingham Galvanized Iron Makers, Cleveland Iron Masters' Association, Cleveland Mine Owners' Association ; Brymbo Steel Co., Vickers, Son & Maxim, Dorman, Long & Co., Frodington Iron and Steel Co., W. Whitwell & Co., Ltd., North Eastern Steel Co., Ltd. These names, I think, would cover from Scotland southward practically all the steel makers and iron makers in the kingdom ; at any rate they are very largely represented, and I think from the figures that have been given to me it is a very moderate estimate to say that they cover an annual wage of something between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000.

9980. Can you give us the number of employees ?—I could not give the exact number, but it would be a great many thousands. There has recently been established a federation of the Iron and Steel and Allied Employers' Associations in the kingdom, and I have been authorised by a representative meeting of that federation to put before you the views of the trade upon the question of fining. I have enquired how far these various industries consider it desirable in the interests of discipline that fining should be permitted, and invariably from the whole of them I get a reply in the affirmative, both in the interests of the men and in the interests of the employers, as it is a method of maintaining discipline which is less harsh to the men and likely to cause less friction than either dismissal or prosecution where the offence committed is one for which they are liable to prosecution. Then I asked another question : did they find that there was any serious objection on the part of the men to this system, and the answer is no.

9981. Since you have opened this matter to us let me ask, are you able to inform us what is the scale upon which these fines are imposed ?—In some of the iron and steel industries where the men are getting very large wages they go as high as £5 ; that is for damage done in the course of their work ; they go from £5 down to as low as 1s. or 6d.

9982. Can you give us a list ?—I can supply a general list summarising what the amount of the fines is.

9983. We would like a list showing in particular as to ironworks, the amount of the fines and the particulars, the offences and so on ?—I will supply that. Now there is one matter to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the Committee as bearing upon this question as to how these fines are regarded by the workmen : whether they have an objection to them or not. In the Cleveland blast furnaces, fining is in operation there, and I have taken this case : " When the eight hours shift was introduced at the blast furnaces in 1897 (making three shifts in twenty-four hours in lieu of two shifts), one of the points on which apprehension was felt was, that the workmen might not present themselves with due regularity for work at the varying hours of changing shifts. The men's union officials fully recognised the difficulty of carrying on the operations at the furnaces unless the proper staff was in attendance at the three changing times, viz., 6 a.m., 2 p.m., and 10 p.m. The accompanying rules were accordingly drawn up and concurred in jointly by employers and workmen's representatives." The rules provide for fines for not observing the hours of work. The hours of work are set out : " Monday to Saturday (inclusive).—First shift, 6 a.m. to 2 p.m. ; meals, 8.45 a.m. to 9 a.m., and 11.45 a.m. to 12 noon. Second shift, 2 p.m. to 10 p.m. ; meals, 4.45 p.m. to 5 p.m , and 7.45 p.m. to 8 p.m. Third shift, 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. ; meals, 12.45 a.m. to 1 a.m., and 3.45 a.m. to 4 a.m. Sunday. —First shift (long turn), 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. ; meals 9 a.m. to 9.15 a.m., 12.15 p.m. to 12.30 p.m., 3.30 p.m. to 3.45 p.m., 6.45 p.m. to 7 p.m. Second shift, 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. ; meals, 12.45 a.m. to 1 a.m., 3.45 a.m. to 4 a.m. That eight hours work equal one shift on all days and any part of eight hours to be paid in proportion." Then there is this provision : " A workman who is not relieved at the end of his shift and in consequence works two successive shifts shall receive a premium of half a shift's pay, which shall be deducted from the wages of the man who fails to relieve him, except in the case of the 6 a.m. shift, when the premium shall be obtained by deducting the amount required from each of the absent men belonging to his class equally. If the manager is satisfied that failure to come out for the shift commencing at 6 a.m. was owing to a bonâ fide case of illness arising from causes beyond a man's own control, no deduction will be made from such man. For the purpose of this rule the men shall be classed at each works by agreement between the employer and the men's representatives." I need not read the remainder of the rules. Then my memorandum goes on : " The rules have remained in force, except that the employers do not now impose any fine on men who absent themselves from work at 6 a.m. The workmen's plea for abolition of this fine was that men were liable occasionally to oversleep themselves in the morning and that the employer usually had less difficulty early in the morning in replacing absentees than at 2 p.m., or 10 p.m. The regularity of the men in their attendance at 6 a.m. has not improved, but far otherwise, since the 6 a.m. deduction was given up." Now this is what I want to impress upon the Committee ; that when the Act of 1896 was passed, there was a provision, as you are aware, in the Act giving to the Home Secretary the right to exempt any industries from the operation of the Act. That is Section 9. Now in this district both the workmen and the employers applied to the Home Secretary to exempt them from the Act, and the Home Secretary in response to that application did exempt them, and continued to authorise the fines. I have put that forward as an instance where the workmen themselves asked for the continuance of the system, as to which, as I understand, some evidence has been put before this Committee, that the workmen strongly disapproved of it. The letter that was sent and signed by the Secretary of the Cleveland Mine Owners

Association, and by the Secretary of the Cleveland Miners Association, is as follows. This is to Sir Matthew White-Ridley, Home Secretary; it is dated December 11th, 1896: "Sir—Truck Act, 1896. Under Section 9 of this Act, the Secretary of State has power, if satisfied that the provisions of the Act are unnecessary for the protection of the workmen employed in any trade or business, to grant an exemption from those provisions in respect of the persons engaged in that trade or business. We, as representing the Cleveland ironstone mine owners and the Cleveland ironstone miners beg respectively to request that you will be good enough to exercise, as regards the Cleveland Ironstone mining district, the power conferred on you by Section 9 of the Act. The Cleveland mine owners and Cleveland miners are of the united opinion that the Act is altogether unnecessary for the protection of the workmen at the Cleveland ironstone mines. Whatever deductions are made from the wages of the men employed at the Cleveland ironstone mines are made by mutual arrangement between the employers and the workmen, and each week when the men are paid their wages the fullest possible details are set out on the pay-ticket which each man receives. We believe there are at the present time some twenty ironstone mines working in the Cleveland district, and the members of the Cleveland Mine Owners' Association are owners of eighteen of these mines. As regards the workmen engaged at the Cleveland mines a majority of them are members of the Cleveland Miners Association. The representative character of our respective positions will from the two preceding paragraphs be apparent. If, in order to obtain the relief desired, it should be deemed necessary for us to send a deputation to you, we should be glad to arrange for our reresentatives from our respective associations to wait upon you to supply any further information required."

Mr. T. R. Ellis.

16 April 1907.

9984. I gather from your evidence that that is the attitude of mind of both employers and workmen, so far as you are aware?—My evidence is this. It is distinctly the feeling of the employers, and I have not heard, as I stated in my evidence before, any complaint as to the principle of maintaining discipline by the imposition of fines, protected as the men are under the Act of 1896.

9985. So that suppose the Acts were re-cast, you would favour the inclusion of a section analogous to Section 9, giving the Secretary of State power to interpose and allow fines to be imposed?—Certainly. If it is considered desirable and fairer to the men that there should be a notice put up that any offence against the Coal Mines Regulation Act on the general or special rules or other rules, providing for the discipline of the mines should be subject to fine, I do not see that there is any objection to putting up such a notice. The men know it perfectly well, but if it is considered better to put up a notice, there is no objection. My objection is to having it part of the contract with the men; I prefer to leave it to be dealt with on each occasion. I do want to press this: that I think to have to alter all the contracts, and to insert a clause compelling the men to submit to a fine, would bring about untold friction and trouble.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

TRUCK COMMITTEE.

THIRTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Thursday, 25th April, 1907.

PRESENT.

F. MADDISON, ESQ., M.P. (in the Chair).
E. A. BROTHERTON, ESQ., M.P. | STEPHEN WALSH, ESQ., M.P.
T. E. BETTANY, ESQ. (Secretary).

Dr. C. CRAWFORD, was called; and Examined.

Dr. C. Crawford.
25 April 1907.

By Mr. Maddison.

9986. I must express our regret that our Chairman, the Lord-Advocate is unwell, and cannot be present. On behalf of myself and the Committee, I regret that we have not the advantage of his presence to-day so that he might put to you, Dr. Crawford, in a way that I am afraid I shall not be able to do, the different questions. You represent the Scottish Midland and Western Medical Association ?—Yes.

9987. That association, I see, deals with the mining industry ?—Yes. The members of the association are chiefly composed of medical men engaged in mining practice and the greater part of their emoluments is derived from fees deducted from the wages of miners and other workmen.

9988. I suppose your evidence will refer to that branch of the profession ?—Yes; only.

9989. I see you say that the fees average 3d. per week ?—Yes, per workman.

9990. Does that apply to Scotland generally ?—Yes, I think it does. In some districts it is not quite so much as that, but I think 3d. per week is the maximum or 6d. per fortnight.

9991. It is about the average ?—It is about the average—at least our association has always aimed at getting all the works up to that level. Long ago it used to be much less—1½d. and 2d. a week but we have managed now to get them up to that level.

9992. Have you any means of comparing that average with the fees in any other association which gives medical relief. For instance, in the case of friendly societies they have sometimes what they call medical aid associations ?—Yes. It is different in the case of the ordinary friendly societies such as the Rechabites and the Oddfellows and so on. In mining practice for this 3d. per week the miner gets medical attendance, and if he is married and has a family, his wife and family get medical attendance also. But in the case of the ordinary friendly society, it is only the member himself who gets the medical attendance, you understand.

9993. Then this 3d. per week paid by each workman covers medical attendance not only for himself, but also for his wife and family ?—For all his dependents in fact—all those who are dependent upon him for their livelihood, and sometimes that includes about half a dozen children, so that if it were not that there were a lot of single men in the works, if they were all married men and had families, the pay would be very poor—the remuneration would not be enough.

9994. So that the single men really help to pay the fees of the married men; is that it ?—Yes, it helps to raise the average.

9995. These payments are deducted from the wages of the workmen by the employers ?—By the employers.

9996. Does the employer contribute anything at all himself ?—No, he contributes nothing. Of course, his clerk has a little trouble in deducting the fees, and some charge us a commission for doing it.

9997. You say you think this system is beneficial both to the workman and to the doctor ?—Yes.

9998. Because the workmen gets his medical attendance and treatment for himself and his family at a cheaper rate, and the medical profession has no trouble in collecting the money because it is done for them ?—Quite so; we have no trouble in regard to bad debts and things of that kind.

10000. Have you any experience of what happens to that minority that you refer to, the men who object to pay this 3d. Is there any compulsion imposed upon them ?—No; there is no compulsion. If there are any conscientious objectors, all they have to do is to say that they will make their own arrangements for medical attendance.

10001. You have known, you say, of no case of objection ?—No, except perhaps in a case such as this, where a man resides at a great distance from his work and where it is neither convenient for him to send to the medical man nor for the medical man to go so far to attend him. In a case like that he might object to pay, and very reasonably so, and in that event he could make his own arrangements for medical attendance.

10002. So that you have not noticed any harshness in the working of this system ?—No, not the slightest; in the case of a workman who has left a works and perhaps gone into some other occupation where the same system does not prevail, I have often heard him express regret that he had ceased to benefit from the system.

10003. You deal here with the treatment of a workman and his family in the case of a long illness ?—Yes.

10004. I gather from that that this 3d. per week would cover even cases of that kind ?—Yes; it would cover cases of that kind, and therefore when a workman is ill he is not practically contributing; he is getting the benefit of his past contributions. Of course when he is not earning wages he does not contribute anything.

10005. You say that the employer is also benefited ?—Yes, by having his accidents attended to without cost to himself.

10006. What do you quite mean by that ?—Suppose that Parliament made these deductions illegal, and the system was abolished, and the employer no longer collected money from the workmen to pay the doctor, he would be obliged to have someone appointed to attend to the accidents, the same as railways and engineering works have; they have all got one or more doctors at a fixed salary to attend to their accidents, and they would have to get someone to attend to those accidents, and they would have to pay for that. At present they pay nothing; they get the doctor who is paid by the men to attend to the accidents and he gets nothing from the employer for it.

10007. In that case, seeing that the employers do get that advantage, it seems to strike one as peculiar that they should sometimes take a commission for collecting these fees ?—It is not universal to do it; some do and others do not.

10008. You are therefore on account of these reasons, anxious that these deductions should not be made illegal ?—We are fairly satisfied with the system as it is, and I think the workmen are fairly satisfied with it also, and that it works fairly reasonably well to all parties. I think therefore that it would be a great hardship to many if the deductions were made illegal.

10009. In any of these collieries, in your experience do they also make any deductions for hospitals in the neighbourhood ?—Yes, at all the works, at least within a reasonable distance of Glasgow, they make a yearly or a half yearly contribution to the hospitals.

10010. Is that stopped from the men's money ?—It is stopped from the men's money, but it is a voluntary thing, of course. There is not the least objection to it; it is only once a year or once a half year, as the case may be.

10011. I suppose, generally, you would be against any element of compulsion for these deductions ?—Certainly.

10012. You would object to it being made a condition of employment, for instance, that a man must contribute ?—Yes.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10013. I do not know that I need trouble you with many questions after what our Chairman has put to you. I take it you have had considerable experience in this particular subject ?—Yes, thirty years' experience.

10014. And that during all your experience you have not found that the workmen have had reason to complain of the deductions ?—No.

10015. In fact, in all your experience, the deduction has been voluntary ?—Yes, and acquiesced in.

10016. The employers are willing to collect it in most cases if not all—perhaps all ?—Yes, as a rule they are willing to do it, and the workmen are willing to give it.

10017. I was sorry to learn that in some cases the employers made a charge of commission for collecting the fees, as you put it. Might I take it that you meant a charge to cover such small expenses as might be incurred in that operation ?—Yes; it is a small charge.

10018. Would you suggest there was a possibility of such a charge being removed ?—No, I do not think it is a matter worth going into. Of course it is more a matter of arrangement between the colliery office and the medical man, as it were, it does not hurt the workman in any way; it is more a matter between the doctor and the employer.

10019. Am I to take it that the charge is really a deduction from what is handed to the medical man ?—Yes.

10020. It is not an additional charge put upon the workman ?—No, it is a sort of 2½ per cent. deduction for the trouble of collecting, as they put it; but as I said before, the employers benefit because they get their accidents attended to for nothing.

10021. In ordinary cases, I suppose it would not pay a doctor to accept 3d. a week from a workman if a workman had a large family in the case of his being sick or living a long distance from the medical officer's residence ?—It is like everything else, it is the numbers that pay. Where you have 100 or 200 workmen, there are a few who have a great deal of sickness and who have large families, and you are never out of their houses, but there are single and other men that you hardly ever see, and it is just as in the case of other benefit societies, the sound help to pay for the sick.

10022. I suppose you make no exception with regard to those who require more attendance. That is, those who require more attendance are on the same terms as the others ?—Yes. They all get it when required; they are just on the same terms.

10023. The fee I suppose does not include medicine, does it ?—Yes, it includes medicine; it does not include attendance in midwifery and as a rule it does not include vaccination. Those things are extra, but it includes attendance for accidents and sickness and it includes also medicine and surgical appliances, splints and all that sort of thing.

10024. I may take it you know of no hardship on the employés in respect of this charge being levied ?—No.

10025. And no grievance on the part of the workmen against the employer ?—No; I know of no grievance.

By Mr. Walsh.

10026. Are a certain number of surgeons appointed for the colliery or collieries ?—There is one or more in a large works. In some cases there is more than one.

10027. How are those surgeons appointed ?—Long ago, it practically was the employer who appointed them, but now it is the workmen.

10028. The workmen at an annual meeting held by them ?—There is no regular annual meeting, but suppose they are dissatisfied with their doctor and want his removal, they have a meeting and take steps to have him removed.

10029. Supposing the men do not wish to proceed in so far as the removal of an existing surgeon, and a new surgeon comes into the district who desires a little more practice, is there any possibility of that gentleman getting in ?—There is a possibility.

10030. Does that mean a probability ?—Of course, the holder of office naturally resists any attempt of that kind.

10031. What is the method adopted then?—I suppose if he can influence a sufficient number of workmen, and they can bring pressure to bear upon the employer, he can have his name added to the list.

10032. What do you mean by that latter remark "If he can bring pressure to bear upon the employer ?"—Suppose a man walked up to the employer's office door and said "I am a doctor; I want my name put down," you could hardly expect the employer to put his name down without some evidence that the men wished it.

10033. Would not that be an almost impossible case that you quote ?—Well, it could not be altogether impossible because a new man might come to a district, and even although he did not know any of the workmen, he might want his name put down.

10034. What I am trying to lead up to is this: in the case of a man who may have been in a district for some time, and who, because of his skill and general attainments has acquired the confidence of the people in the neighbourhood, and being anxious as all surgeons naturally are, I should think, and particularly Scottish surgeons, to push their business and get into the work, would it be possible for the employer to put any bar against that man ?—No; not if he had sufficient support from the workmen.

10035. If the confidence of the workmen was sufficiently great in him, he would have comparative ease in getting in ?—Yes.

10037. Supposing a man sustains an injury at a particular colliery, it would be necessary for him to get a certificate from the surgeon at the colliery as to the nature of his injury ?—Yes.

10038. To whom does he take that certificate ?—He takes it to the colliery office; he gets his compensation money through that. I am not perfectly positive about it, but I think that is the way it is done.

10039. The colliery, I take it, have a complete record of the time and of the nature of such accidents ?—Yes; I should think they had.

10040. So that the surgeons who are acting for the men at the colliery have no connection whatever with the surgeons who are acting for the employers ?—None whatever.

10041. Is there no medical board of these gentlemen in any way formed to consult with the employers ?—No, not in our district.

By Mr. Maddison.

10042. Thank you, doctor, you have put your evidence so clearly that we appreciate entirely your view ?—My friend Dr. Thomson is here. I do not know whether he has anything to add to what I have said.

By Mr. Walsh.

10043. Before you leave the Chair, Dr. Crawford, have the surgeons always found that they have got an effectual hold on the money when it has been paid by the men ?—So far as we know. I daresay in the past there may have been instances of irregularity, but I think at present the surgeons are pretty certain about it, and, besides, the workmen have the right of going into the books.

10044. I think you have rather misapprehended my question. What I mean is this: It is very desirable if the workmen have once paid their money and become entitled to certain medical services, that the surgeon who has given those services should receive that money ?—It is.

10045. Do you know of any case where the surgeon who has given the service has not received that money ?—No, I know of no such case.

10046. You know of no case where an employer has impounded the money and devoted it to his own purposes ?—No, I have never heard of such a case.

10047. A case of that description would be a serious matter for the consideration of this Committee if such a case had ever occurred ?—Probably that would be so.

By Mr. Maddison.

10048. I should like to ask you one question upon that. What means have you of knowing the number of men who are in an association of that kind ?—That is often the trouble. A man comes and says, "I am working at so and so, and I want your attendance," and you go; you have just the man's word for it, but I do not think we are ever deceived in that way; at least, any amount of deception that there may be is very trivial. Where the work is divided there is a little trouble because we have got to get a list of those who are paying for us, and, of course, again, the workmen are always coming and going, and there is a little trouble just in knowing exactly where you are.

10049. Yes, but my point is this: where you have a large works employing say, 5,000 men, or 3,000 men, paying 3d. per week, a large number of them will not come to you for attendance during the year at all ?—No.

10050. Have you any means of seeing from the books of the company the total number of men who are paying, because you get 3d. per week, I take it, from each of them ?—Yes.

10051. How do you know what number of men are paying ?—I do not think we have any means of knowing. I suppose, if we asked, we might get access to the books and see.

10052. So that really you cannot quite answer Mr. Walsh's question as to whether it all does reach you ?—No, we cannot, we have to take it on trust, as it were.

10053. That is hardly like a Scotchman, is it, to take things on trust ?—Perhaps not.

By Mr. Walsh.

10054. This is rather a serious matter. A case I know has arisen—I do not think it is very far from your own district—I think it is Lanarkshire ?—Let me say I come from the Hamilton district.

10055. I do not think it is very far from there. With whom do you understand your arrangements are made, are they supposed to be made with the men or with the employer ?—Made with both—both the employer and the men.

10056. The employer pays no money ?—He pays no money; he collects it.

10057. And in some cases charges a commission for his services in so doing ?—Sometimes.

10058. Your services are rendered to the men ?—Yes

10059. The payments for those services are made entirely by the men?—Entirely by the men.

10060. Do I understand that the contract that exists between you, whether it is expressed or implied, is really between the surgeons and the men ?—It is.

10061. Let us take the case of a surgeon who, say, for three months has given his attendance to the men in the lively hope, of course, that he will be paid ?—Yes.

10062. That surgeon receives no money. Against whom would he have a claim, against the employer or against the men ?—I should say he had a claim against the employer, through whose hands the men paid him. Of course I am not a lawyer. I do not know, but in common sense I should think that the man who collects the money would be the one who was responsible for the payment.

10063. That opens out rather an interesting point, because if a surgeon gives his services under the expectation that he is to receive from the men certain moneys as recompense for such services, and those moneys do not reach him, there must be a hiatus somewhere, must there not ?—Yes, a good big hiatus.

10064. Such a case as that has occurred, and it seemed to me to be a matter that where these deductions are made should be inquired into ?—A case of that kind has never come to court, I think.

10065. No, it has not come into court yet ?—If it came into court I suppose we should know how the law stood on the subject.

By Mr. Maddison.

10066. I suppose at the end of every quarter or half-year you get a cheque which is supposed to cover the total number of men who have contributed during that period ?—That is so, and as a rule there is a statement of the amount collected at each pay; at the end of each fortnight of the pay there is a statement of the amount collected.

10068. I agree with Mr. Walsh that it really is a little important to know that the money which is paid by the men reaches you. Do you know whether the men, or any committee representative of the men, if such exists, check at all, or have any means of checking the number of people from whom deductions are made?—I do not know; of course your point is this: that some men in a works may contribute, and others may not. As a rule in all these works all the men contribute, you know.

10069. My point is that deductions are made, and there does not seem to be any business way of the surgeon knowing whether he has been really paid what has been deducted?—Of course the workmen have power themselves to audit the books of the works so as to see that there is nothing wrong with the deductions. There are deductions, of course, for other things besides medical attendance.

10070. I suppose you, speaking for your profession, have no doubts on that head, and you have had no cases before you to justify any suspicion?—No, we are quite satisfied. We are quite satisfied with the arrangement as it is, and that is the reason that we are here to-day.

10071. Thank you, that is all?—I do not know whether there is any other point that Dr. Thomson, who is here, would like to add to what I have said.

10072. I think your evidence has been so clear that the Committee follow exactly what your views are, and unless there is some other point that Dr. Thomson would like to bring out, I think we are fairly in possession of your views?—I think Dr. Thomson would like to confirm what I have said.

MR. ROBERT THOMSON, M.B., C.M., was called; and Examined.

Mr. R. Thomson. 25 April 1907.

By Mr. Maddison.

10073. You are President of the Scottish Midland, and Western Medical Association?—I am.

10074. Is there anything you would like to add to the evidence that Dr. Crawford has just given us?—I should just like to say this, that in my experience I usually get the fees paid without any deductions, except in one case. In all the big collieries I know of there is no deduction. It is in the case of one of the smaller ones, and it goes there as a small commission to the cashier for his bother in getting the moneys. We are usually quite willing to give these commissions, but in the big works there is really no deduction.

10075. When you say no deduction, it is no commission that you refer to?—Yes, no commission.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10076. I do not know that there is anything that occurs to me to ask you after what we have heard, but one, of course, would be very pleased to hear any further expression of your views if you have anything further to add?—No, I do not think there is anything further that I can add to the evidence already given by Dr. Crawford.

MR. CHARLES POSTGATE, was called; and Examined.

Mr. C. Postgate. 25 April 1907.

By Mr. Maddison.

10077. You are the Secretary of the North Riding Infirmary at Middlesbrough?—That is so.

10078. You come here as representing that institution?—I come here as representing that institution, and I have authority also to speak on behalf of the other institutions which are mentioned in my proof.

10079. You really speak then for these ten hospitals?—Yes, for these hospitals that are mentioned here.

10080. I see you divide those hospitals into two classes: those that cater entirely for the use of workmen and their families and what you call general hospitals?—Yes.

10081. With regard to that first class, you say they are provided solely for the use of workmen and their families. Do you mean by that workmen employed at certain works?—Yes. Workmen who are employed at works in the vicinity of those hospitals and for which the hospitals are provided specially. Other hospitals are provided specially for the mining districts in which they exist.

10082. Do you mean by that that nobody would be treated in those hospitals unless they did work at works in the neighbourhood?—The inhabitants in those districts are so few other than those employed in these industries that it is practically a negligible quantity.

10083. Then this division is not the result of any rules which debar people who do not come from any particular class; it is only that in practice all the people are as a rule people who are connected with the works?—That is so: the hospitals would of course take any necessitous cases, even though they were not actually engaged in the industries that the hospitals had been erected for.

10084. I think that is clear. You say of the ten hospitals, four belong to the first class, and six to the latter class?—Yes.

10085. You also state that the first class provide in the aggregate accommodation for ninety-five in-patients?—That is so; they have ninety-five beds.

10086. The four have?—The four together.

10087. Then they are quite small hospitals?—Yes, they are quite small. The largest of those four hospitals has sixty-six beds, and the smallest only five beds.

10088. Are those small hospitals established in different districts so as to be handy for the men?—Yes; they are spread about so as to be handy for the men in the ironstone district. The largest, with sixty-six beds, serves a very large steel works.

10089. You tell us that these hospitals derive their income from certain sources, chiefly the workmen's contributions?—Yes.

10090. What would that amount to per week on the average?—That, of course, would vary with the number of men employed, but there is a standard sum which each man gives.

10091. I mean the individual contribution?—The individual contribution will run to about a 1d. each per week.

10092. How is that collected? What is the method of collecting that 1d. per week?—The workmen contribute weekly in their respective districts ½d. up to 1½d. each; the sums vary with the wage paid, and also where the work is more hazardous and where the accidents are very frequent.

10093. Would you tell us what is the method of collecting these contributions. First of all is it compulsory on all the men to submit to the deductions?—No.

10094. Paragraph 21 of your proof says that recourse has been had to the employers of labour to undertake the systematic collection of the pence for the hospitals?—Yes, they have undertaken to collect the pence for them. The employers of labour really act as collectors for the hospitals, and where the workmen subscribe, it is collected in the form of a deduction, but by previous agreement with the men. Meetings which are properly advertised are held at the works, and the men decide what they will do, and then give their authority to the employers to make the deduction, whatever it may be. I might say that quite recently in Middlesbrough the workmen reaffirmed their desire to give financial assistance to the hospitals, and that by resolutions which were passed at meetings held at the various works they increased their contributions by one ½d. per head per week because the hospitals were in such need of it, and they authorised their employers to retain those sums from their wages week by week.

10095. Who was that meeting to which you refer called by?—That would be first promulgated by the hospitals themselves through the workmen's representatives.

10096. The workmen's representatives on the boards of the hospitals?—Yes. We always deal with the workmen's representatives in workmen's matters.

10097. You think that those meetings and meetings of the kind are always free and open meetings?—Yes, undoubtedly. A series of meetings have been held at the works all over the district, and the masters have refused to have anything to do with them in the sense of influencing the men.

10098. Have you known cases where the men have declined for various reasons, good or bad, but satisfactory to themselves, to contribute to the hospitals ?—I have not a single case before my mind—not one.

10099. Can you give us some proportion that the subscriptions of the employers bear in these four hospitals to those of the men ?—Yes ; it is about 30 per cent.

10100. The employer pays about 30 per cent. ?—Yes, the employers and others who are not workmen ; it is a very small sum altogether which comes from any other source that that of the workmen ; it is about 30 per cent. ; the workmen's contributions run to about 71 per cent. or 70 per cent.

10101. Thirty per cent. will represent the contributions of the employers ?—Yes.

10102. What is the respective proportion of the representation on the board of those four hospitals—is it a joint board by the way ?—It is not a joint board. With respect to the management and government of the various hospitals, a very large share is confided to the workmen's representatives. Of course, it must be obvious that the very large volume of their subscriptions which they could withhold at any time is in itself a guarantee that their interests must be respected.

10103. That is what I am alluding to. Will you give us the total number of members on the board and what proportion of these members are workmen ?—This is strikingly illustrated in the case of the Eston Hospital, which has sixty-six beds out of the ninety-five I was speaking of. That is one of the hospitals provided for the sole use of the workmen and their families. That hospital is managed by a committee of thirty-eight persons, made up of one president, five vice-presidents, and thirty-two members of the committee, of whom twenty-nine are representatives appointed directly by the workmen.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10104. Thirty-three ?—It may be thirty-three now.

By Mr. Maddison.

10105. That, of course, is a very large, and it seems to be a fair representation of the workmen, who, however, contribute 70 per cent. of the subscriptions ?—Yes. It is an absolutely controlling body.

10106. It seems consistent with their subscribing power ?—It is to that extent, and it shows how much those concerned in the hospitals trust the men to manage these institutions that have been founded for them—to stimulate their interest in them.

10107. Having subscribed so largely to these purely workmen's hospitals as we will call them, then you give us the amount that the workmen subscribe to the general hospitals in the district, which is about, I think you say, 53 per cent. ?—Yes, that is taking the average over the whole of these hospitals. The workmen's subscriptions vary in these six general hospitals from 35 up to 65 per cent. of the total income for their current maintenance. There is a very much greater proportion of workmen in some of these localities than there is in others. For instance, in Middlesbrough, the proportion is enormously large, whereas in Darlington the proportion is considerably less.

10108. The men who subscribe to these four hospitals also have deductions made for the general hospitals, do not they ?—No ; they do not subscribe at all to the general hospitals.

10109. The workmen who subscribe to the general hospitals are workmen outside ?—Entirely outside, and distinct from the other group.

10110. In Paragraph 17 of your précis you begin to tell us about the system of collecting the workmen's contributions, which amounts to this, that the various works make themselves collectors for the hospital ?—Yes.

10111. I hardly care to ask it, but do you know of any cases where they charge the hospitals a commission for collecting those moneys ?—I do not ; there is nothing of the kind in the district. I am very desirous of emphasising what a great advantage this is to the hospitals which the masters have given. And, of course, it has been on the strength of its continuance that the hospitals have gone on extending for many years—I refer to the fact that the masters act as our collectors.

10112. You have known, as you say, of no case where they have charged commission ?—I have never heard of such a request or of such a payment being made. Mr. C. Postgate. 25 April 1907.

10113. I should not have liked you to have given any other answer ?—I should have been sorry to have had to do so.

10115. Therefore you would look upon any change in the law which would make these deductions illegal as a serious blow to this hospital work which is going on in your district ?—It would simply paralyse our work.

10116. Your evidence has all been directed to that point of view. I notice in Paragraph 23 of your proof you say : "To meet the wishes of the hospitals, the large employers have their pay books specially drawn, so as to show every man's contribution to the hospital in a separate column by the side of his wage," and so on. So that you think you have quite an effective check, that you do actually get the money which is deducted ?—Yes, I think there is no doubt of that, and besides that, these books are subject to the firms' audit along with their other books ; they have an account in which they credit all these subscriptions to our account, and they send the money to us by cheque either quarterly or monthly as the case may be, or in some cases the employers hand the money over to the workmen's representative and he takes it direct to the hospital.

10117. I suppose the men do not get any vouchers for the pennies which they pay ?—No, not directly, but it is marked on their pay sheet every week. Of course there are different systems, but I put in here a specimen of a pay envelope showing what deductions are made.

10118. I should like to see that ?—I have also the rules of the various hospitals. This is the book of rules of the Eston Hospital giving their government. There is a specimen envelope. (Handing in document.) That is only one of many ; they are not identical, but in some form or other in that way they show to the workmen exactly what they are paying.

10119. When is this given to the workmen ?—That is given to him with his pay ; his wage is enclosed in that envelope

10120. The deduction for all purposes is marked on the outside of it ?—Yes, and that agrees with the pay book.

10121. So that according to that, the workman has a voucher given to him that there has been that deduction ?—Yes ; He knows to a halfpenny what is deducted.

10122. And there is a corresponding entry in the books, which books are subject to the firms' audit ?—Yes.

10123. I presume, of course, you regard that as all the check that can possibly be required—is that so ?—It is so. Of course all the works do not adopt one definite system. We allow them the latitude of keeping their books in their own way, but they have actually submitted their books in some cases to me so that I could check them for myself. Our account is just as carefully kept as the firms' accounts themselves are kept ; it is a part of their accounts.

10124. You have already explained as to the proportion of the workmen in the management of the hospitals, and your evidence has been that they really predominate ?—That is so. That is very markedly so in the workmen's hospitals—of course there are the general hospitals.

10125. Just a question about those general hospitals. Do you state in your evidence the proportion of workmen represented on that ?—In the general hospitals it is somewhat different. The general hospitals, of course, are not entirely for workmen, although by far the greater number of cases comes from the workmen and their families. In these general hospitals I have got estimates as near as it is possible to get them, and it is calculated that from

Mr. C. T. Postgate.

25 April 1907.

90 to 95 per cent. of the cases treated are those of workmen and their families.

10126. I suppose in Middlesbrough you have nothing but workmen and millionaires?—Millionaires do not reside in Middlesbrough. In Middlesbrough I might say we have practically nothing but an industrial population—and tradesmen of course.

10127. I should like you, if you can, to give us the number of workmen who are on the boards?—Yes, I can give you that in the case of my own hospital.

10128. That, of course, is a general hospital?—Yes. With respect to the management and government of the various hospitals a very large share is confided to the workmen's representatives, and I also remark here in my proof, that it will be obvious that the large volume of their subscriptions is in itself a sufficient guarantee that they should have a fair representation, and that their wishes should be respected; but besides that, the workmen as a body manifest a very keen interest in the management of these hospitals, and have a great desire to come on to their governing bodies. The North Riding Infirmary, the largest of the group of general hospitals, may be taken as typical of these general hospitals with respect to the share in the management and government to which the workmen are admitted. The supreme authority is the Court of Governors, which comprises the general body of subscribers who contribute a sum of not less than two guineas a year. This court meets twice a year to receive the reports of the House Committee. That House Committee consists of twenty governors who are elected by the annual court, with the addition of one workmen's representative from every body of workmen subscribing not less than £20 a year.

10129. "From every body of workmen," what does that mean?—That is to say if the workmen of any firm subscribe £20 a year or more, they have the right of sending on to this committee of management direct, without any question from any other person, one of their representatives. The court elects twenty out of its number and the workmen send direct from their works on to the Managing Committee, one of their number.

10130. That is the Executive Committee, as it were?—Yes; that is the Executive Committee.

10131. That means that if the workmen send representatives from twenty bodies they are equal, and if they send more, the governors are in a minority?—Yes. It works out in this way. The workmen are entitled to send direct on to the committee of management no less than twenty-nine representatives elected by themselves, as against twenty elected by the governors, and the workmen's representatives also record their votes in choosing the twenty members appointed by the court. As further evidence of the encouragement given to the workmen to interest themselves in the hospital's management, the court usually elects as part of its quota of twenty, several working men. Of these twenty, at the present time five are workmen.

10132. So that your evidence is generally that with regard to both classes of hospitals the representation on the various boards of the workmen is substantial?—Yes, and they have the controlling power—I think I might go so far as to say that.

10133. I think I have only one further question to ask you I see in Paragraph 49 you give your view as to what should be done in case any change is made in the law You say a clause should be inserted in the new Bill to the effect "that bodies of workmen may arrange with their employers to collect from them in the form of deductions from wages such sums as they may from time to time authorise them to deduct" and so on. That means to say you want to continue in a legal form what is now being done in your district?—That is so; we should like a clause which would enableus to take these workmen's subscriptions in the form that we do now.

10134. You are quite clear that you would not wish to legalise directly or indirectly any form of compulsion with regard to these deductions. That is to say, that before they are made you want meetings of the men to be held, so that in some proper way their consent should be given?—Yes, certainly; and that has been done in all cases.

10135. In all your evidence, including this suggested clause, you would not in any way allow compulsion?—No, we do not wish for compulsion, in fact the wishes of the workmen are so well pronounced on this question that the workmen's representatives at our hospital have looked with some concern upon this matter, fearing any disturbance with the present arrangements.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10136. I think your memoranda are so full that I hardly have any questions to ask you. I take it that the workmen are quite in accord with the present system and that they do not take any exception to the method of levying contributions or deducting the amounts?—They do not. They are very much in favour of it. Since this matter has been discussed in our district, I have had many indications of how strongly the workmen feel that nothing should be done to alter the system.

10137. Am I to understand that you do not know even of a single exception in which a workman has refused to contribute?—I do not know of a single exception.

10138. It is perhaps hardly bearing on the inquiry of the Committee, but I am not quite clear as to what the advantages are to the workmen. With regard to the hospitals, I suppose if a man is compelled to remain in hospital he has a bed provided for him, but in the event of his being only partially injured, does the hospital provide the medical or surgical attendance?—They do not provide medical and surgical attendance outside, that is to say they do not send any of the medical staff of the hospital to attend workmen outside, but cases not sufficiently severe to come into the in-patient department receive attention at the hospital as outdoor patients.

10139. The subscriptions also include attendance for their wives and families?—Yes; if they have continuously subscribed, the hospital places an unlimited supply of letters of recommendation in the hands of the workmen, available for their own use and for the use of their wives and children. Of course a general subscriber has only one letter given to him.

10140. As a matter of fact, do you require a letter of recommendation from the firm before you allow a man to be an outdoor patient?—Yes, we have this form which should be filled up; it is a proof of the bonâ-fides of the case.

10141. The whole control of the fund seems to be entirely in the hands of a committee of management, as well as the whole method of levying and handing over the funds to the hospital?—That is so.

10142. You speak about one workmen's representative from every body of workmen subscribing not less than £20 a year. That means, I suppose, a minimum of £20 a year?—Yes, a minimum.

10143. As I said before, your memoranda are so full that I need not trouble you with any further questions.

By Mr. Walsh.

10144. You speak here of the medical staff. Is that the medical staff of the whole of the infirmaries and hospitals?—Each hospital has its own medical staff. That is the honorary staff who do the surgical and medical work in the hospitals—the visiting staff.

10145. What is the process of their appointment?—They are appointed by the Court of Governors in our case.

10146. Are they in private practice in addition to this?—Not necessarily. Of course, you may have some of the staff who are consultants; it is private practice certainly, outside the hospitals.

10147. I mean private practice in the sense of dealing with patients at their own homes. Do they take on appointments in addition at the various mines and works?—Yes, they do what is called by the men "club" work.

10148. Do they take on workmen's compensation practice for the employers?—That I could not say; I am not aware of any who have done so.

10149. They are allowed to take on, then, a general practice for the people in the district generally in addition to the medical work that they perform for the infirmaries?—Yes. I am afraid we would not get members on the staff unless they were allowed to pursue their practice outside.

10150. Would it be possible then under such circumstances, for these surgeons to be acting on behalf of the employers in workmen's compensation cases and yet find out the full facts of those men's cases in the infirmary while they were acting, so to speak, in an honorary capacity ?—I should not think that that would arise at all, because any question with respect to a workman's condition who is in receipt of compensation when under treatment in the hospital is either conveyed through the resident surgeon or myself. The honorary staff do not deal direct with any of the firms respecting the cases which are being treated.

10151. But there would be a visiting staff, so to speak ?—It is a visiting staff—the honorary staff is not a resident staff.

10152. Will the general practitioners of the district have access to the infirmaries ?—They have, provided the honorary staff do not object to it, but of course they have not the run of the place.

10153. Even the honorary staff are not confined to the ordinary private practice open to an ordinary practitioner ; it may engage in practice for the various works either for the employer or for the workmen ?—The hospital places no restriction upon its honorary officers ; it has never arisen.

10154. You say here that the supreme authority is the Court of Governors which comprises the general body of subscribers who contribute not less than two guineas annually ?—Yes.

10155. Does that mean that any person entirely unconnected with any of the mines or works might contribute two guineas and get himself made a governor ?—Yes, it is an inducement for a person to subscribe to us, and if he does so he has the privilege of being called a governor —if he gives us not less than two guineas a year.

10156. Would he thereupon become a governor, upon the payment of two guineas ?—Yes ; ipso facto he is a governor, if he says : "I will give you two guineas a year" —and does so.

10157. So that a body of workmen, say 1,000 in number, might only be able to send one governor for their contribution of one thousand times 4s. 4d.—is that the case ?—No, I think you have misunderstood me. I might mention here that if a body of workmen subscribe only £10 a year they can have a governor, but if they subscribe £20 a year they can send a direct representative on to the Executive Committee. The Court of Governors, has no authority to stop them, and by that means they can get a majority of the governing power elected at their meetings on the works—not at the hospital. Every year I send out a notice to the workmen and ask them to elect their own representative and we make a request to the firms to exhibit those notices and the men hold a meeting and communicate direct with the hospital who it is they have elected to represent them during the next year. The court never interferes in the matter.

10158. I suppose the governors are really the executive body, are they not ?—They are really the executive body in one sense, though they delegate nearly the whole of their duties to the House Committee.

10159. The ultimate control rests with them, I take it, at their half-yearly meetings ?—The rules define what the duties of the House Committee are, and the Court never interferes with this kind of work. The half yearly meetings are more formal meetings than anything else, chiefly for the purpose of receiving financial statements and reports.

Mr. C. Postgate. 25 April 1907.

10160. Is there a heavy rate of accident in the districts specially concerned with these hospitals and infirmaries ?—Yes, that is the chief reason why we have to maintain these hospitals. Some of them in the first group are solely for accidents, and in the general hospitals a large proportion are accidents, and very severe accidents too, I am sorry to say.

10161. Of course one feels very chary about dealing with these matters because we know the excellent work that has been performed by many of these hospitals, but you seem very desirous here that the method of deduction should be maintained ?—Yes, because it has taken between forty and fifty years to organise this in the way we have got it now, and it is working in the most perfectly smooth manner. Every workman to whom I have spoken is in favour of it, and I have spoken to a good many. I have also had the pleasure of speaking to the representative of the Cleveland Quarrymen and Miners' Association, Mr. Toyn, and his treasurer, who were down at my hospital this week, and when I told him I was coming up here to give this evidence, he said, "If anything happens that we cannot collect the money in this form we will hardly get anything." As he says, the men want to give it, but we must have an organised system of collection. You can quite understand that when the men are paid they want to get home, and they scatter in a thousand directions. I cannot conceive any other method by which you could collect this money.

10162. We will not specially traverse that. You are aware, I suppose, that a very great many hospitals, some of enormous size, have depended, and have depended solely upon voluntary contributions ?—Yes, that is so, I believe, very largely with the metropolitan hospitals, but it must be understood that in districts like Middlesbrough you have not got the people with the wealth that you have in some of the large cities. It is practically a working-class population, and I think one of the chief glories to the workmen is that they know they are paying such a large share—which they do not forget to tell us sometimes —towards the maintenance of the hospitals. I think these things act and re-act on each other. The fact that the working men do so much is a great incentive to other people to help, so that we always get what capital expenditure we now want without going to the workmen, I am pleased to say. I tell our friends that the workmen are doing very well in maintaining so far as they do the hospital without paying for capital expenditure. We have recently extended our buildings—and had between £2,000 and £3,000 spent on them by a large employer of labour, and the workmen will get the advantage of that.

10163. I suppose a good deal of your wealth—not exactly wealth, but a good deal of the contributions will come from the endowments of wealthy donors ?—No, we do not possess wealthy donors. I think we have only had about £9,000 in fifty years invested ; it only brings us in about £300 a year.

Mr. HARRY HARDWICK WOOLLEY, called ; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

10164. Whom do you come here to represent, Mr. Woolley ?—The Leicester and County Saturday Hospital Fund.

10165. Are you the secretary of it ?—I am.

10166. Is that a permanent appointment ?—Yes.

10167. From the proof you have put in, which is in the shape of a letter addressed to a Member of Parliament, you seem to be alarmed at any possibility of legislation making these deductions for hospital purposes illegal ?—Yes ; we were rather fearful about that matter.

10168. Would you kindly give the Committee what is the method now employed to get this money in from the workmen ?—Briefly my business consists in meeting the workpeople in the factories and the quarries and the mines and explaining to them our suggestion of contributing regularly to the fund, and also explaining its benefits, and after having decided to adopt the scheme of regular contributions the workpeople then have to decide the method of contributing, and, as I think I say in that communication, almost ninety per cent. of the 500 firms that are now contributing to the fund adopt the method which is of leas trouble from the workmen's point of view, that is to say, while I find everywhere the workpeople are willing and even anxious to contribute in this form and in this way, I do not find them willing to go to any amount of trouble over the matter, and prior to the meeting I get the employer's sanction to suggest the method of deduction from wages—I have to get that sanction from the employers first of all because it involves a little trouble in the counting house—and then I point out to the workpeople that there are two ways of collecting, one in the departments, where the trouble of collecting would be rather considerable, and especially in the case of little lapses perhaps, and then I suggest the other method that, if the workpeople are willing the employer is prepared to take the trouble off their shoulders by deducting it from the wages as they are made up, and I have not had the slightest difficulty in getting the workpeople to adopt that method.

10169. What are the actual means of ascertaining from the workpeople that they are willing to have these deductions made ?—By taking votes at the meetings. The meetings are held on the premises usually about leaving-off time, so that we have the whole of the employees present. Through the kindness of the employers we arrange for the meetings to be held on the premises generally as the people are leaving off work, and as the proposal is put before them they vote for or against it - first of all as to the principle of contributing and secondly as to the method of collecting.

10170. I see your scheme has only been in operation for some three years ?—Yes, roughly.

10171. Have you in that time had any experience, and if so what is the result, of men and women—because I suppose this includes men, women and girls ?—Yes.

10172. Of people who have voted against contributing ? —We have not had that experience at all.

10173. Then the votes have always been unanimous ?—Always—in every case.

10174. So that you have had no experience of anyone who has dissented in this matter ?—None at all.

10175. What would be your view with regard to a minority who did dissent ?—If we had such a case as that, of course, the employer would not consent. I am afraid my experience tells me that you would not get the employer to undertake the trouble of collecting unless he was assured that he could collect from the whole of them ; it would rather upset his accounts, and in that case we should have to rely upon the actual interest of the members appointed to collect in the various departments.

10176. What is the attitude of the employers generally —what would be their attitude with regard to the small minority of people who would not contribute ?—Generally they attach the condition that the vote must be unanimous before they decide to collect money. Generally speaking, that is so. I usually have a short conversation with the employers prior to the meeting, and most of them where the suggestion has cropped up in conversation would say, " Well, we must have a unanimous vote or I should not care to do it."

10177. How often do you renew this method of getting the consent of the workpeople ?—We do not have more than the first preliminary meeting, but we perpetuate the method by this system (handing document). I thought this would interest the Commission. When I get a resolution adopted I get cards of that kind printed with the resolution printed on and a sufficient number to hang in each room of the firm (handing another document).

10178. The first of these is " ——— ——— & Co., Hosiery Manufacturers, ——— ———. Saturday Hospital Fund. In aid of the Leicester Infirmary and Convalescent Home. At a meeting of the workers held on Monday, October 10th, 1904, the following resolution was unanimously adopted : ' That all employees of this firm shall pay as under :—those receiving 10s. and over, one penny per week, and all drawing less than 10s. one halfpenny per week to the above fund, the same to be collected by the firm.' " Then the next is " ——— ——— Railway Company, Passenger Staff, ——— Station. Saturday Hospital Fund in aid of the Leicester Infirmary and Convalescent Home," and so on. " It has been agreed that all employees of this department shall contribute as under :—those drawing 10s. and over, one penny per week, and all receiving less than 10s. one halfpenny per week to the above fund, the same to be collected in the pay office " ?—" The same to be collected by the firm ; " in that form you have there, means the method I have already indicated. Of course the paragraph relating to the halfpenny is put down owing to the large number of young people employed in the shoe and hosiery departments in our districts.

10179. I suppose you are against compulsion in this matter ?—Yes, I have known cases in which the employer has been so much struck with the utility of the scheme that he has said, " I do not think you need to have a meeting of my people because I will tell them to-morrow, Friday night, that I propose to make deductions from their wages for this purpose." I have always objected to that, and said, " If you do that you will get their backs up and they will not contribute at all, but if you will permit me to have a meeting of them, and ask their consent, I have no doubt they will consent to it."

10180. Have you collected money from firms where it has been compulsory in the way you have just described ? —It has never been initiated to my knowledge. In one or two large firms in Leicester the system has been in operation for many years, and I could not with any amount of accuracy say how it originated in the first instance, but in this case by adopting the method of having a card hung in each department as well as one in the lobby of the place every new person coming into the premises sees the conditions under which the operatives work.

10181. Having in your mind legislation, what would be your view of any deduction being made at the pure will of the employer in the way you have described ?—I should think it would be wrong ; I should not agree to compulsion in that form. The word " compulsion " has been applied to this system, but I put it in this way : if it is a condition that the workpeople impose upon themselves then you could scarcely designate it by that term.

10182. We will say that at the beginning of this year you got an unanimous resolution from some of your boot works. Then five or six years go over, and in that time, especially where many girls are employed, there are a number of fresh hands ?—Certainly.

10183. And it is possible that a different sort of feeling may have come over the people. What would you say if a minority—we will put it as a minority—refused or objected to these deductions being made ?—If I had that complaint from the factory I should visit the factory with the view of getting another meeting held, but I have not yet had that experience. I should see the employer, talk the thing over with the men, and get to know what the objections were, and try to get the difficulty explained away. I have had this experience in one place : the contributing in that way involves the giving of two benefits, it ensures that every subscriber is entitled to a recommendation for the infirmary ; he cannot be treated except in casualty first cases without a recommendation ; and in the other way he would always be entitled to a recommendation, and he or she would also be entitled to a ticket for a convalescent home involving a stay of three weeks. I have had this objection in one large shoe place : a man left his work and came to me with a doctor's certificate certifying that a change of air was necessary for him, which is one of our conditions, and I gave him a form and he went to the convalescent home the same week that he made the application to me. I heard later that he had been at work the same morning and the men at the shop objected that he was not convalescent, that he had gone straight from work to go to the home, and they objected that the time was too short, that there ought to have been a period of illness before he could be entitled to go to the home, and some of the men objected to pay and did not pay on that score. I went and explained the matter to the disaffected men, and while they seemed to deem the application of the individual to go to the home as being premature, yet after my explanation they decided to continue their payments.

10184. I am anxious to know whether, during the time those men objected for the reason you have given to having the money deducted, the money was deducted ?—It was not deducted.

10185. And the employer took no action against the men ?—Certainly not.

10186. He did not threaten them with dismissal ?—Oh, no.

10187. I gather it is the Leicester Infirmary and Convalescent Home to which all these contributions are devoted ?—The fund itself is called the Saturday Hospital Fund, and at the end of the year that fund is divided in the proportion of 70 per cent. to the Infirmary work and 30 per cent. to the Convalescent Home work.

10188. Which is connected with the Infirmary ?—It is not in that sense.

10189. They are really two separate institutions then ?—Yes.

10190. What would be the total of workmen's contributions contributed to each of those two institutions ?—It is about half of the total income of the infirmary.

10191. What about the Convalescent Home ?—30 per cent. of the money is all we have to maintain the Convalescent Home work with. The 70 per cent. to the Infirmary constitutes about one-half of the total income of the infirmary and the 30 per cent. which goes to the convalescent Home is the total fund we have for the Convalescent Home work.

10192. I am afraid I do not follow that. You are interested in both, are you not ?—I am the organising secretary of the Infirmary and I am also the secretary to the Convalescent Fund, and as I say, at the end of the year, that fund is divided in the proportion of 70 and 30 per cent. That 70 per cent. constitutes half of the total income of the Infirmary, the other half of the Infirmary Fund being made up by voluntary subscriptions.

10193. Do you apply the same method to the Convalescent Home ?—We have no settled income except this 30 per cent. from the Saturday Fund.

10194. The Convalescent Home is provided for entirely by the workmen, is it ?—Exactly.

10195. In what proportion are the workmen represented on the board or boards ?—We have four direct representatives out of thirty on the Infirmary, but we have in addition to that, what is called sectional representatives, that is to say that there are so many representatives of the county and so many representatives of the town from the places of worship mainly, and in addition to that each firm contributing a certain total amount each year would be entitled to nominate a governor who would have a vote at the quarterly meetings of the board. The actual workmens' representatives would be something like a fourth.

10196. Having regard to the 50 per cent. of the contributions which they contribute, do you consider that sufficient ?—Yes, I think so under our way of working. It has given great satisfaction. You must bear in mind that until this organisation was initiated we had no direct representation of the workmen on the board and so it is a decided improvement on the old condition of things 10197. Yes, but as the workmen contribute 50 per cent. of the total income, each year to the infirmary——?—Practically so.

10198. Do not you think that they are entitled to more than one quarter share in the management ?—If you come to speak of proportional representation, I suppose they ought to have one-half, but it has worked very well with us. It has just got beyond the nature of an experiment now with us, and we have had no complaints.

10199. If we are to make a case out for legalising deductions, all these things have to be looked at ?—Exactly 10200. I gather from your proof that you regard this collection by employers, if I may use that term, as being an important factor in the success of this hospital and Convalescent Home ?—I am afraid if the law prohibited the employer from making these deductions—that is what it is to put it plainly—that it would prove disastrous to the fund, not out of any sentiment on the part of the workpeople not to give, but because as I say, my general experience of the whole of the workpeople that I have addressed is that they will not themselves go to a deal of trouble in the matter. If we have to appoint a collector in each department to collect these moneys, the success or otherwise of the collection would depend absolutely on the interest the collector himself took in the collection, and in hosiery and boot factories, as in mines and quarries, the personnel of the staff is frequently changed and you might also have frequent changes of collectors. There is another reason why we should favour the present system of collecting, and that is that if a man makes an application for a recommendation for the Infirmary, or an application to go to the Home, we want to know from the firm whether he is a regular contributor or not. This system of collecting where the deductions are made and entered in the book of course ensures that everybody in the firm are contributing in that way and therefore one knows if it comes from a firm who have adopted that system, that the applicant is entitled to the benefit for which he asks.

10201. You mention here, and you will have to forgive my ignorance, some suggestion made by our friend Mr. Fenwick. Could you just refresh my mind, if not the Committee's mind, with exactly what that was ?—I have the cutting from the paper and perhaps you will look at it for yourself; it is there in print. (Handing document.)

10202. What does it amount to ?—I gather the miners have some such scheme as ours for their benevolent funds.

10203. This is miners' relief ?—Yes.

10204. Mr. Walsh knows all about that, I think ?—They suggested some alterations and we claimed some such privilege for our own system.

10205. I take it you do want this collection by the employers to be continued, on the ground that you get more money for the hospital by that means, not because the men are unwilling to contribute but on account of the difficulty of collecting except by an organised collection such as they have at the works ?—That is the position exactly.

10206. And you go so far as to say now after three years' experience that in the majority of cases, at the works, the men themselves prefer this system ?—Most decidedly.

10207. The Secretary has called my attention to one of these notices which is different from the other three. It says: "It has been agreed that all employees of this department shall contribute as under"—that is the ——— ——— Railway passenger staff at ——— Station. Is there any difference in substance here or is it only in form ?—The difference is that in the one case it was passed at a meeting on a certain date, and in the other case it says it has been agreed. In that case I did not meet the men; it was the officials of the passenger staff who held the meeting of the men themselves.

10208. What do you mean by the officials holding a meeting ?—It was the station-master in that case that I saw and he said: "If you like, I will see the men myself and find out whether they will adopt it." I agreed to that, and he did do so, and he wrote to me to say that most of the men had agreed, and we had those cards printed.

10209. This term that it had been agreed by the railway department is a little vague when it turns out that it has been done by the officials only ?—It is applicable only to the passenger staff as printed at the top of the card.

10210. In your desire to safeguard any oppression do you say that there ought to be actual meetings of this free character such as you have described to us at the various works ?—The difficulty is this, that I find a very small proportion of employers who prefer to do it themselves. I have just concluded an arrangement like that with an employer of 300 people—a boot factory in Leicester. They have been in the habit of paying one penny a fortnight and I got an application from one of his workpeople to go to the Home. I had to point out to the applicant that on his method of payment he was not entitled to go. I wrote to the employer pointing out the disability on the part of the workman, and he wrote saying he did not think it was worth while my having a meeting at the factory and that he would do it himself. I do not know how he did it, but I suppose he sent a sheet round as usual in these factories with a proposal at the top and got the men to sign, and the women too.

10211. In that case, I suppose, you have not quite got any real security against undue compulsion and pressure, have you ?—Not so much as in the case of the meetings I held myself. There is just this about it, the thing is becoming so general that you must make a good deal of allowance for public opinion on the matter, for instance, where workpeople are so frequently changing from one works to another you would probably have in that factory a good many men and women who had paid since the fund started, and they would not object in any way.

10212. I think you gave me a reply a short time ago that you did not know a case of a dissentient at any of those meetings ?—Not a single one.

10213. Therefore you would not know of any intimidation to those who did dissent, but in the case of an employer who does it himself without a public meeting, have you any experience of a person who objected there ?—I have never known or heard of a case of oppression in any way.

Mr. H. H. Woolley.

25 April 1907.

10214. You have never heard of a man or a woman who did not want this deduction made from their wages being dealt with in a summary fashion ?—Not a single case. I quite see your point, and in a number of cases I have induced the employer to allow me to hold the meeting without the presence of the employer or any of the foremen, because I have felt myself there was room for pressure on the part of the employer in those cases and I have not heard of a single case of tyranny or oppression in the matter.

10215. Do the employers of Leicester contribute fairly well to these institutions ?—Not as we think they ought to. In many cases the generous giving of the workmen in this way has resulted in the employer feeling that it is his moral duty to give also and he has given, and I have known of an employer saying after one of these meetings, " Can you estimate what the subscriptions will come to ? " And if it has come to £25 for instance, he has said, " I will make it up to £30." Or in another case, " I will contribute one quarter of what has been contributed by the workpeople." But in many cases, employers do not do their duty towards the infirmary.

10216. I am sorry to hear that. You have no endowments of any value, have you ?—We have a few investments.

10217. But have you any bequests that have been left to you of any size ?—We have not had any very large bequest in the history of the institution.

10218. Just one further question. What caused you to start this scheme ?—We are really copying what they are doing in Birmingham. The Birmingham Saturday Hospital Fund was instituted about thirty years ago.

10219. I do not want to trouble you with any historical résumé except so far as the workmen's side of it is concerned ?—It originated in the Trades Council.

10220. That is very interesting ?—The late Alderman Lennard who was at that time Mayor of Leicester, put forward this scheme to the council as to whether we could not put ourselves on the same footing as the working men of Birmingham who had a Convalescent Home of their own both for men and woman, and he suggested it and a meeting was held under the auspices of the Trades Council and a scheme was launched and a Committee, formed and I was appointed organising secretary and I proceeded right away to hold the meetings in the factories.

10221-10222. What I want to know is, what is the increase, if any, in the contributions of the workpeople of Leicester since you started your scheme ?—The largest amount contributed by working people in one year prior to the starting of the organisation was £4,086—in 1902 that was ; our organising meetings have continued each year since that time with the result that last year, 1906, the total was £10,931.

10223. In those years, a very substantial increase in the amount of contributions to the Infirmary and Convalescent Home has resulted ?—Certainly. We have doubled the income of the Infirmary from the workmen's point of view.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10224. With regard to the other 10 per cent. which you mentioned, may we take it that the employers exacted the subscription without being requested by the employees to do so, or was there no subscription obtained from the other 10 per cent ?—It is not quite like that. There are a few firms where they prefer the method of electing a collector for each department. They pay to the same resolution, but they prefer, instead of having the amount taken from their week's money, to appoint department collectors.

10225. Then these workmen are paid in full and hand back the subscription to the collectors ?—Yes. Sometimes the employers act as collectors.

10226. Do I understand that the employers pay the wages in full and that the workmen hand back the amount of the subscription to the appointed collector ?—Yes.

10227. With regard to representation upon the boards of the Infirmary and Convalescent Home I think you told the Chairman that the subscriptions were approximately equal to 50 per cent. and that the scale of representation was about 25 per cent. How are the workmen appointed to the Executive Board of the Infirmary and Convalescent Homes ?—In the case of the Infirmary the nominees of the workpeople are nominated from the Convalescent Home Committee. Every firm that contributes in our scheme is entitled to elect a representative to sit on that committee, and annually they appoint delegates to sit on the Infirmary Board. They also appoint a Home Committee. The representation from the factories is direct, and the contributing workpeople have actually the management of the Home.

10228. I think you said that there was some limitation as to the Convalescent Home having only 30 per cent. of the total fund ?—Yes. That is arranged between the Home Committee and the Infirmary, the latter taking 70 per cent., and the condition is that the sum does not go below £5,000 a year.

10229. How does that bear on the representation ?—Our total funds represent about 50 per cent. of the gross income of the Infirmary, and for that we get practically about a fourth of the working committee of the General Infirmary, and there are in addition certain direct representatives connected with various workmen's organisations, who are elected in other ways. The management of the Convalescent Home is entirely in the hands of direct representatives from the factories who are elected at the annual meeting of delegates.

10230. Do you know of any instance in which the workpeople have taken exception to the manner in which the subscriptions are levied ?—Not at all, unless you can call it an exception or objection where they prefer to have departmental collectors.

By Mr. Walsh.

10231. Was the area of your operations in 1902 practically the same as it is at present ?—Yes, with the exception of the natural growth in the number of manufactories in the district.

10232. I am now speaking about the area and not the number. Was the area practically the same as it is at present ?—Exactly the same, the town and the county.

10233. I assume that the membership has increased by more than double in that time ?—I don't think you have quite followed my reply. We had £4,086 from members in 1902, whereas from practically the same number of members we are now getting something like £10,000. The difference is not in the number of contributors so much, but more because formerly the collections were made annually, whereas the same people now contribute weekly and the total has consequently increased.

By Mr. Maddison.

10234. They contribute more per person ?—Yes. Young people used to contribute perhaps 3d. in the year and the older ones 6d., whereas they now perhaps pay respectively 2s. 2d. and 4s. 4d. in the year.

By Mr. Walsh.

10235. This seems to be a county infirmary ?—It is in the county town, and is really the hospital of the whole county.

10236. Is it in the county town of Leicester ?—Yes.

10237. How far are the collieries situated from it ?—Within from 10 to 16 miles. The nearest would perhaps be about 8 miles.

10238. That would give an average of from 10 to 12 miles ?—Yes, they are chiefly to the north.

10239. Have the miners ready access to the infirmary ?—Yes, fairly good. Many have to be brought by train or by the special ambulance conveyance which is kept at most of the works. In some districts there are local hospitals, but they are mainly first aid institutions. Any serious cases have to be brought into the larger hospital.

10240. Are the local hospitals relief stations for the county infirmary ?—Yes, in a sense, although they have no official connection with it. They are supported locally. In those cases we have adopted the same method of working and the same principle of representation, dividing local contributions between the town hospital and the smaller local hospital, so that we have not only increased our support materially for the large hospital but have also doubled our subscriptions, as to the one for instance at Hinckley.

10241. Is there less complaint of inaccessibility to the county hospital because the local hospitals largely meet local needs ?—We have no complaints on that score, except that in case of emergency it is felt to be a disadvantage to live far away. Some patients have to be brought perhaps 10 miles by road. The local hospital would not usually be able to treat very serious cases, because they have not the necessary facilities.

10242. May we take it that large numbers are bereft of real benefit because of the inaccessibility of the County Hospital ?—I do not think so.

10243. Have you had no complaints upon that score ?—I do not think so.

10244. You desire the Committee to take the same point of view in your case as Mr. Fenwick advised in the case of the Northumberland miners ?—Yes. I gather that he suggested that where contributions are deducted from wages for benevolent and other funds these deductions should be exempted from any proposed legislation.

10245. I understand Mr. Fenwick said that he hoped no change in the law would interfere with the custom observed in Northumberland of deducting from the amount of the wages of the miners such sums as were required for the purpose of supporting the Miners' Relief Fund. I think we had better not widen the expression used. He said these deductions were made at the request of the workpeople themselves and I think we had better confine ourselves to the expression used by Mr. Fenwick ?—You may be aware that the practice exists of making deductions for what is called the field club.

10246. I think we had better confine ourselves at present to your evidence on behalf of the county infirmary and convalescent home. You are no doubt aware that these miners' relief societies have to provide for a very high rate of accident and for cases of great disasters which it is impossible to deal with adequately by means of local help ?—Yes. I believe their liability is very large.

10247. The rate of mortality and disablement is by no means comparable in your case with the rate amongst miners' relief societies in the larger counties ?—That I could not say.

10248. You have not a very high rate of disablement ?—Not very high in the coalfields.

10249. In the other trades it would be even less ?—Yes.

10250. Is not the boot industry probably one of the trades that are most free from accident ?—It has a large proportion of accidents, but not usually very serious. The tendency of quicker machinery has been to increase the number of injuries by accident.

10251. But it would have a comparatively low disablement rate and perhaps hardly any death rate through accidents ?—Not in comparison with the collieries ; but many people in the boot and shoe trade are affected with phthisis in one form or another, said to be due to their conditions of work.

10252. Is that the kind of case that gets to the infirmary ?—These cases are often taken to the infirmary for the purposes of observation. We have some beds so occupied, not because much can be done for the patients perhaps in the way of cure, but to enable the doctors to keep the cases under observation. Our scheme embraces the colliers in our district as well as the boot operatives and the hosiery people. Instead of having only 3d. per week deducted for their field club, they pay 4d. per week, and 1d. of that goes to the hospital fund.

10253. So that, in addition to the field club benefit they may receive treatment at the county infirmary, in the event of obtaining access to it ?—Yes, and they would of course, be entitled in addition to the benefits of the convalescent home. We have two colliers there at present by virtue of their weekly payments.

10254. Where is the convalescent home ?—At Desford.

10255. Is that near the coalfield ?—Yes, not far distant. It is near to Coalville, on the southern margin of the coalfield. The colliery nearest to the Home is about three miles distant.

10256. Before you instituted the present system, what procedure existed to deal with accidents ?—Accidents are taken in at once and require no recommendation ; at all events the cases, if serious, are immediately admitted. But if a person formerly wanted to attend as an out-patient, he had to get a recommendation, and the difficulty lay in the fact that he had to go begging among subscribers for a recommendation, and was frequently, perhaps, unable to get one.

10257. Apart from that difficulty, was there any public complaint that these cases did not receive adequate treatment ?—Oh, no ; the difficulty was sometimes that of obtaining any treatment at all, owing to the want of recommendations. We altered that for the better.

10258. But many of the people could go to private surgeons ?—I think the Leicester people are fairly provident, and no doubt belonged in many cases to societies which would entitle them to medical treatment, but cases arose requiring special treatment that could only be given by experts at the hospital.

10259. You would hardly ask this Committee to accept the implication that it is for such cases requiring expert treatment that your system should be maintained ?—I do not suggest that. Many cases are recommended by the medical men themselves to the hospital.

10260. Was there ever any lapse on the part of the outside surgeons themselves in dealing with these patients before your system started ?—Not to my knowledge. I should not like to make any aspersion on the medical men.

By Mr. Maddison.

10261. I think we need not trouble the witness further

STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Sir GEORGE LIVESEY, was called; and Examined.

Sir G. Livesey.

1 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

10262. You are Chairman of the South Metropolitan Gas Company and the South Suburban Gas Company ?—I am.

10263. The same system to which you are going to refer is in operation in both companies ?—It is.

10264. So that we may take your evidence as to the South Metropolitan on the understanding that it will apply also to the South Suburban Company ?—Yes.

10265. Many gas companies have superannuation and other funds for their workmen ?—They have.

10266. What is your view with regard to these companies having such funds. Of course we know that the general object is one that is highly beneficial, but do you think that that object could be accomplished by voluntary association ?—I do not think so. I preface my remarks by saying that the basis of all these funds is purely voluntary; there is no compulsory contribution.

10267. Will you let me put it to you in this way. Do you think that the object which is beneficial, as you have already spoken to, could be accomplished so effectively by purely voluntary associations without aid or interposition on the part of the companies themselves ?—No, I do not. You must then fall back on the ordinary friendly societies.

10268. Will you give me your reason for saying so; we are rather anxious to get your views about that ?—In some cases they do have voluntary funds established by the companies and the men making their own subscriptions.

10269. Funds established by the workers ?—Yes, that is a very common thing in many places. The workers establish a fund and collect the subscriptions and work it themselves, but there is an immense difficulty in collecting the subscriptions, they have to go round and collect the subscriptions weekly, and they have found very great difficulty in doing it. Then again, wherever these funds are established and under the authority of the company, the company subsidises them to a very large extent, the company gives large subscriptions. If the matter were a purely voluntary thing worked by the men themselves a certain number of the men would belong to it but it could never be made very extensive. In fact our men have a fund called "The Widows and Orphans' Fund"; they collect pennies a week, but they have asked the company to collect the pennies for them.

10270. So that I may take it that your view is that the simplest and the easiest and almost the only practical way for collecting the subscriptions is to deduct from the wages ?—Yes, I think it is, with the men's authority and consent.

10271. Now the South Metropolitan Company has three such funds I believe. First of all there is the sick and burial fund; that was established in 1842 by your father ?—Yes, it was.

10272. He was secretary and manager ?—Yes.

10273. Then there is the superannuation fund ?—Yes, that was established by my father in 1855 and I was then in the service of the company.

10274. Have you been in touch with the working of both these funds ever since ?—Yes. I was, after my father's death in 1871, chief executive officer of the company, and in my early days I paid the wages and stopped the money from the wages; so I have been in practical touch with the working all along.

10275. Then there is the accident fund, which was established in 1897 ?—It was.

10276. And brought under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897 ?—Yes.

10277. Have the subscriptions to these funds always been collected by deductions ?—Yes.

10278. On the pay day ?—Always.

10279. And with the consent of the men ?—With the consent of the men.

10280. You say in your précis "no man is required as a condition of employment to join any of the funds ?"—That is so.

10281. Have you had any employees of either the South Metropolitan or the South Suburban Company who did not belong to those funds ?—Yes, a considerable number do not belong to the superannuation fund; there are very few regular men who are not on the sick and burial fund, and practically none who are not on the accident fund. All are on the accident fund, but a considerable percentage do not subscribe to the superannuation fund.

10282. We will take it that you are wanting one or more workmen and they apply to you for employment; is the question put to them whether they are willing to join these funds or not ?—No, except to the accident fund; that is put to them, but the others are not when we are taking on men: nothing is said to applicants about the sick fund or the superannuation fund for a little time; when they have been in the service of the company for say a year they very often themselves apply to be put on the funds.

10283. They hear about the matter from their mates ?—They know of it and they think that being put on the fund is a sort of guarantee of constant employment. We do not put a man on the fund if there is a probability that he will not stay in our service; and we do not know when we first engage a man whether he is going to stay or not.

10284. You say here that "all the funds are subsidised by the company and their stability guaranteed" ?—Yes. I have the figures here for 1905; this evidence was prepared last year. Here are the sheets showing the men's subscriptions and the company's contribution.

10285. There are one or two questions I should like to ask you about this. What is the number of men employed in the South Metropolitan Company ?—You may take it at 5,000 in round figures regularly employed, increased by about 1,000 in the winter.

10286. What is the number in the South Suburban Company ?—About 500 employed regularly and another 100 employed in the winter.

10287. The figures you are now going to recite to us with regard to the contributions are applicable to the South Metropolitan ?—That is so.

10288. Now we want as a Committee to know what is the average wage, we do not bind you to anything specific, but will you give us a general idea ?—I took it out for the Labour Commission, and I then found that the average wage was 33s. It is about 34s. to 35s. now. The stokers wages swell it somewhat.

10289. They are very highly paid of course ?—They are highly paid. The average is not less than 33s. for all the workmen.

10290. Will you tell me now in a general way, taking each of these funds that you have mentioned, what the deductions from the wages amount to. First of all in the case of the sick and burial fund, what would be the deduction from the wage for that ?—Threepence per week.

10291. Then the superannuation fund ?—Threepence or sixpence, which they like.

10292. According to the rate of superannuation ?—Yes.

10293. Then the accident fund ?—Twopence a month —½d. a week.

10294. So that on the average there is a deduction of 6½d. ?—Yes.

10296. That will be for comparative purposes as convenient for us; it is on the same system ?—Yes. To the sick and burial fund the payment in 1905 by the workmen amounted to £4,977 18s. 9d., and there were 5,083 men.

10297. What were the contributions by the company ?—£1,894 15s. 4d. I ought to explain there that this fund is guaranteed by the company. We make no accumulations. The company makes up the deficiency, whatever it may be, year by year.

10298. Does the £1,894 15s. 4d. for that year represent a fair average ?—Yes, I think so. The total fund was £6,872 14s. 1d., and the total expenditure was the same.

10299. Then the superannuation fund ?—There were 4,100 men who subscribed in that year against 5,083 to the sick fund. The men's subscriptions amounted to £2,834 6s. 3d. The company contributed £3,441 3s. That is in two amounts—the ordinary contribution of 3d. a week and an extra contribution of a 1d. per week. Then there was more than that; on the investment we gave another £836; so that you may put the Company's total at £4,277 17s.

10300. Upon what principle is the contribution by the company fixed ?—The principle on which we have been going for some years is this. When the fund first started and for a number of years the company's contribution was not on any regular system; it was so much a year voted by the shareholders. We then adopted the plan of making the company's contribution equal to the men's—3d. a week from the men and an equal amount from the company. We then had the fund valued, and found that it was not solvent, and the company increased their subscription by another 1d. a week, and they also guaranteed that the capital of the fund, the accumulated amount, should be invested to pay 5 per cent. It is invested in the company's own stock, which only pays a little over 4 per cent., and the company therefore add a certain amount each year to the accumulations in order to realise 5 per cent. on the balance or yearly surplus.

10301. So that it works out as a practical guarantee in that case ?—Yes, we have guaranteed it; the shareholders have guaranteed it.

10302. Is it invested in preference stock ?—No, it is ordinary stock. The men in 1905 paid £2,834, and the company's contribution was £4,277.

10303. Then the accident fund ?—The men's contribution to the accident fund in 1905 was £547 16s.; 6,051 men contributed that; that counts the men engaged for short terms. The company's contribution was rather more than double that, £1,187 6s. The system we go on there is this: the men pay 2d. a month and we pay 4d. but we pay the 4d. on the maximum number of men employed in each quarter, so it brings up the company's contribution to rather more than double. There is £200 or £300 over every year.

10304. I think, having got that general figure, we will ask you to hand in those documents. (Witness handed in the papers.) We will now run over your observations with regard to each fund. Will you just give us your views ?—My father entered the service of the company in 1839, and in those days there were very few sick funds for the workmen. The great friendly societies were, I believe, established, but they were in a small way. I suppose it occurred to him that it would be a good thing to start a sick fund for the workmen. He called them together and explained it, and they agreed that it would be a right and proper thing and they would be glad to start it.

10305. Then the superannuation fund ?—That came in 1855. The same idea, I suppose, occurred to my father; he made a similar proposition to the men.

10306. I want to ask you about the practice. It is the practice of many gas companies to give pensions, is it not, to worn-out workmen ?—Yes; that is one reason why we started this fund. We considered when a workman is worn out in the service of the company that we could not very well turn him off to the workhouse, and the directors have given a pension according to circumstances; but there is nothing definite about it, it is a matter of caprice and accident and therefore uunsatisfactory.

10307. That is in cases where there is no sick fund ?—Yes; one reason why this fund was started was to put the pensions on a definite basis. There is another reason; when men have been a long time in the service the company does not like to turn them away; they have got past work, but they are kept on at the ordinary wages or at reduced wages when they cannot earn the money. I believe it is better for the company and to some extent a saving for them to have a fund by which they can superannuate the men.

10308. Claimed as a right at a certain date ?—Yes.

10309. Now as to the accident fund. That was, of course, in advance of but it was still on the lines of the Workmen's Compensation Act ?—It was on the lines but it was in advance of it. I was chairman then, and took the view that in regard to accidents an industry was bound to provide for the killed and wounded amongst its workers, just as it would for machinery injured by accident; and on that ground we started this accident fund. We were giving pay for accidents before, but in an uncertain way. It was left to the discretion of the engineer of the station whether it was a proper thing to give to or not.

10310. What about the Act; did you think your scheme better than simple dependence on the Act of Parliament ?—Infinitely better.

10311. Will you just explain that ?—I think one of the best evidences is that our men are unanimously in favour of it.

10312. Do you think it helps to prevent accidents too ?—I am sure it does. At the starting of this fund in 1898 our accidents amounted to sixty-nine per 1,000, or 6·91 per cent. By means of our accident fund bringing us into touch with the men and getting their co-operation for the purpose of preventing accidents, it has come down year by year, and last year they were thirty-four per 1,000, 3·4 per cent. That is counting every accident that incapacitates a man for three days; the number is reduced by one-half.

10313. And you attribute that, at least to some extent, to the voluntary association of the men in this fund ?—We have something unique, I think I may say, in connection with our accident fund. Every accident, however trifling, that puts a man on the fund, if he has only injured his finger and is disabled for more than two days, is inquired into by a jury of workmen, twelve workmen. A list of the whole number of workmen is drawn up, and they are taken in rotation. Thereby every man is brought on a jury in turn, and has to consider the question of accidents. The main questions are, whose fault was it, and what could be done to prevent such an accident in the future. The system secures the active co-operation of the workmen.

Sir G. Livesey.

1 May 1907.

10314. And trains jurymen ?—Yes, and they do very well indeed.

10315. The next thing I was rather anxious about is this. How does the system satisfy your men ; I mean the system of having funds subsidised by the company and worked by the system of deductions from wages ; is that satisfactory to the men ?—I think I might say thoroughly. As to the accident fund, I might say this: the contracting out scheme was granted to us for five years, from 1898 to 1903. In 1903 we had to go for a renewal. The chief registrar required certain forms to be gone through, and the opinion of the men taken, and there was absolute unanimity—not a single objection or suggestion was made. There is one man who never has joined and I believe only one.

10316. Does that apply to other funds also ?—The other funds are permanent. The accident fund is subject to renewal from time to time under the Act.

10317. But so far as regards the approval of the men, is there complete satisfaction with regard to the other funds ? —Yes, only, as I have said, they do not all belong to the funds.

10318. Now suppose they wish to get off those funds, to sever their association with them, how can they do it ?—They can do it by simply saying that they wish to.

10319. What happens as to any contribution they have made ?—In the case of the superannuation fund the money is returned, two-thirds of what they have paid after they have subscribed ten years, which entitles them to benefit in case of incapacity or infirmary. Subscriptions for less than ten years are returned in full. In the sick and burial fund, seeing that there is no accumulation, and the man's contribution is not sufficient to cover his risk for the year, and in the same way with the accident fund, nothing can be returned.

10320. Do you think that any better way could be found to induce working men to save ?—No, none so good ; I go so far as that.

10321. Or to insure themselves in those particulars ?—No. We have started in connection with our co-partnership or profit-sharing arrangement a system of savings. There is a very great difficulty in getting workmen, particularly in London—I do not suppose it is quite so in Lancashire—but in London there is great difficulty in getting workmen to save. The Post Office Savings Bank is good so far as it goes, but the man has to go week by week taking something from his wages and going to the post office and depositing it there. Well, he will absolutely mean to do it, and he does it for a few weeks, but then there comes some contingency, and he stops it for a week and the whole thing is over. The same thing I found was tried in the Army ; I was on the committee for the employment of ex-soldiers last year, and I there learnt that they had tried to induce soldiers to save by having a clerk to take the money when they were paid; that did not answer ; then they tried a post office clerk, but that did not answer. In this system of ours the workman goes to the pay clerk and says : "I want an order for saving." I have the form of notice here. (Handing in a paper.) It says : "South Metropolitan Gas Company Workmen's Savings Bank ; date (blank) ; to the pay clerk (blank) Station ; I hereby request you to stop (blank) weekly from my wages from (blank) and to place same to my account with the company until further notice." Then this comes to the men : "Profit sharing ; number (blank) South Metropolitan Gas Company Workmen's Savings Bank ; date (blank). At the request of (blank) I undertake to stop (blank) weekly from his wages from (blank) and to place same to his account with the company until further notice." A man says he would like to save 2s. or 1s. or 6d. a week or whatever it may be ; if he had to give that money to the pay clerk before his mates he would not do it regularly and constantly, but under this system he has given the order, and the money is deducted without anyone knowing anything about it and without any bother. It is available at any time on his giving a week's notice. The men save in this way for their holidays or to buy clothes or for Christmas time and so on, and they save also permanently. £12,000 a year is about the amount that is stopped from the men under these orders.

10322. Then the situation of the company is that it is a sort of reserve banker subject to withdrawal on demand ? —Yes. Half of this £12,000 a year is permanently saved—perhaps more ; I am speaking generally.

10323. There is a reference here to the reservists in the recent Boer War ; you say that about 140 of the company's workmen were called out as reservists ?—Yes.

10324. The men started a fund to provide for their wives and families ?—Yes.

10325. Did they ask the company to collect weekly subscriptions ?—Yes, 1d. a week ; then that was not enough and they increased it to 2d., and the company gave an equal amount.

10326. And a large sum was raised in that way ?—Yes.

10327. Who were the contributors ?—All the men.

10328. So that that was really a sort of patriotic and charitable thing for the men to do ?—Yes. When anything of that sort is initiated by the men it is a very common thing for all of them to fall in ; a man's mates say to him, "won't you join," and he does not like to refuse ; but any individual might say to the pay clerk, "I object to this stoppage," and the pay clerk would say, "Very well," and pay him the full money. Altogether over £3,000 was raised by the men, and an equal amount was contributed by the company.

10329. Now on the general question of policy. Suppose Parliament were to resolve that all such deductions were illegal. What in your view would be the result ?—I do not know. First of all I think, we should try to see if there was not some means of getting a coach and six through the Act of Parliament. The company and the workmen might try to get through it in that way.

10330. You quite understand that what we are wishing to get is your opinion as to what would be the result upon the men ?—We will suppose that such an Act was passed and that it was acquiesced in, and these funds were put an end to, I think the men would very greatly regret it.

10331. Of course it would be a saving to the company ? —Yes, a considerable saving to the company.

10332. But you think it would be a serious loss to the men ?—A very serious loss. It would be a saving to the company, but it would be a loss in another way.

10333. Will you just explain that ?—All these funds that bring us into intimate association with our workmen tend to promote a friendly feeling and to promote what we are most anxious for, the principle of co-partnership, to make us all work together. Abolish these funds and everything of the kind, and you come to this ; that there is so many hours work and so much pay, and that is all between employer and the employed.

10334. And you deprecate such a situation ?—Yes.

10335. I may take it that your view is most antagonistic to any such legislation as has been suggested ?—It is, and I think the men would go with me ; I feel sure they would. Speaking of the accident fund, what the men say is this ; this has been said to me repeatedly. "We like the accident fund because we know exactly what we are to get ; there is no trouble, no doubt, no difficulty about it. If we were under the Act, all sorts of questions might arise and we might have to go to law ; but here we are perfectly certain."

10336. May I take it that in your view, although it would be a financial saving to the company to begin with, you think, that on general grounds it would ultimately be a loss to the company in harmony of relations, and probably in the habits of the men not being so good ? —I think so, though I am bound to tell you this : there are a great many companies that have sick funds, but as to superannuation funds, there are very few companies that have them. I daresay you could count them on the fingers of your two hands.

10337. Then with regard to the men, you think it would be highly unsatisfactory to abolish this system ?—I think so. On these sheets there is a list of the pensioners and so on.

10338. Finally I want to ask you about the subject of audit. How is that arranged ?—There are two auditors appointed.

10339. By whom are they appointed ?—Henry Day is a clerk appointed by the directors, and J. A. Butcher is appointed by the workmen. Butcher happens to be one of the workman directors, and he is also on the co-partnership committee. The co-partnership committee is a large committee of eighteen workmen and eighteen representatives of the company. The eighteen workmen elected the auditor, and they selected one of their own number whom they had made director.

10340. What do you mean by a workman director ?—Since 1898 we have had two workmen on our board as directors, they are elected by ballot by their fellow-workmen, who are shareholders. Our workmen have a very large amount invested in stock of the company, and they have elected two of these men, and the curious thing is this. One retires every year. I expected when the thing was started that the men would say: "Well, you had an innings, let somebody else have a turn at it," but they were satisfied with those whom they elected at first, and they have re-elected them every time. Their seats are as safe as mine is. It is the same with the South Suburban Gas Company.

By Mrs. Tennant.

10341. You say a man on applying for work is asked if he is ready to join certain funds, but not all funds ?—Only the accident fund.

10342. As between two men, one expressing his readiness to join and the other not doing so, do you choose the man who expresses his willingness to join ?—We have never had a man object to joining.

10343. Then all your workmen are members of the accident fund ?—All are members of the accident fund; we have never had an objection from any man to paying 2d. a month. If a man at the pay table were to say, "I object to pay this 2d," which is collected once a month, the pay clerk would return him the money, and he would continue in our service; all we should say is: "As you will not come in under the accident fund, we shall treat you under the Act"; that is all. But none of the men do that. I recollect that I am wrong in saying that every man belongs to the accident fund. There is one man who from the first objected to the accident fund, and one only. He is a slot meter collector. He is with us now, and he has never been under the accident fund.

10344. Is it within the jurisdiction of the jury to refuse compensation on the ground of any fault of the workman involved in the accident ?—I am sorry that I have not the rules here; I will send them to you. The jury have to say whose fault the accident was, but to refuse compensation would have to come before the co-partnership committee, it would not be done on the recommendation of the jury. The jury could recommend it, but it would not be enforced except with the approval of the Committee. We never have refused compensation to anybody.

10345. Then, agreeing upon the principle of compensation, may the jury reduce the amount without reference to the co-partnership committee ?—Yes, the jury do to this extent. We have Class A and Class B. Class A are minor accidents that disable a man for less than a fortnight. When one of these smaller accidents comes before the jury, the jury say, "This is in Class A." Sometimes what is thought to be a minor accident turns out to be a serious one, and then if the man does not recover in the fortnight he is put on into Class B. Class A gets 12s. a week and Class B gets 18s. a week from the start, and the jury say whether an accident is in Class A or Class B.

10346. In the case of the sick and burial fund I understand that the men's contributions are not sufficient to cover the risk for a year ?—No.

10347. And therefore they do not draw out any money when they leave, even although they have not come upon the fund ?—No; but they have had what is called a contingent benefit, they would have had a right to come on the fund if they had been sick.

Sir G. Livesey.

10348. Have you compared the contributions and the benefits under that scheme with those in the big friendly societies ?—The contributions are much less in proportion to the benefits. I will put it in this way; the benefits are much higher in proportion to the contributions.

10349. Have you compared the men's opportunity of withdrawing from a friendly society with their opportunity of withdrawing from your sick and burial fund ?—No, I do not know what the conditions are of withdrawing from friendly societies. In our sick and burial fund they cannot withdraw, or rather I should say they can withdraw, but they get nothing returned.

10350. Then to turn to the last fund you spoke of, the savings fund. I gather that the men's contributions last year were over £12,000 ?—Yes.

10351. That is about £1,000 a month ?—About that.

10352. Is that money invested in the company or in other funds ?—It is not invested in any stock. It is in the company's hands and they allow 3 per cent. interest on it. We did allow 4 per cent., but we reduced it to 3 per cent., because we found numbers of men preferred leaving their money in the company's hands instead of investing it, because they would only get about 4½ per cent. on the investment, and we want them to invest their money in the stock, so that they may become shareholders, partners.

10353. You say that a number of them use that as a permanent investment ?—They save their money in that way, and then when it has accumulated they go to the secretary and say, "I should like to take up so much stock," and so permanently invest it.

10354. May we take it that about £12,000 passes through your hands, roughly speaking, every year, or was last year an exceptional year ?—That was in the year 1905. In 1906, the actual amount was £11,637. I know it is about £12,000 a year.

10355. Then have you any idea how much of that £12,000 would be passed over to investment in your stock ?—At least half; I am sure of that. I have inquired at different times; it is more than half that is permanently saved and invested.

10356. Is that handed over at the end of the year, or is it handed over during the progress of the year ?—That which is withdrawn is withdrawn at all times. For instance, the men will be subscribing all through perhaps, and when their holidays come they will make a draw. We give a week's holiday with a fortnight's pay, but they like to have a little extra and in the holiday time, and they draw a pound or two, many of them. Investments in stock are made at any time.

10357. We may take it that there is about half invested in stock ?—At least half.

10358. In addition to the £6,000 invested, about £6,000 passes through your hands in the year ?—Yes. I should like to say that there is one thing I omitted. Our men have started on their own account certain benevolent funds. It started with the Saturday Hospital Fund, 1d. a week. They found such a difficulty in collecting these pennies that at last they asked the company to undertake this collection. Then all the men practically agreed to pay 1d. a week, and last year £1,035 was stopped in that way. Altogether in the year 1906, £20,886 was stopped from wages.

10359. (By the Chairman.) That would be out of a wages bill of how much ?—The wages bill is getting on for half a million—£450,000. What with the sick and burial fund, the superannuation fund, and these various benevolent funds, there is a total stoppage of £20,886, in the year—1906.

By Mr. Walsh.

10360. Speaking of the accident fund, is the ½d. per week the same contribution as before the Workmen's Compensation Act which came into force in 1898 ?—Yes, but we knew what was coming and we established that fund.

Sir G. Livesey.

10361. The contribution of the men has never varied from that time until this ?—No, it is 2d. a month.

10362. Did I understand you to say that the yearly amount paid left a balance of about £200 a year ?—Yes, we brought into account £137 in January, 1905, and there was £476 balance at the end, that is £339 ; last year it was about £300. I was wrong in saying £200, it is about £300. At first there was no balance, at first the contributions were not enough, but by the reduction in the number of accidents the total contribution of 1½d. a week became more than sufficient to pay all charges and pensions to widows.

10363. May we take it that the sum of £547 paid by the men plus the £1,187 contributed by the employers, making altogether £1,700, roughly left a balance at the end of the year of £300 ?—Yes.

10364. That is to say £1,400 was devoted to the payment of accident pay and pensions to widows ?—Yes.

10365. Out of that £1,400 then £547 was contributed by the men ?—Yes, £566 was paid in pensions in that year, 1905.

10367. But is that pension increased in amount because of contributions paid by the deceased himself to the pension fund ?—Yes. The chief registrar has certified that the benefits derived under this scheme are better than the man would get under the Act.

10368. That is to say a double payment is being made for the pension granted to the widow ; there has been a payment made by the people who were living to the pension fund, and there has been a payment made to the accident fund as well ?—The superannuation fund is for the men only, the widows of men do not come into that ; that is quite an independent thing. As to the accident fund, instead of providing a lump sum for the widow of a man who has lost his life she gets a pension of not less than 10s. a week for life.

10369. I only wish to see whether the point of view that I have got at the moment is quite a correct one. Taking it at £1,700 as being contributed by the employers and the workmen, there has been a balance left over at the year's end of £300 ?—That is so.

10370. Which seems to show that about £1,400 has been required to pay the full charges upon the fund ?—That is so, including the pensions to the widows.

10371. And £547 of that £1,400 had been contributed by the men themselves ?—Yes.

10372. That is well over one-third of the total amount required ?—It is. If it exceeds what is required we shall reduce it. We do not want to accumulate a balance in the accident fund. The company guarantees it, and if we find after several years that the contributions are more than is necessary to meet the expenditure we shall reduce the contributions.

10373. Of course you are aware that the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act are supposed to be given to the men without any special obligation upon them to pay to any fund ?—Quite so.

10374. And that every scheme must be equivalent in benefit to what they would receive under the Act ?—Quite so. We have the certificate of the chief registrar as to that. You will remember that this is a scheme under the old Act, not under the new Act. We shall renew it this year. We have satisfied the chief registrar that the benefits are greater than the men would have received under the Act. For instance half the accidents would have got nothing under the Act, because they did not incapacitate for a fortnight. Out of 200 accidents that happened last year 100 of them would have got nothing at all.

10375. Under the scheme every accident is paid for ?—Every accident. If an accident disables a man for one or two days he gets nothing, but if he is disabled for three days he gets pay for the three days ; it is not payment after three days, but it is payment for the whole time that he is disabled.

10376. In answer to his Lordship I understood you to say that you gave a surrender value in the case of men from the superannuation fund wishing to benefit themselves by securing better employment for instance, or in some other way thinking to improve themselves—you gave them two-thirds of the amount they have contributed ?—Yes, without interest. This is what happens ; if you give too much there are a number of men who will say : "Well, I will leave and draw out this money." I dare say you know that they do that sometimes ; but returning two-thirds is as much as we feel is fair and right, and the men are quite satisfied with it. The two-thirds is returned after ten years subscriptions when men become entitled to benefit if incapacitated. Under ten years the whole is returned on leaving.

10377. You say here at the end of your precis that you employ about 1,000 people for various periods of less than a year ?—Yes.

10378. Are these people who may be looked upon as casual hands, so to speak ?—Well, we make much more gas in the winter than in the summer, and we want extra men. They come for various periods up to, say, eight months.

10379. Do you take payments to the accident fund from them ?—Yes, but they can object to it if they like.

10380. Do you also take payments from them for the superannuation fund ?—No. They can contribute to the sick and burial fund if they like, but not to the superannuation fund. The superannuation fund is only for the men who are permanently employed and who mean to remain there as far as we know and as far as they know.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

10381. Have you any system of fines in connection with your company ?—We have none.

10382. I mean fines for coming late or anything else ?—No. If a man comes late he is sometimes sent back till after breakfast ; it is equivalent to a fine but it is not done by a fine.

10383. That is your way of keeping discipline ?—Yes. If a man repeatedly comes late he is discharged ; we say, "You are not a man that we can depend upon and you must go."

10384. You consider that a better system, although perhaps a more severe system, than fining ?—In regard to yard men it works very well. In regard to lamplighters we did have a system of fines which has actually died out. If a man came late in lighting or in putting out his lamps there would be a fine, perhaps 6d. or 1s. The last time I inquired about it I was told that that had fallen out of use.

10385. Should you consider it fair to say that there should be neither fines nor suspensions, nor any other mode of punishment for coming late and so forth ?—Take the case of a hammerman to a blacksmith ; the blacksmith is at his post at the proper time and the hammerman does not come in ; or again, take the case of a fitter and a fitter's mate ; it is quite common for men to work in couples, and if one man is not there he stops the work of the other.

10386. Then, I take it you would not consider it quite fair either to the employer or in many cases to the man's fellow workman, that a man should be allowed practically to please himself as to what time he should come in, without any punishment ?—It is bad for everybody. But I think I may say that we are very particular in the selection of our foremen to select men who are sympathetic, and we say, "You are not to be harsh with the men, you must give them warning ;" if a man is in the habit of coming late the foreman will say, "Now this won't do ; unless you improve, I shall have to put you off," or something like that.

10387. Of course by having the system you have described in your works, you do to some extent, I presume, get the pick of the workmen ?—Take this one test. The Christmas week is the critical time. Of late years we have had reports from our engineers from each station ; not a man has been absent during Christmas week without leave. In one large place there was one man absent, out of 1,000 perhaps, during Christmas week.

10388. I presume things have been improving in that respect as years have gone on; you are much better now than you were twenty years ago?—Or ten years ago. In fact the improvement is due, I believe, very largely to our co-partnership system. We have made the men partners, shareholders, with a representation on the board, and they are feeling an interest in the company and in their work, and their devotion to the company is something totally new.

10389. That has been very much led up to, I take it, by your savings fund scheme?—The main thing has been our co-partnership idea. Dependent upon the price of gas, we give the men a certain bonus on their salaries and wages. Half is payable in cash, though we persuade them not to withdraw it, and the other is invested in stock, and they now have invested in the company over £300,000.

10390. That is independent of the stock that they buy though having saved?—Well, it is all put in together, but the great bulk of that £300,000 has been through the co-partnership. Of course, that has nothing to do with the Truck Act. Whatever troubles we have, we are all extremely happy in regard to our workmen.

10391. I should like to put this to you having regard to the large experience you have had. Would you consider it a fair thing that Parliament should say that there shall be no fines at all for any offences either for coming late or anything else?—I think it would be a disadvantage to the workmen themselves. Employers would say then, "Very well, if you prohibit all these fines, then we will simply discharge the men."

By Mr. Maddison.

10392. Upon that point, have you had any experience of fines in your works?—Only with regard to lamplighters and that is very small.

10393. So that in your case even before the co-partnership scheme—with which, as you know, I thoroughly agree—you did not resort to fines in your works?—You cannot do so in the case of a blacksmith or fitter or bricklayer or stoker. It was done in the case of our lamplighters. If a lamplighter was half an hour late it brought discredit with the authorities, who complained that the streets were not lighted at the proper time, and we did adopt a system of fining in that respect.

10394. But still, amongst all these men there are numerous things that they must be doing. For instance, we have had it in evidence here that people have been fined so much for being five minutes late; we have had evidence as to fines of that kind?—We never adopt fines for that kind of thing. We have done this: if a man is a quarter of an hour late (I forget whether it is exactly a quarter of an hour) he is told: "You come in after breakfast." That is in effect a fine.

10395. That is a fine if you like to put it in that way; it is a suspension; you say that to the man, "Our time for starting is so-and-so; you have not come in at that time; the next time for starting is so-and-so, and you must come in then." But then you would not fall back upon that punishment for long; if that man came late several times you would get rid of him?—Exactly.

10396. So that fines are only a very small factor in discipline?—Exactly. I do not know that fines do much good.

10397. You would rather think, from your long experience, that any shop that depends in any degree upon fines for discipline is badly managed?—Well, I do not like to condemn other people, but I should say this——

10398. You might give your view without any regard to other people?—I should not be inclined to adopt a system of fines.

10399. You would not say that if Parliament in its wisdom thought fines were an illegal deduction and not a necessary thing the discipline of a workshop would suffer materially?—I think it could be managed in other ways. If a man is negligent or indifferent about keeping time we send him back. Then sometimes it goes to this extent; we purposely frighten him; we do not dismiss him, but we make him think he is dismissed; we say, "We do not want you;" then, if he comes back again in two or three days, we say, "Very well, we will give you another chance. you can come on again," and that kind of thing.

10400. Without labouring it any further I should like to ask you this. You would say, I think, that a system which resulted in constant and continued fines could not be good—I mean continued fines to the same person?—If there are constant and continued fines, it means that the fining system is a failure.

10401. And it also means that discipline is not being promoted by the that method?—Exactly.

10402. Now with respect to this paragraph:—"No man is required as a condition of employment to join any of these funds." In reply to Mrs. Tennant you said that you had never had a man who, when he was being put on had declined to join the accident fund?—No, there is only this slot meter collector; he was in our service when the fund started.

10403. Supposing there were a number of men who did refuse, should you put them on?—I think we should; but then it would come to this; if we were shortening hands we should say, "You are not the men who trust us, you will go first," that is what it would come to.

10404. So it would inevitably make some little difference between the men who did join the fund and the men who did not?—The difference would be inevitable but the difficulty has never arisen.

10405. When a man applies for employment are all these funds put before him, the sick and burial fund, the superannuation fund, and the accident fund?—No, only the accident fund. We do not think of the superannuation fund and the sick and burial fund until a man has been with us sufficiently long to feel that he is in our regular employment.

10406. So that the only fund that he is asked to join is the accident fund?—That is all. When a man has been sufficiently long with us to feel that he is in regular employment, either the man himself applies to be put in the sick burial fund and the superannuation fund, or the manager at the station asks him if he would like to go upon those funds, and generally of course he is very glad to get on.

10407. I suppose when the chief registrar certifies that your scheme is at least equal to the benefits that the men would derive under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the contributions of the men are taken into account?—I should say the chief registrar would very much fail in his duty if he did not take that into account. That will have to be gone into of course within the next few months.

10408. And there is a much more liberal Act now. Is there any likelihood that their contributions will be increased?—No, the men's contributions will not be increased; the company's contributions may be.

10409. You say: "Other deductions from wages are also made at the request of the men." What other deductions do you refer to?—The reservists' relief fund for example. Here is a list of the deductions made in 1905 for the men's benevolent funds, and here is a list of their subscriptions. You will see Hospital Saturday Fund, £174, and so on.

10410. I think you said that £300,000 was invested in your stock?—More.

10411. In that way making the men partners. I suppose that would largely be the gas stokers?—Yes, all the employees.

10412. It was suggested to you by Sir Frederick that you got a better class of men, but you do not recruit them from a better quarter than the ordinary gas worker?—It makes the men better; these are the men who, if we had not this system, would have been the ordinary run of workmen.

10413. As you have mentioned this co-partnership system, may I ask you if the co-partnership is based on a lower wage rate than the average workman gets in London?—No, it is the other way. A few years ago we could not get sufficient stokers, the demand did not equal the supply. This company and the South Suburban Company, the two co-partnership companies, voluntarily raised the wages of stokers, and that forced all the other companies to follow.

10414. Then your wage rate and your hours are well up to the average, and the co-partnership is in addition to that?—Quite so.

Sir G. Livesey.

By Mr. Delevingne.

10415. Are the profits to the men from the co-partnership looked upon as investment ?—It is an addition to wages. It is an extension of the sliding scale that applies to gas companies. We are allowed to pay a slightly increased dividend if we reduce the price of gas. When I introduced that in 1875 I said it will not be complete unless the employees join in it. As we reduce the price of gas there is an increased percentage paid to the men on their wages and salaries. That is invested half of it under the rules and nearly the other half voluntarily. Upon that they get the dividends. The dividends are now coming to more than £10,000 a year which are distributed amongst the men. I do not know what they do with them. Many of them put them into the savings account and re-invest; that is their own choice.

10416. It is not in the nature of a bonus, but it is really part of the man's wages to which he is entitled ?—No, he is not entitled to it. We pay the full wages apart from that and independent of that; we pay the full current rate of wages. This is a system of profit sharing if you like to call it so ; it is a system whereby the worker is made a partner.

10417. I understand that, but I was not quite clear as to whether the man's share in the profits comes to him because he has invested money in the company, or simply accrues to him apart from that as part of his wages ?—It does not come to him because he has invested money in the company. He gets the dividend on his investment just as you and I might do. The other is a percentage on his wages dependent on the price of gas, ¾ per cent. on salaries and wages for every 1d. that the price of gas is reduced.

10418. In other words it is an addition ?—It is an addition distinctly.

10419. Are the company entitled to withhold that addition if they like ?—Yes, we could put an end to it if we liked but we have nearly burnt our boats and destroyed our bridges.

10420. Could you withhold it in an individual case ?—We do it in this way. All our men who are entitled to this profit sharing work under an agreement. If a man shows a want of interest in his work or negligence or indifference he is then told, "Now, unless you improve you will not have your agreement renewed," and sometimes we stop the agreement, but the bonus that has accrued he gets.

10421. As long as the agreement runs he gets his bonus ?—As longs as the agreement runs he gets his bonus but we may say to a man, "You are not working up to the spirit of co-partnership, and we shall refuse to renew your agreement until you improve." We have had reward. Vast numbers of men who were indifferent our have been improved in every way by our saying, "You will not have your agreement renewed. You may come to see me in three months time," says the manager ; he comes, and the manager says, "Well you have shown improvement in your work, I will renew your agreement for another three months, or six months, or a year."

10422. I understand that as long as the agreement is in force a man is entitled to the bonus ?—Yes.

10423. It is not a bonus in the ordinary sense which is entirely dependent on the will of the employer to give or withhold ?—We have a provision in our rules for putting an end to it. If we should find that this system is not a success or not answering its purpose, we are then to give a year's notice to the men that unless there is an improvement we shall, at the expiration of another year put an end to it.

10424. As a system generally ?—Yes.

By Mr. Yarrow.

10425. If I understand right, this bonus is in excess of the prevailing rate of wages in London ?—Yes.

10426. Your object is to offer the men some inducement to do their best ?—We want to alter their status. It is our plan for making the workmen owners of property.

10427. Suppose a man has got shares in your company owing to this profit sharing, he leaves ; does he return the shares ?—They are just in the same position as an ordinary shareholder.

10428. They are not bound are they to buy them back ?—No ; we say we will buy them back at the price of the day, but they can take them anywhere. They usually sell through the company, almost invariably when they sell.

10429. If I understand a-right the subscriptions from the men to these funds are deducted from their wages on the Saturday ?—On the Friday, the pay day.

10430. If I understood you rightly you said that if the men got their full wages and then someone said : "Now come and give me your subscriptions" there would be a difficulty in getting subscriptions ?—Yes.

10431. Therefore I take it that this arrangement of deducting subscriptions from the wages is really for the benefit of the men entirely ?—If the men have their own funds they will come to us and ask us to make these deductions. They say : "We cannot collect, will you collect for us ? "

10432. I think you also said that your impression was that if the funds are collected in this way your company would have more confidence in the arrangement and would probably subscribe more liberally to the funds, than if the funds were collected after the wages were paid. That is your impression ?—It is a fact.

MR. JOHN SWEENEY, called ; and Examined.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

1 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

10433. Your place of business is in a town called Burton Port ?—I have a place of business in Burton Port and also in a place called Dungloe.

10434. Will you tell us where Burton Port is ?—Burton Port is the seaport for our district. It is in the north-west of Donegal.

10435. And the other one, Dungloe, is that in the County of Donegal ?—Yes.

10436. How far is it from Burton Port ?—Four miles.

10437. Your firm is John Sweeney & Son ?—Yes.

10438. What are your businesses or what is your combined business ?—We are general dealers ; we do in grocery, drapery, and liquors.

10439. Are you publicans ?—Yes.

10440. Do you deal in machine and hand-made hosiery manufactures ?—Hand mades are out of the market now, the machine mades have taken their place. We have about twenty or thirty machines going.

10441. Where are these machines placed ?—We are conducting this business from Dungloe, we have no business in the machinery trade at Burton Port at all.

10442. But where are the machines actually at work ?—They are at work in the girls' houses—those girls who get qualified.

10443. In the cottages of the natives ?—Yes.

10444. By girls you mean that they may be old women ?—Oh, no, it is young girls ; they qualify with us first. We employ a teacher to teach them and when they are qualified we give them a machine.

10445. Are there other people who have these combined businesses like yourself in your part of the country ?—Not in my part of the country, but in Glenties there are such ; that is sixteen miles from us, more inland.

10446. Is that in Donegal also ?—Yes.

10447. The same combination as you have just described ?—Well, they may differ a little ; they may not be so general as we are.

10448. Yours, of course, is a licensed house ?—Yes ; they are held in separate departments, of course. But they are licensed in both places.

10449. Then, over other parts of the west, and north west of Ireland are there other establishments of a similar character ?—Yes, in the town of Glenties and in Gweedore.

10450. In any other places ?—No, not that I know of. Ardara is the centre of the homespun industry, but they do not touch the machines.

10451. Ardara, you say, is the centre of the homespun industry ?—Yes.

10452. Can you give me any other place ?—Ardara and Carrick are the two great centres; they are in the centre of where the homespuns are manufactured in the cottages of the weavers. In that district they raise the sheep, clip it, dye it natural colours, and they have looms in their homes, hand looms, and manufacture it into what they call Donegal homespun tweed. That is a big industry. They have very fine mountains for feeding the sheep, and Ardara and Carrick are the two big centres for disposing of the stuff.

10453. Now is there any centre for the hand-made hosiery ?—Hand-made hosiery is a thing of the past.

10454. What do you mean by the past ?—I mean to say that the machine work has supplemented the hand work, and they are not able to compete with the machine made goods.

10455. But what I want to get at is, when did the supersession take place in point of time ?—It has been going gradually out of the market for the last six years.

10456. Was there any of the hand-made industry left in the later nineties—say 1897, 1898, 1899 ? — There is only one firm that touches it now in our district.

10457. I am not asking about now; I am asking about 1897, 1898, 1899 ?—Oh, yes, we had it then.

10458. There was a great deal of hand-made hosiery at that time ?—Yes.

10459. Now you were, unfortunately, connected with a couple of law cases ?—I was. I fought them on their merits, but I was not guilty of what I was accused of; it was not proven against me.

10460. There is a case of Squire v. Sweeney, reported in the Irish Weekly Law Reports on January 30th, 1900 ? —Yes.

10461. That case had reference to your declining to give Miss Squire, an inspector, access to your premises ?—That was certainly untrue.

10462. But that was the allegation ?—Yes. It was for obstruction. That was one of the cases, and the other was a case under the Truck Acts for paying in kind instead of in cash.

10463. Now with reference to the first allegation, I see that the case says that it was proved that when Miss Squire and Miss Deane entered the premises in order to secure information, in consequence of the conduct of you, the defendant, no inquiries were made, and there was no opportunity of disclosing the object of the visit, and that the name of the occupier of the building appeared both as John Sweeney and as John Sweeney & Son. Then the description of the premises was proved, and the following is said to have been proved: that she, Miss Squire, went to you and asked you if she could have speech with you; that you turned and led the way into your private office, and when you got there she asked you if she was addressing Mr. John Sweeney; you made no reply, but ordered her in a violent manner to leave, and turned her towards the door; she had no opportunity to produce her warrant and was not asked for it. Now the case, unfortunately, records that all these things were proved ?—Yes, they were proved by Miss Squire, but they were untrue. I disproved them, and there was no conviction.

10464. Is it your statement that what was said in the case to be proved, was not the case ?—Will you allow me to explain, I cannot answer you by "yes" or "no."

10465. By all means ?—I will tell you the circumstances. The first time they tried to get a case against us they took it against me personally. I was only one member of the firm. There was a technical point raised by my solicitors that it should have been taken against the firm, as there were two members of the firm, that is myself and my brother: John Sweeney and Morris Sweeney; I am John. On that point the case was dismissed. The circumstances as regards Miss Squire entering my premises were these. A policeman came to me in my cloth shop, my drapery shop; the office was at the extreme end of the shop. He said, "Mr. Sweeney, I want a word with you." He walked up without me leading the way; he led the way inside my office. When I got inside my office I turned to speak to him and asked him what his business was, and to my surprise I found two ladies on my right when I turned round. These were the two ladies, Miss Squire and Miss Deane. They commenced in a tone that did not lead certainly to a civil answer. "Are you Mr. John Sweeney ?" in that tone, "Yes," I said, "that is my name." Then they put me some more queries regarding the firm and the members of the firm, and I did not consider from the arrogant tone they took up that I was going to make them any wiser, and that they might find out for themselves. I said, "Ladies, this is my private office, it is no use to discuss it any further; if you will just kindly leave."

10466. You requested them to leave ?—Yes, but not in the tone and the way they described it at the petty sessions; that is quite misleading. I turned to the policeman, then, and said to him, "Might I ask, sir, what is your business here ?"

10467. You asked the officer of the law ?—I asked the constable, the common constable. I said, "Might I ask what is your business here ?" He said, "Mr. Sweeney, what we want to know from you is who are the members who compose this firm." "Might I ask you," I said, "What is it your business." I am giving you the facts clearly and straightly. I said, "If you would all kindly leave here I have some business to do now." They would not leave, and instead of handling them rudely as they say, I walked out of shop by a side door, and I went straight over to where the courts were sitting; the petty session was not over, and I went straight over to the bench of magistrates and I complained of these ladies' conduct and this constable's conduct in coming into my private office and putting impertinent questions in a most impertinent manner; I took umbrage at it. I got no satisfaction. The magistrates were not sitting. I asked the district inspector of police, I said, "Get your man to come out of that; I have ordered him out and they would not leave."

10468. Now you have given us without any interruption from the committee your account of the affair ?—That is my account of the affair and I am willing to prove it every word.

10469. May I put two questions to you with regard to it. In the first place I want to have from you if it is true that the defendant (you) molested and abused Miss Squire and Miss Deane ?—It is perfectly untrue. I can swear it on my solemn oath that I never put a finger near them.

10470. These things were sworn to by them before the justices, and appear in the account of the proceedings ?—Yes.

10471. Were you examined ?—I was. I would be very sorry to touch a lady, I am sure, or to molest her in any way, or to rudely handle her.

10472. Did you give any evidence to the contrary effect ?—I did.

10473. Can you give any explanation why your evidence to that effect is not recorded ?—I cannot say.

10474. Or why, in the account of what was proved at the proceedings, there is no notice taken of your version of the story ?—Perhaps it was a criminal offence; they would not record the evidence there. All I say is this, I have given the same evidence at the Dungloe Petty Sessions in the same words nearly as I have given them to you; I have neither taken from them nor put to them.

10475. You are aware that the case on appeal was reversed ?—It was not on appeal; it was a case stated.

10476. You are quite clear about it; on a case stated; I will withdraw the words on appeal; I will take it in your language on a case stated the decision was reversed, was it not ?—It was, the case for the Crown or for the Home Office was conducted by the Crown Solicitor, Mr. Mackay.

10477. Now that has reference to your action in not giving access to the premises; that is what the case was about. The next action is reported on June 27th, 1900, and that had reference to paying a worker otherwise than in the current coin of the realm ?—Yes.

10478. What was the name of the worker there ?—Mary MacGeoghan.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

1 May 1907.

10479. Can you tell me what Mary MacGeoghan did for you ; what was her work ?—Her work was a fancy kind of sock.

10480. Was she a hand worker ?—Yes, but an old person ; she was the mother of a large family of girls.

10481. Then she wrought fancy socks, did she not ?—No, she did not, but her family did.

10482. You are quite right, she got out the wool from you ?—She got out the wool from us and she would take it home to the girls and they knitted it.

10483. Any remuneration she got with reference to that wool to be given to her ?—Yes.

10484. It was a technical point in the case on which the decision turned, but it would have been possible for her to fulfil her contract with you by the other members of the family doing the work ?—Yes, such is the case always, and particularly at this work, because she could not do it.

10485. Now let me see how the thing wrought. You supplied her with wool ?—Yes.

10486. Then she took that wool to her own house or cabin or wherever she lived ?—Yes.

10487. Where was that ?—It is in the Lettermacward ; it is about six miles from Dungloe.

10488. Then she, or her family, to be accurate, wrought this into fancy socks ?—She could not do it ; it is a class of work that only the young people of our district can do.

10489. Then her family did it ?—Her family did it, I presume.

10490. They wrought this into fancy socks ?—Yes.

10491. Is it not what is known in Scotland as half hose ?—Yes, but a particular kind of half hose, and a mixture of several colours of yarn in it.

10492. Then in regard to that ; when the wool was exhausted what did Mary MacGeoghan do with the product ?—That is when she had it knitted up ?

10493. Yes ?—The usual thing is to bring it back to us ; we examine it and see that it is perfectly knitted ; whether they have dropped stitches, or anything like that, that it is in accordance with the pattern, and then we pay them 4s. 6d. a dozen for it.

10494. Will you kindly attend to what I am putting to you, because we are anxious to get the real facts from you. When the wool is knitted up she brings it back to your shop ?—Not to my shop ; it is to a department that I have for taking out and giving in hosiery.

10495. She brings it to your department ; then having brought it to your department it is submitted to your judgment, is it, or to the judgment of some person employed by you ?—A person employed by me.

10496. Now, suppose it is all right, suppose there is no fault to be found with it, that the work is perfect. Will you tell me what is the scale of payment that Mary MacGeoghan was going to get ?—You mean for this particular class of sock that we are referring to ?

10497. I am referring to Mary MacGeoghan ?—Quite so. When she brought it back and it was examined and found correct she got 4s. 6d. a dozen for it.

10498. That is 4½d. a pair ?—Yes.

10499. What is the proper transaction with regard to these socks. Do you sell them ?—I sell them to the wholesale trade.

10500. Where is that established ?—In Glasgow, in Belfast, and in London here, and in Manchester.

10501. Then the wholesale trade, I fancy, sells it to the retailer ?—Yes.

10502. And the retailer sells it to the consumer like ourselves ?—Yes.

10503. Now I am not going to press you for details as to how much sticks to the fingers of all these people—quite legitimately—but I wish to ask you what the like of us going into a shop say in London would pay for that very thing that Mary MacGeoghan made ?—You would pay, I suppose, about 1s. 3d., it is all according to the market. You have a good market here in London and they would ask big prices according to the rent they pay and the expenses of the business.

10504. Your evidence is that if we went into the shop we would get these socks for 1s. 3d. a pair ?—Yes, perhaps 1s.

10505. I would take such a shop as the Army and Navy Stores, where I fancy there would be the ordinary market rate and nothing above. You say you would get this kind of fancy socks at 1s. a pair ?—Yes. I really cannot tell you exactly what they sell them at.

10506. If you cannot tell us who would ?—I cannot speak for the retailer ; I can only speak for myself in selling to the wholesale trade.

10507. But I mean these are good merchantable articles ?—Yes. They are a coarse kind of yarn. What these are made for is for working men when they go out on Sundays in their best clothes and in low boots and these gaudy looking socks.

10508. Whether they are gaudy looking or not I suppose the labour would be just the same ?—It would.

10509. The gaudiness would not affect the market price ?—Well, there is a good deal in blending the colours of course.

10510. We have now got the article into our possession, so to speak, and traced it. Now that is on the assumption that it is perfect. Suppose when Mary MacGeoghan had brought it to you it was not perfect, instead of her getting 4s. 6d. a dozen what would she have got ?—She would have got nothing.

10511. How do you work out your remedy against her ?—The remedy was to give her back the socks and say that she must bring them again properly done.

10512. How would she do that ?—If there was a dropped stitch she would only have to rip it a little bit and get to where the hole was and fix it up. We do not go in for fining ; we say bring the stuff all right and we will pay for it, it is no use to us imperfect ; take it back and make it perfect and we will pay for it.

10513. That is your system ?—That is our system.

10514. Might that happen more than once in regard to a dozen pairs of socks ?—Yes, but we take this remedy ; that if we find people committing the same fault on many occasions we do not give them any yarn ; we say they are careless and we keep the yarn from them for the time in order to give them a lesson as it were.

10515. How much would Mary MacGeoghan make working with the aid of her family for a week in that way ?—It depends on the number in the family she had, it depends on the number of workers.

10516. Could you give us any light on this ; how many pairs would a single hand-knitter, a single person hand knitting, work in a week ?—In plain work—I am not talking of this fancy work.

10517. But it is the fancy work I am asking about. I am still sticking to Mary MacGeoghan ?—I would say that it would take twelve days.

10518. Twelve days for a dozen ?—For one individual, one girl, to make this dozen of fancy work.

10519. In other words she would make a pair of socks in a day ?—Yes, about that.

10520. That would be 4½d. a day ?—Yes.

10521. Now as the result of the labour of thus putting the wool into fancy socks, she comes and gets from you what amount ? We shall say that she has a couple of dozen, would she have so much at a time ?—No, they generally give out a dozen at a time of these fancy goods.

10522. Then there is 4s. 6d. due to her ?—Yes.

10523. How is that paid, in money ?—It is paid in cash.

10524. Has that always been your practice ?—That has always been our practice.

10525. Is there any foundation for the suggestion that these people are your customers ?—They are our customers ; in this particular instance. Mary MacGeoghan has been a customer of mine for the last twenty-five years.

10526. How does she spend her 4s. 6d. ?—She buys whatever she requires with it, groceries or cloth, or whatever she requires ; it is a matter for herself altogether.

10527. There was some reference made to the tea that was sold to these poor people. What is the price of your tea ?—The general price of our tea is 2s. a pound; it was mentioned at 3s. 6d. a pound by Miss Squire.

10528. Have you any tea above 2s. a pound ?—The highest tea that we keep is 2s. 4d. a pound; that is extra good quality, but the general tea that is sold is 2s. per pound.

10529. Now let me ask you this. Is it a familiar practice with you what you have described—that the money given in wages is spent upon the premises of the merchant ?—It depends upon whether the parties require the goods or not.

10530. But take Mary MacGeoghan, who, I fancy, is not in very affluent circumstances at 4½d. a day; take her as an old customer herself. Have you any doubt that before she left your premises she would spend the 4s. 6d. ?—Very likely; if she required any cash for other purposes it would not be always groceries or drapery that they required; they might want to pay the county cess, or they might want to make up the rent or something of that kind.

10531. Is there any other place across the way where she could go and spend the money ?—Oh yes, there are several other houses in town.

10532. You would not have liked it if she had gone to these other places ?—Well, this is the position of affairs. We expect that if we give employment to the poor people in the country—and we have been the great supporters of giving it there—the work in itself, the business in itself, is not one that would pay a very large profit as I can show you here by my returns, and we expect that our own customers will buy from us but it is not a compulsory thing. I am getting now from 200 to 400 dozens per week turned out off my machines——

10533. Would you kindly confine yourself to the question of the hand-made article; we will come to the machine-made article afterwards. I am asking you as to an old customer, and you were going on excellently with your evidence. Just tell me what you naturally expect in such a case ?—We should naturally expect—any man of business would expect—that if you have a shop supplying everything that is required, and very old customers of yours, they will give you the preference; not of necessity. At any time they can go elsewhere. They generally do come to us, and in a great many instances they run accounts with us, but we never keep their work in lieu of the account, because they may want the money for immediate needs, and they get it freely. How they make up their account is this. We are a very poor country, and land is not able to support the people. They migrate away to Scotland, and near the sea they earn something in the fishing industry in the winter time. These are things that supplement the earnings of the farm, and they pay their accounts and their rents with those things.

10534. I think you are agreed that with regard to these earnings which, of course, you see are small, they really are needed for the actual pressing wants of the household ?—Oh, of course they are and except we gave them credit they would not be in the country at all.

10535. These people who work in that way, or did work under the old system in that way, were people who were not only old customers but in ordinary cases were people who had a running account with you ?—Yes, they dealt from year to year with me

10536. I take it that if these people, being in your debt, having a running account and being old customers, were to use their wages or their reward in buying in a market which was not your own shop you would have a sense of grievance would you not ?—Oh, no, I would not have a sense of grievance; I am doing it every day in the week now and I had done it then.

10537. You would still have held that they were quite free to leave you ?—Quite free.

10538. Would you have given them work all the same ?—Certainly. At the time the hand-knitting was in full swing I could not get enough work done to fulfil my requirements.

10539. So that you gave them a good deal of freedom ?—Certainly. I believe in every person being paid for their work.

10540. Was it your experience that they did go to other traders ?—Yes, often.

10541. Why was that; were they not satisfied with what they got from you ?—Some of them might not be customers of mine.

10542. But I am still wanting you to confine your attention to the case I have put, that there are small wages earned by people who are in your debt and who have a running account and who are old customers of yours ?—They certainly would not leave me and go to another shop.

10543. You never knew of a case of that kind ?—Well, if I had not what suited them they might go somewhere else.

10544. Can you recall such a case ?—It is very hard for me to answer a question like that; it is bringing it to so close a point that I cannot understand it. You are asking me a question whether I have known ever of a case of people going and leaving money which I have handed to them, in another shop. I say I have, but you are confining me now to people who are dealing with me all that time. I say naturally they would not pass me.

10545. I should have thought not ?—No, certainly not.

10546. Now these were fancy socks; we will start on another class of goods. Take it that the socks were to be plain socks ?—The plain socks we pay 1s. 6d. to 2s. a dozen for—for the knitting of them.

10547. That is 1½d. or 2d. a pair ?—Yes.

10549. Suppose you have all wool of a good quality, would they get more for the working of them ?—Yes. For hand-knitting of a good quality of wool we pay at the rate of 4s. 6d. to 5s. a dozen socks.

10550. If of a good quality ?—Yes.

10551. That is plain socks ?—Yes. Then for plain of a coarser quality we pay as low as 1s. 6d. to 2s. because it is more easily made.

10552. Still is it a good article ?—It is a good article but it is coarse; it is what a working man would use and the other would be what I would like to wear myself.

10553. The cost would be 1s. 6d. to 2s., I think you said ?—Yes.

10554. That is what you would call a working man's sock ?—Yes.

10555. What does he get that for in a shop ?—He pays I think 6d. or 9d. or 1s.; that is the retailer's price for the socks. Of course, the 6d. sock would be a very poor article.

10556. Therefore the usual price, if although coarse it was a good article, would be 1s. ?—Yes.

10557. That is what I cannot quite make out on your figures; because you told me before that the fancy sock for which you pay 4s. 6d. a dozen was also retailed in those places for the same figure that you have just mentioned, namely, 1s. ?—The wool that is in this sock that I referred to last may be, and is perhaps, a great deal better than what is in the fancy sock.

10558. So that in getting the fancy you lose in the quality; is that your view ?—Yes, and it is a larger sock—there is more yarn in it.

10559. I am still puzzled about the prices. Take the fancy sock of a good yarn ?—Well, they are not knitted in a very fine quality.

10560. Take a good fancy sock such as I suppose you and I would wear with comfort ?—That is not this sock; this is a coarse yarn.

10561. So that the real article that we want to get at is the consumption of the workman of this country, which is a plain, coarse, but yet good quality of sock, for which he pays 1s. ?—Yes.

10562. Now you sent word to this Committee that you would like the evidence exhibited to you of Miss Squire and Miss Deane and I understand that our Secretary has forwarded that evidence to you ?—He has very kindly done so.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

10563. We should be glad to know what you have to say with regard to it ?—I have exception to take to a great deal of what is stated by Miss Squire.

10564. We shall be glad to hear what you have to say upon it ?—In Q. 1678 she refers to the Irish trade. She says : "In Ireland I visited chiefly in Donegal and in County Down. In Donegal the workers take wool out from the shops in the towns to their own cabins and knit it up into socks and stockings ; they then take back the socks and stockings to the shop from which they got the wool, and in all cases they received as payment tea and other groceries. No money passed at all, and they could not obtain money. In all cases they were exceedingly poor. The men were away harvesting in Scotland in the summer time, and the women chiefly supported themselves in this way by knitting. When they brought in their work they took away the packet of tea with them." Now I consider that very prejudiced evidence and not a fact.

10565. As I understand, the parts in it that you controvert are these : that in all cases they receive as payment tea and other groceries ?—Yes, tea especially is mentioned.

10566. You say that is false evidence ?—I say it is not a fact.

10567. Then that "no money passed at all and they could not obtain money," you controvert that also ?—I do.

10568. You have given us your account of how they get the money and spend it in the place of business ?—They spend it openly ; they can spend the money with us if they wish, or they can take it home for some other purpose.

10569. But you have told us what you would expect in the ordinary case ?—That is if they require the goods.

10570. I think you have also told us that that class of people do require the goods, because they have actually running accounts for other departments ?—Yes, but the money that they receive is not held against their credit.

10571. Can you give any reason how this kind of statement should have entered into anybody's head ?—I give it as a reason that Miss Squire was wrongly informed ; that Miss Squire went round there as a lady philanthropist and went among the people and sympathised with them and asked them to knit goods for her, and, of course, the people being poor, and she requiring to make up a case, and sympathising with them, got them to say more than they would say in the ordinary way. She took one side of the story.

10572. Either she has been speaking falsely or those who informed her have been speaking falsely ?—I do not say that she is speaking falsely, but I say the evidence that is here is false and misleading ; how she acquired her information is in the way I say ; people told her certain things, and then when they are put to it to try to make a case it cannot be done. I fought the thing on its merits, and the case was dismissed four times.

10573. It must be false in some way ; either it is false on her part or false on the part of the people who gave her the information ?—I cannot say about that ; I do not know where she got her information.

10574. Did you ever hear of a case in your experience of people being paid in goods ?—Did I ever hear of it ?

10575. Yes ?—Well, I do not know of it personally ; I may have heard of it.

10576. I know you do not know of it personally, because you have explained your system to us very clearly. My question to you is, did you ever hear of it ?—I did hear of it, because there were some parties who were taken up at the same time as I was, and Miss Squire charged them with it, and they pleaded guilty. I was the only exception ; I fought the case, I fought it on its merits.

10577. In what district was that ?—In the same district as I am.

10578. In Donegal ?—Near Dungloe and in Dungloe.

10579. So that in those cases they pleaded guilty to the very thing that she is speaking of ?—They pleaded guilty to it.

10580. You have contradicted her evidence, but it appears now that you are only contradicting her so far as your own business is concerned—you are quite right to do so ?—Certainly, and I fought it for eight months ; I am sure that I was right.

10581. What I want from you is this. When you said that the evidence of these officials is false, or, at any rate, that Miss Squire's evidence is false and misleading, all that it comes to apparently is that it does not apply to your transactions ?—My idea is that the parties who pleaded guilty, pleaded guilty for one reason, that they could not bear the law expenses that they would be put to if they fought it.

10582. In fact, that it was a false plea also ?—I do not know that.

10583. It must either have been a true one or a false one ?—They might have done as I did, fought it out, but for the expense. It cost me a couple of hundred pounds.

10584. Or they may have done as you would not do, that is to say they might have stated what was not the case ?—Well, I was asked by Miss Squire——

10585. If you will allow me I will put it to you very plainly. I will ask you whether the evidence that was given by Miss Squire, which you have described as false and misleading, is in your view nothing more than this, that your statement is that that evidence does not apply to your business ?—I say it does not apply to my business ; I cannot account for other people's.

10586. Exactly ; and so far, instead of being false and misleading, it may be perfectly true and accurate as applying to other people ?—It may and it may not.

10587. Then I suggest to you that it is a dangerous thing that you should come before a Committee nominated by the Home Secretary and denounce any other witness as giving false and misleading evidence ?—I did not say so 10588. But you have said so, it is down on the notes ?—I did not make it personally against Miss Squire, I qualified it purposely.

10589. Well, sir, I can do no more with you than call your attention to Miss Squire's evidence and ask you to comment upon that passage or those passages which you describe as false and misleading. Shall we arrange the matter in this way : that all you meant was that they did not apply to you ?—I say so still, and I thought that I made myself perfectly clear.

10590. Now have you any other comment to make upon Miss Squire's evidence ?—Yes. At Question 1680 you will see this, "Do you remember roughly what that would come to." The answer is, "The rate would be 1s. 6d. a dozen in some cases and 9d. or 10d. a dozen pairs in other cases." Now no such price as 9d. or 10d per dozen was ever paid in our district.

10591. By you ?—By any person ; I can speak with confidence on that.

10592. Do you know personally about the other cases ?—I do. I mean to say that I know the prices paid and I know that there never was 9d. or 10d. paid. The lowest price was 1s. 6d.

10593. So far as your own case is concerned, you admit the 1s. 6d. ?—I am talking now of the 9d. and 10d.

10594. But I am talking of the 1s. 6d. ?—I admit the 1s. 6d. as the lowest price, the highest price was up to 4s. 6d. and 5s.

10595. So that your evidence comes to this, that Miss Squire's statement about 9d. or 10d. per dozen pairs—— ?—Is misleading and untrue.

10596. You say that with regard to this lady ; your meaning is that so far as your experience goes you have never paid such rates ?—I go further, and I say it was never paid in our district.

10597. You take the responsibility of saying that ?—I do.

10598. Is there any other comment you desire to make upon Miss Squire's evidence ?—At Question 1681 : "Was that stockings or socks ?—(A.) Stockings might be a little more—I mean the long golf stockings. Some of them were, I think, about 1s. 6d. to 3s. a dozen." Now that is the most misleading thing I ever heard.

10599. What is your rate for that?—8s. per dozen. Then it goes on, "But the shorter socks would be 9d. or 10d. per dozen"—that is the same thing repeated again. "In some places they were doing gloves, which would be cheaper still." The lowest price that gloves are made at is 2s. 6d. per dozen.

10600. Have you any further comment?—At Question 1684: "What would be the ordinary output of such a worker? Take the case of socks, how many pairs would be produced in a week?—(A.) If a woman was supplied with wool, she might do about two dozen in a week, or if any member of her household helped her, she might do two-and-a-half dozen. She might do more of the smaller gloves or socks." Now there is no woman will do two dozen socks; it is only one dozen socks that she would do. I wish to point out that in describing this I am giving the two sides of the question. To say that a woman would do two dozen socks is perfectly misleading.

10601. You say it is one dozen?—One dozen at the very most. Then at Question 1686: "Instead of money she takes tea?—(A.) Yes, and the tea she would take is priced at 3s. 6d. per pound."

10602. That does not apply to your business at all; you have explained that?—I say that we have no tea at 3s. 6d. a pound.

10603. 2s. to 2s. 4d. is your price? Yes. Then she says: "The peasants do not drink tea at less than 3s. 6d. or 2s. 6d. a pound from the truck shops."

10604. The 2s. 6d. comes nearer to the figure that you gave, but you say it should be 2s.?—It is 2s. to 2s. 4d. There has never been a grain of tea sold at 3s. 6d. a pound in our district.

10605. How is the tea supplied; is it in little packets?—It is supplied in any quantity they require; it is weighed out to them.

10606. I am asking what your practice is; is it supplied in little packets?—What you mean is do we sell it in sealed packets or does it come loose in a chest. It comes loose to us and we make it up in our own paper parcels.

10607. Is it supplied to the customers in little packages?—Yes.

10608. In what quantities, 2 ounces, and so on. Half a pound, or a quarter of a pound.

10609. Less than a quarter of a pound?—Any quantity that is wanted.

10610. Are there any other passages that you have selected for comment?—Yes, there are a good many of them. At Question 1700 there is this: "Please give us a description of that, so that we may have an idea of the ordinary home of the worker who works socks for a penny a piece, or stockings for 1½d. a piece?—(A.) Their homes would be isolated cabins; many of them on rocky soil; perched on mountain land, or on bog. They are low one-storey cabins, with mud floors, very low roofs, often no chimney, sometimes a hole in the roof, but the smoke often finds its way out at the door. The fire would be in the middle of the floor, or at the side with no hearth, or actual fireplace."

10611. I am afraid we cannot take you into that. You think that that is putting it too low?—I only want to show you that the trend of the evidence is to describe the mode of living of the people in a way which is untrue.

10612. We will take it by way of contrast. Will you describe it to us now?—Our cabins are roofed and thatched; they are straw roofed.

10613. Are they isolated?—They stand by themselves generally.

10614. That is isolated?—Yes, sometimes they are in little hamlets.

10615. Are some of them on rocky soil?—Well it is all rock soil down with us, we agree in that.

10616. Are they on mountain land sometimes?—It is nearly all mountain land.

10617. So that that is true too?—Yes.

10618. And they may be in the bog sometimes?—Certainly.

10619. Then are they one storey?—They are.

10620. That is correct too. Are the floors of mud?—They are floors of blue clay.

10621. Call that mud and that would be correct. Then are the roofs low?—No, they are not very low, the side wall of the house would be about 8 or 9 feet.

10622. Some people might call that very low. Then is there a chimney in the house?—Certainly.

10623. Is there sometimes none?—No, I never saw it.

10624. You do not know a case where the smoke would go through?—No.

10625. I know plenty unfortunately, in my country, but you do not know it in Ireland?—I am talking of my own district now where this inquiry pertains to, and I say our people have the greatest taste for their homes—a most extraordinary taste for keeping them nice and cleanly.

10626. So I think all that we differ about is in the matter of the chimneys?—But there is something more, She is asked: "What does the household consist of," and she says, "Very often an old woman, the grandmother, crouching at the fire smoking a pipe."

10627. I am afraid we cannot take you into evidence by way of contradicting a description of dwellings in Ireland. We have put you to a good test, and that is the one point upon which you have checked her evidence. We must have some regard to the shortness of life?—I should be sorry to detain you longer than you thought was necessary.

10628. Is there anything else that you think of importance that you think you can check?—You will see this at Question 1713. "Is the truck master"—pausing there for a moment, I take exception to the term entirely; it shows that the whole trend of the evidence is biassed.

10629. I am afraid that that language I was responsible for; it was my question?—"Is the truck master a wholesale dealer in socks or stockings? (A) He is agent for large firms in Belfast or some other town. He takes the wool from the warehouse, and sends back the socks, and in the majority of cases there is no commission given to the agents by these large firms. Therefore the agent has to make his profit entirely from the workers. If more of the firms gave even a slight commission there would not be the same temptation to the agent to make a profit out of the poor workers. The truck masters are reputed in their district to have made their fortunes entirely out of the truck system and in many cases the chief house in a small town is the house occupied by the truck master. The truck masters themselves employ other men, who go into the more remote districts; at a cabin in a lonely district one will often see a number of women beginning to congregate. I have watched such a place, and found the man arrive with a cart and unpack his tea and his wool and remain there for the day giving out wool and taking in work and paying for it in tea." What she does say in her evidence here is—she is giving evidence here as regards me—that I am an agent for a Belfast firm, that I get the wool for them to work up without commission. Such is not the fact.

10630. You are giving your evidence now in the assumption that she is referring to you?—But she is referring to me.

10631. I want to know whether that is the assumption in which your evidence is now given?—Certainly.

10632. You say so far as you are concerned that that is not accurate?—Certainly not.

10633. Is there any other passage?—At Question 1717 you will find this; it refers to this particular class of work, the fancy sock that we were referring to a little ago. "(Q) It may be curiosity, but I think we should all like to know what is the selling price of these socks and stockings? What would be their value (A.) It is a little difficult to say, as there are so many different qualities. I purchased several that appeared to me the same that I had seen made. In Belfast I purchased socks that I had seen knitted in large quantities; common socks with a good deal of brilliant colour in them, magenta and green and orange and blue? The workers are paid 6d. per dozen."

10334. You say that that should be 1s. 6d.?—It should be 4s. 6d.; she goes on "and I bought them for 9d. a pair. The longer stockings sell from 6s. or 7s. to 12s. a pair."

Mr. J. Sweeney.
1 May 1907.

10635. You are referring to the prices paid in the nineties; that is more than ten years ago?—Yes, and they are still existing.

10636. You paid 4s. 6d.?—I paid 4s. 6d. Then in reference to the large stockings she says here: "The longer stockings sell from 6s. or 7s. to 12s. a pair." That is most misleading.

10637. What should that figure be?—We sell them at 3s. 6d. a pair.

10638. I am not asking you that; what do they sell to the customer for?—They would sell perhaps, finished, at 5s. or 6s.

10639. Where is the lucky shop, where you can get them for 5s.?—You can get them in this town—plain long hose with turned down tops. I sell them myself at 3s. 6d., that leaves a fairly good margin. She goes on: "Which might be made at perhaps 2s. 6d. a dozen"—that is 2s 6d. to the knitter. Now 8s. is the lowest that we give to the knitter instead of 2s. 6d. Then she says: "While I was there I had to get a good many knitted gloves for which the worker was paid 6d. per dozen." 2s. 6d. per dozen is the lowest that we pay workers. "I was charged at the place 9d. for a pair." That was the purchase price from the knitter from whom Miss Squire bought the gloves, so that that is inconsistent too. "But they would probably have been 1s. 6d. a pair in the shop." Well they were selling those at 6d. a pair and we paid 2s. 6d. to the knitter per dozen.

10640. Is there any other passages you want to refer to?—I take exception to some passages in Miss Deane's evidence.

10641. (Chairman.) That is a separate branch of it; we will perhaps go to that to-morrow.

FORTIETH DAY.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MR. JOHN SWEENEY, recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. J. Sweeney.
2 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

10642. When we adjourned we were on the evidence of Miss Squire, if you remember?—Yes.

10643. As a matter of fact the evidence which you were controverting yesterday was Miss Squire's evidence?—Yes. It was Miss Squire's evidence. That is what I was referring to.

10644. Have you anything you would care to observe upon in Miss Deane's evidence, because it is right to hear you on that?—I did make some observations on Miss Deane's evidence, and I think I made all the observations that I wished to make upon it. I think it does not pretend to be an inquiry. It is remarks on the mode of living of the people, and there are two points that I wish to draw attention to in Question 1951.

10645. I think you will find that has still reference to Miss Squire's evidence, but it does not matter. Just give us it in your own way?—Yes, perhaps it does refer to her evidence.

10646. There does not seem to be anything as a matter of fact there?—No. There is nothing that I have not contradicted before. The Question is: "I understand that members of her family have assisted? (A.) There was nothing in the arrangement to prevent it, but as a matter of fact that was not so in this case." I contradicted that, and said this was not Mary MacGeoghan. It could not have been done by this old woman, but it must necessarily have been done by the members of the family. I wanted to show how the evidence was erroneous in that respect.

10647. That is a better phrase to use; that the evidence was erroneous?—I think we are on very good terms, and I come here to tell the truth, and to give my opinion, though my opinion may not be agreeable.

10648. Have you anything else to say on the evidence?—No, but it has been reiterated here.

10649. So far as it has been reiterated your objection would apply?—Yes. Then on the Eleventh day there is something.

10650. That is Miss Deane's evidence we are coming to now?—Yes. It is a matter of the living of the people, and I would like to go into it as to the poultry and ducks in a house, and two-roomed apartments. It does not really represent our district in its proper light, and as a Donegal man, and member of the county council, I should not like it to pass without inquiry.

10651. You say that the style of living (and we may take it from you generally) is much better than is represented in Miss Squire's and Miss Deane's evidence?—That covers the whole situation.

10652. Then on the matters of fact that are relevant to this inquiry have you found anything in Miss Deane's evidence that you wish to call our attention to?—There is another remark at Question 2291: (Q.) "And did these truck-masters or shopkeepers appear to conduct their business steadily upon those principles?"—that is Truck principles—"(A.)—Yes, they are called gombeen men." But there is no such thing in our country as gombeen men.

10653. What is a gombeen man?—A gombeen man is a man who gives out money at an exorbitant rate of interest. That is a misrepresentation. I think, gentlemen, if you visited our place you would be convinced that what I state as regards the living of the people is correct. I have no interest in suggesting anything but what is correct.

10655. As a matter of fact, are there no gombeen men there?—No, that is confined to the cities where these usurers charge a very large rate of interest, sometimes 30 per cent. But in our district we are not that well off that we can afford to lend money. We have banks in our place which do lend money on security.

10656. There are no gombeen men in Donegal?—Not as I understand it, not that I know of. Particularly in our district.

10657. Then is there any other part of that evidence that you wish to refer to ?—There is nothing else unless you wish to put queries as regards general evidence; except just one thing, and that is this——

10658. You made some remark yesterday that you wished to refer to something ?—I want to show that it is merely in the interests of the people that I am speaking on this trade of machine-knitting and hand-knitting. I submitted to you yesterday, and you said you would kindly look at it to-day, our auditor's report for the six months ending April, 1906. That shows very clearly that it is not a very great paying concern, but we are a poor district, and unless there is some person willing to take an interest in the people, and supply them with work, their circumstances would be very poor. The Congested Districts Board for Ireland have recognised my efforts in supporting this machine-knitting industry in the district.

10659. I will ask you about that, but before coming on to that tell me what it is in your auditor's report that you wish to refer to ?—I mean the hosiery department. There has also been an increase in the turnover, amounting to £63. That is an increase on the half-year's profits. The gross profit amounted to £63 19s. 1d.

10660. Is it a limited concern ?—No, it is a partnership between my brother and me. We divide it into departments, and we show how every department pays.

10661. Who is the auditor ?—Mr. McClure, of Belfast.

10662. He goes over the books ?—He goes over the books.

10663. What is the point that you wish to put ?—I wish to show that the gross profit for the half-year ending 1906 was £63 19s. 1d. That is the gross profit. The net profit would mean, I suppose, about £15 on a turnover of about 200 to 400 a week, so that it is not a very fat job; but we want to keep the people employed.

10664. Now are you done with that ?—I am.

10665. May I ask you with regard to the change that has come over the trade by the introduction of knitting machines. When was that change made ?—That was between six and seven years ago, perhaps. I am not certain of it.

10666. Has it gradually rooted out the hand work ?—It has, and it comes cheaper.

10667. The production is cheaper ?—The production is cheaper.

10668. I want to know now about the effect on the people you were referring to ?—The effect on the people is that it does not employ so many. The young and the old could work at the plain hand-knitted socks, but it requires young people who can pick up the way to manage a machine. It is only they who can work at the machines. I started the machine knitting in our district. I employed an instructress and qualified the girls at our own place, and when they were qualified I gave them a machine each to take out to their cottages. They took the wool from me in large quantities, of about sixteen dozen, which would make sixteen dozen socks in a week. Our best knitters make sixteen dozen socks; and they are paid 10½d. a dozen for these. That individually means a very large amount of earning, but it does not serve so many people as the old hand knitting did, for the simple reason that young and old were able to work at it—all the members of the family were.

10670. A household in which there was every woman willing to work, we shall say, at the old hand work ?—Yes.

10671. Now into that household, I suppose, perhaps one machine may have been introduced by you ?—Yes. It would apply in that case. One machine would be introduced there.

10672. Then the product would be how many times more than in the old hand work ?—If they were expert knitters, or at least if they were the best knitters we had, it would be sixteen dozen at 10½d. a dozen, or about 14s. a week in round figures.

10673. As against one dozen was it, or how many dozen ?—As against a dozen at 4s. 6d. a dozen. It is on those fancy socks that I referred to in the evidence of yesterday.

10674. So that the output, of course, by the introduction of machinery is greater ?—Very much greater.

10675. And the reward for the same amount of time is greater ?—It is.

10676. But it may have involved, of course, the loss of labour to those who are not acquainted yet with the machine ?—That is just the position.

10677. Now would you mind me going back to just one figure in order to point the contrast between your evidence and that which is against it. I will take ordinary plain socks, and I want two figures from you. Your view is that the hand worker could do only a dozen of these in a week ?—Quite right.

10678. And that the reward for that would be 4s. 6d. —That is on the fancy sock.

10679. But as to the plain sock I ask ?—A plain sock would be 1s. 6d. to 2s.

10680. Then the fancy sock would be 4s. 6d. ?—Yes, it would be 4s. 6d.

10681. That is the one figure ?—That is the half hose.

10682. Now take the long sportsman's stockings ?—The long sportsman's stocking depends on the pattern which has been made up ?

10683. Take the plain one ?—The plain one with turned down tops would be 8s., and we pay as high as 30s.—from 8s. to 30s. according to the pattern, or at least according to the difficulty of the work.

10684. I do not think there is anything else that occurs to me to ask you on that ?—There is one thing I should like to bring before you, and that is that we should not be harassed. People who are trying to formulate an industry to employ the people should not be harassed by over-anxiousness on the part of inspectors. We have always found that male inspectors went on and did their duty rigorously, but they did not go about it and were not guided by impulse as females are. They were guided by reason.

10685. Since you have entered on the general question, might I ask you this. I fancy you are against truck are not you ?—I do not think there is the least necessity for it under the circumstances I have pointed out in our district.

10686. Then you would not dissent from the view that in regard to out-workers there should be the same law applicable to them as is applicable to workers inside the factory ?—Yes, I believe that they should be paid in cash.

10687. And that the same laws generally should, if possible, be extended to those people whether in factories or out of factories ?—Well, I think it applies to factories more than it does to our district, or employment such as I have described to you.

10688. Then can you give me any further answer to my suggestion to you that the laws should be the same in so far as possible to out-workers and to in-workers ?—My idea is that the only way it applies to us is to see that cash is paid and not kind.

10689. I have given you two opportunities ?—I cannot see the point that you are putting to me. Perhaps it is my ignorance.

10690. I do not want you to see the point further than this. Do you see yourself any reason why there should be a different law applicable to those who work in factories and those who work for gentlemen like yourself, in their own homes ?—I think it requires to be stringent with factories and that it does not apply to us at all, I might say.

10691. Now what is your reason for saying so ?—It does not apply to us except in one particular, that is if there is any danger that people be paid in kind that should be prohibited.

10692. Why do you say that that should be prohibited ? —They work in the knitters' cottages. They are free lances. They take out their wool and they bring in the made stuff to us. They are living a very healthy life and they are not confined to hours, or to a close room.

10693. I do not think you have apprehended my question, which was, why do you think that payment in kind should be prohibited ?—Because I do not think it is fair to the worker.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

2 May 1907.

10694. In what respect is it not fair ?—Because I believe there would be a tendency to confine the work merely to those who took in kind.

10695. Yes, that is quite fair ?—Then there is another point I want to put in reference to that case over which I lost. I will not touch on it except in this respect. It is a thing that has come plainly to me. When that case was heard four times at the petty sessions, Miss Squire applied to me through my solicitor in the court and said that if I pleaded guilty she would let me off with a 1s. fine. That can be proved by my solicitor. That showed the weakness of the case and the groundwork on which it was based, and I think it was a good reason—it was really the main reason why the other parties, to avoid expense, pleaded guilty. I have nothing more to add.

By Mrs. Tennant.

10696. I want to ask you a very few questions. I notice that though you traverse Miss Squire's evidence generally, you have not drawn attention to the replies in certain cases. I should just like to ask you one or two questions on that evidence. Have you a copy of the evidence before you ?—I have.

10697. Then may I direct your attention to Question No. 1952 on the 10th day. There Miss Squire was asked by the Chairman "Was it true that it was the direct knitter who furnished the goods;" and her reply is, "Yes, that fact was proved—the direct knitter" ?—Yes.

10698. I understand you to say that Mary MacGeoghan did not do work at all ?—Quite right.

10699. Miss Squire proved in court that she did ?—I was present at the trial and it was not proved.

10700. That is a matter which ought to be very easily proved here; have you brought anything to show that it was not proved ?—Have I brought any document to prove that it was not proved ?

10701. Can you draw our attention to any document you have yourself brought, or is there any document in existence to controvert Miss Squire's statement ?—I can prove it far more strongly, I can give my personal knowledge and testimony that she was unable to do this class of work which she got, and that it was only her family who could do it.

10702. But that presumably was brought before the court and was in its possession at the time ?—Yes, and that was one of the things that the counsel raised in Dublin.

10703. Then is the position this, that the court having heard your evidence and Miss Squire's evidence, preferred Miss Squire's ?—I was not supposed to give evidence at all.

10704. Did you in fact give evidence in the case ?—No, I do not think I gave evidence at all. It was a semi-criminal case.

10705. But if there was evidence in the possession of your solicitor, and you were under trial and you pleaded not guilty, you must have brought something in support of your plea of not guilty—you must have brought any evidence you could command ?—I forget the circumstances, but I am sure every point was brought that was necessary.

10706. This is a direct contravention of what you say ?—I know this woman and I am able to get it proven up to the hilt, that this woman could not do the work which she got at this time (that was the fancy sock) and that it was the daughters of the family that got it.

10707. Then you were in a position at that time to give this proof up to the hilt ?—Certainly.

10708. Then you did give it ?—I was not examined, if I understand rightly.

10709. You will remember whether you were or not ?—No, I do not think I was examined at all. It was a semi-criminal case.

10710. But you were in the position of defendant ?—I was defendant, but the defendant is not always examined.

10711. If he is able to support his statement effectively this is a case in which I think he would be examined ?—I do not think so. I do not think I was examined.

10712. How were the facts arrived at ?—By the evidence of the witness Mary MacGeoghan.

10713. But then Miss Squire says her case was proved ?—That is Miss Squire's assertion. But you have the evidence.

10714. But that is an assertion which I want you to controvert ?—You have the evidence, and if you will apply the evidence you will see it.

10715. We have had the evidence, and the statement there is that the case was proved. I want to know if you can bring us any document which will controvert the official document ?—I can bring you the affidavit of Mary MacGeoghan to say she never made that class of sock, if it is so required by this committee.

By the Chairman.

10716. Mr. Sweeney, I am not in the habit of interposing at all, but it would shorten the matter if you would tell Mrs. Tennant this. The evidence having been led by Miss Squire, did you give evidence or produce any evidence to the contrary effect to the court ?—There could be no evidence to the contrary.

10717. Then would you mind answering my question. Did you give evidence or did you produce any evidence to a contrary effect to the court ?—I do not remember that I did.

By Mrs. Tennant.

10718. You say you now supply machines to the workers ?—I supply them and the Congested Districts Board supply them.

10719. Do you and the Congested Districts Board supply them on the same terms ?—No, we either give them only on instalments, or they pay them up by instalments, or we let them at a rent of 6d. a week. Any that wish to purchase a machine get it under the instalment system from the Congested Districts Board.

10720. The Congested Districts Board has the one system, which is the instalment system of purchase ?—Yes.

10721. You have, I understand, two systems ?—We have two systems, either purchase or a rental of 6d. a week.

10722. In either case is it the same class of machine which is supplied by you and by the Congested Districts Board ?—Yes, it is the Grisweld machine.

10723. Would you state what the cost of a machine is, about ?—I cannot tell it from memory; it is my brother who manages that part of the business; I leave it entirely to him. He lives in Dungloe. I think it is between £4 and £5, but I cannot tell you exactly the sum. There are certain accessories to it—there is a certain number of cylinders for working the different classes of work. If there is only one cylinder the machine costs less, and if there are more cylinders and more accessories, such as spinners and winders, and all that sort of thing, it costs more.

10724. Is it a weekly payment when it is on the instalment system, or fortnightly, or monthly ?—It is weekly.

10725. Do you adjust the amount of that payment at all in correspondence with the amount of the sum earned by the worker ?—No, we make a regular charge of 6d. a week for the wear and tear of the machine.

10726. That is when the machine is hired ?—Yes, that is hiring it.

10727. But I am asking about the instalment purchase system ?—On the instalment purchase system it is paid quarterly.

10728. Do you adjust that quarterly sum at all ?—To meet what ?

10729. According to the earnings of the worker, or is it a fixed sum ?—It is a fixed sum, paid quarterly for the machine.

10730. Do you know how much that is ?—I cannot tell you from memory, but I think it is about £1 7s. that the Congested Districts Board charges. I think so, but I cannot remember the figures. I think from memory that is what it is.

10731. That would make four payments ?—That would make about four payments.

10732. And that would bring the machine to about £5 8s. as its cost to the workers ?—Yes, that would be just it exactly—four times the instalment.

10733. But you are not sure whether the machine costs £4 or £5; you put it between £4 and £5 ?—I could not tell, but I have a faint recollection that the Congested Districts Board charges £1 7s. per quarter. I cannot be accurate as to that, but I am nearly certain that is it. It runs in my mind that such is the amount.

10734. Then if the cost of the machine is between £4 and £5 the amount is fixed to meet your calculation for interest, is it ?—Yes, that would be on the same basis; it might cost a little more or a little less. Of course for twelve months going out there may be a little interest. We have to pay it ourselves, because we pay for the machine at once.

10735. As you do not remember the exact sum the machine costs, it is impossible to calculate the rate of interest ?—I cannot say, but I think it is between £4 and £5. I am not certain what the exact amount is, but it all depends, as I have said before, on the number of cylinders that are put into it with the machine and the other accessories.

10736. If a worker who has one of your machines on the purchase instalment system has paid three of the quarterly payments and fails to make the fourth payment, what happens to the machine ?—There have been cases of that kind here, and I think I have proved here as to the way the Congested Districts Board acts. They do not take back the machine, but insist on payment of it. I generally go security for the knitters for the payment of the machine, and they hold me responsible in conjunction with them.

10737. But is that a case in which the Congested Districts Board is working through you and you have a joint interest ?—The Congested Districts Board advances the machine to the worker on my security and my brother's in conjunction with the father of the machinist.

10738. Have you no examples of cases in which the Congested Districts Board advances the machine except on your security ?—They must get securities of which they approve, but I think in the majority of cases, or in nearly all, or at any rate in those that I got for this purpose from the Congested Districts Board, who were working with me, they were all on mine and my brother's security.

10739. Then there are distinct cases in which the Congested Districts Board is the owner of the machine and cases in which you are the owner of the machine ?—They are not the owners of the machine. They got the machine from Grisweld.

10740. But they become the owner of the machine, and then they sell it on the instalment system to the workers ?—Yes.

10741. I want to distinguish between cases in which the Congested Districts Board is the seller, and cases in which you are the seller ?—It was only in the initial stages of this industry that I was the seller. It was only in a very few cases that I was the seller. It was generally on the rent system that they took them. They did not know whether the industry was to be a permanent one or not, and they preferred taking them on the rent system to the other. I impressed upon them that it would be better for them to purchase the machine out on the instalment system, but very few of them took advantage of it.

10742. But there are some who still maintain that system, do I understand ?—Yes; they have the option.

10743. To return to my question; in the cases that arise in which three payments have been made and a fourth is not forthcoming, what happens to the machine when you are the seller ?—I am sued for it by the Congested Districts Board.

10744. But when you are yourself the seller ?—I take the responsibility. I know the people, and try to get it from them by degrees.

10745. Then you try to recover it; what means do you adopt ?—I very seldom take any. I have not so many of them out altogether in that respect. I try to get it just the best way I can from them. I know the people and they are generally customers of mine, and if they fail in it they generally come in and explain the reason of the failure, and I give them time.

10746. Do you confine yourself to methods of persuasion ?—I prefer it so, because the law is very hard and expensive. It is hard on the people.

10747. But we sometimes do things we prefer not to do ?—Unless it becomes an absolute necessity I do not take legal means.

10748. Can you recall any case in which you did take legal proceedings ?—No, not since I started this industry.

10749. Would you prefer to say there is no such case ?—There is no case in which I took legal steps to recover the price of the machine.

10750. Is there any case in which you have threatened legal steps ?—Why threaten ? Good threatening does a lot of things, but I do not go to extremes.

10751. Then if your methods of persuasion succeed and you get the machine back, do you restore the instalment payments to the workers ?—I do not take the machine back.

10752. But I thought you said you used methods of persuasion to get it back ?—No, not that; I used methods of persuasion to get the remaining balance.

10753. The remaining instalment ?—Yes.

10754. If that fails, what then ?—I do not take them back except from parties who have refused to work altogether.

10755.—In that case would you restore any of the payments which they have made in respect of a machine which does not become their property; is that the method on which you work ?—I am only talking now of the rent system in that statement.

10756. I was talking the whole time of the instalment system ?—Then I misunderstood you; I never take them back on the instalment system; I get the balance of the cash.

10757. But, if you remember, my question was in the case of three quarterly payments having been made, and the fourth not being forthcoming, what steps do you take ?—I try to use all the persuasion I can to get it back, but I am very seldom reduced to that necessity. They are generally customers of mine and they pay it up by degrees if they are not able to pay it up by the regular quarterly time.

10758. On the rent system your charge is 6d. a week ?—Yes, it is 6d. a week.

10759. The Congested Districts Board has no rent system ?—They have no rent system.

10760. Have you compared the amount charged by you with that charged by the Congested Districts Board on the instalment system ?—I think the instalment system is better. I have ceased to give them out on the rent system entirely for some time back. I said if they wanted to get a machine they must apply to the Congested Districts Board; I did not believe in the rent system.

10761. On the instalment system my question is, have you ever compared the charge you make under that system with the charge made by the Congested Districts Board under that system ?—I consider the Congested Districts Board's system is much better.

10762. But it is not the system that is in question. I am talking now of the charge made under the system ?—It all depends; I cannot answer an open question like that. If they get it for ten years at 6d. a week it comes to a big sum of money.

10763. I am not talking of 6d. a week, but of the instalment system now, and of the charge per quarter made under that system by the Board, and the quarterly charge made under that system by you; have you compared your charge with their charge ?—It is very simple to compare them. It means so many weeks in a quarter and 6d. a week for each week, and comparing it with £1 7s. per quarter that gives you at once the answer to your question.

10764. No, I am afraid it does not ?—Perhaps I do not understand you.

10765. My question is on quite another point: it does not touch the rent system at all. You have an instalment system and the Congested Districts Board has an instalment system, and you charge, you believe, £1 7s. a quarter ?—Yes.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

2 May 1907.

10766. What in your knowledge does the Congested Districts Board charge?—£1 7s. a quarter. I have it here.

10767. Then that at the beginning would have been the answer to my question?—I am a little dense perhaps.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

10768. I just want to clear one point up that I do not think you made quite plain to me in answering Mrs. Tennant. You ended by saying that you use persuasion to get them back?—To get the money I should have said. If I said that I made a mistake. I wish to be corrected on that. That is what I meant to say.

10769. Supposing there were two instalments paid out of four and you cannot get back the money, do you mean to say you never take the machine back?—No, I have not done so in my experience.

10770. You have never taken back a machine that you have let on the hire system?—No, I would not take it back.

10771. Not even in the case of there being no chance of getting the two remaining instalments?—No, I just go on the same system as the Congested Districts Board system. There is the system, and it explains the whole thing. (Handing a document to the Committee.)

10772. I cannot read that very well.—It is done through me and my brother there in conjunction with the parties, that is the father of the machinist. It is done jointly, as we are surety for it.

10773. Now about the sureties. Part of the machines in the district are sold on the hire system by you and your brother, and part of the machines are sold by the Congested Districts Board on your security?—Yes.

10774. Then practically the whole of the people of the district as to these machines are more or less dependent on your good will?—They are; that is those who buy my knitters.

10775. Either directly or indirectly they are dependent on you, then?—Yes, that is those parties who apply to me for machines. But they are not dependent on me to work for me alone. Supposing that party who is sued there in that document——

10776. But as a matter of fact, without referring to that, those people who have machines from you, or from the Congested Districts Board on your security, do work for you and for no one else?—They do work for several people.

10777. To any extent?—I could not give them all they could work.

10778. Then where you can give them work, or where you want them to work for you, I presume they do work for you?—They do work for me. They are only too glad to get the work; they cannot get half enough of it.

10779. But I presume also that as you befriended them by getting them the machine you would consider it a little ungrateful of them if they did not work for you when you required them?—I would consider that they should do so as a matter of gratitude, but not as a matter of compulsion.

10780. Then in that case they have to take, I presume, for their work your price?—They are not free agents in making the price, do you mean?

10781. They are not free agents in making the bargain with you?—They are free agents in making the bargain with me. I stipulate the price before they have the yarn, and I am working against great competition in the market. I am able to give them as good wages as they get anywhere else, and I offer it, and they are free agents to take it or work for some other person who will give them more.

10782. That is a point I want to have cleared up, and we shall be glad to have it cleared up. There are other people who will give them work and they put you in competition with these other people?—Certainly; there is Mr. Macdevitt of Glenties, and I could give several names.

10783. Do they carry on the same machine business?—They carry on the same machine business.

10784. Do they let out machines in the same way?—They let out machines, I think, but I do not know their system exactly.

10785. But is there anyone else in the business besides yourself that hires machines out?—Several.

10786. On the hire system?—Yes. Those firms I refer to in Glenties hire them, but I do not know whether they get them themselves and rent them, or whether it is through the Congested Districts Board; I am not certain of that; it is sixteen miles from me.

10787. In your case and their case the people who sell the machines, I presume, expect the people who buy them more or less to work for them?—They live in their immediate locality, and it is more convenient for the workers themselves.

10788. Now about the 6d. per week on the hire system; how much can they earn for the 6d. a week by their machine?—14s. per week; it all depends on how they are worked.

10789. I thought I understood you to say they could only make one dozen pairs of socks a week?—That is hand knitted.

10790. But in this case by your machine that you let to them at 6d. per week they can earn 14s. per week?—Yes. I do not say that they all earn 14s. a week; I want to be explicit on that; it depends on how they work, some of them work hard; it all depends on themselves, they are paid according to results. If they work hard and make sixteen dozen a week, as I have had several do, they get 14s., but some will make only ten dozen. It is a matter for themselves.

10791. In your establishment, then, as I understand it, you have a depot in which you give out the yarn and take in the finished article in the shape of socks and gloves and so on?—That is one department.

10792. And under the same roof perhaps you have a shop?—It is quite apart from the shop entirely. It is away in the back yard, and there is a different entrance to it separate and apart from the shop, and by an arch.

10793. Then they come out of the depôt?—Yes, and through the arch and in at the front door of the shop, if they wish to go to the shop. There are two separate shops. There are grocery and drapery departments, and they are separate departments.

10794. Now the suggestion is, of course, that these people are rather under your thumb?—That is the suggestion, but it is not the fact.

10795. That is what I want to get at. Is it as a matter of fact the position that most of these people do owe you money in some form or another?—Some do and some do not.

10796. But all these people of course that you have sold machines to are in your debt for the machine?—Some are and some are not.

10797. But independently of that machine business what proportion of these people to whom you give work are in your debt?—I would say that there would be about three-fourths of them.

10798. Then three-fourths are in your debt?—Yes.

10799. Now, according to your auditor's account, you do not make a very large profit out of the hosiery department?—That is the gross profit I refer to; that is not the net profit.

10800. Would it pay you to carry on that business for that profit if you got no other profit from any other source?—It would; we have a little enterprise in our district.

10801. Would £65 a half year pay you to take all the trouble of selling these machines?—I do not say that it pays me.

10802. And giving out the work and taking the work in?—I do not say that it pays me. I commenced this thing, and I got the Congested Districts Board interested in it, and they got machines, and I gave them partly an undertaking (not an undertaking in writing) that in getting machines for these parties interested I would continue this work. Sometimes it is according to the price of wool. It is not remunerative. I have lost £134 on it in six months. I have earned £63 on it for the half year ending in April, as I show here, but that is the gross profit.

10803. Then your position is that you are helping the neighbourhood and it is more or less philanthropy?—

You are perfectly right; there is a good deal of that in it.

10804. Now when these people get their money, they having to get these goods, do they as a matter of fact get all their stores from you?—No, I emphatically say no. I pay them in cash; they can do what they wish; I pay them at my office.

10805. And you would not feel it any grievance whatever if they took their money from the hosiery department and went away to somebody else's store over the way, or somewhere else and spent their money?—They are doing it every day.

10806. Then you allege that they do not get the bulk of their stores from you?—I would not say that they do not get the bulk of their stores from me, because I consider that the major portion of the people of our country have a little gratitude in their composition, and that when you give them a thing and give them the power to earn 14s. a week, and then they get the cash in hand, if I am able to serve them on as good a basis as any other man in the town I do not think they would be so ungrateful as to go and leave it with other houses; but I know it to be done—I know it to be done with a quarter of them at least.

10807. Then you would not feel it any grievance if they did that?—No; I think it causes a circulation of money in the district, and everybody must benefit indirectly.

10808. Then you would not feel it any grievance if you have given them work, and when they are in your debt, they went and spent their money at another store?—I would feel that they were acting very ungratefully, but it would not influence me in my conduct to them.

10809. I suppose, as a matter of fact, you try to get repayment of your debt?—No.

10810. It is only human nature?—No, certainly not. We never allow that to interfere with the collection of debts at all. They are two different things. It is the heads of the family that run the accounts. They come into our drapery shop and get a parcel of £4 or £5 worth of goods to clothe the family; boots, and one thing and another. We give them twelve months credit, and at the end of the twelve months, after coming home from harvesting in Scotland and England, they come in and pay their accounts; but it is quite separate and apart from the knitting industry altogether.

10811. You charge no interest, of course, for the debt?—We give out the goods for twelve months, without interest, and if it is over twelve months our terms are that we charge at the rate of 5 per cent. if it is out for another twelve months.

10812. Five per cent. per annum?—Yes.

10813. Then are most of these people continuously in your debt?—Some of them are; I should say the major portion are. They are very good people for paying when they can. It is only in adverse seasons that they fall behind, and their accounts may lie out for two years.

10814. As a matter of fact do the majority of them never get clear?—They do; I would say the majority do get clear. They try to square up their accounts every year.

10815. Do they square up their accounts every year?—They do with their earnings, if they can.

10816. But I do not mean if they can, but do they as a matter of fact come to you at a stated time and clear off the whole of their score?—Yes, that is what they try to do.

10817. No, no, excuse me, that is not what I want?—I cannot say it is a fact in all cases.

10818. Do the majority of the people get their accounts scored off with you once a year?—They do.

10819. It is only a small proportion of them who are continuously in your debt, is it?—Quite right.

10820. I should just like to ask you to put it again about your difference with Miss Squire. I do not think that you can allege that in all these cases you put as a matter of fact Miss Squire's evidence is absolutely erroneous?—I say it is erroneous; she has been misinformed as regards her direct evidence. I say that she could not be misinformed as far as that obstruction case was concerned. My mouth was closed there. It was a criminal case.

10821. I am not speaking of that?—To say that I used violence, that is.

10822. I am not speaking of that, and I will tell you what is before us here. In six to twelve cases, I think I may say, your statements of fact and hers are directly in conflict?—That is as regards prices, which means figures. You are quite right.

10823. They are directly contrary?—Certainly.

10824. These are absolutely questions of fact?—Questions of fact.

10825. Now you say one thing and Miss Squire says another, and where are the Committee to get actual evidence as to who is right and who is not right?—I think that the party to inquire of to get direct evidence would be some of the officials in Dungloe that are independent of both of us, say the Clerk of Petty Sessions or the inspector of police. I am not afraid of any person of independent opinion saying which of the statements of facts is correct.

By Mr. Maddison.

10826. You have told us that as far as the hosiery part of your department is concerned it is largely promoted by a laudable desire to help your district?—Certainly it is.

10827. You district is a very poor one?—Very poor.

10828. Because it is under the Congested District Board?—It is.

10829. Should you think there are many poorer districts in Ireland than yours?—As far as the district itself is concerned I do not think you could get a poorer, except in Connemara, but the people are an industrious people both in fishing and earning their bread. They are able to eke out an existence except when there comes a very poor year.

10830. But, as you say, it is one of the very poorest districts in Ireland?—One of them.

10831. Having that in view, I want to ask you whether you deliberately say that you have never seen a cabin in Ireland without a chimney?—I never saw it in our district. I did not say in Ireland.

10832. I beg your pardon; I meant in your district?—In our district.

10833. You have never seen one that had not a chimney?—I never saw any that had not a chimney. But I think there may be a misunderstanding regarding chimneys. They use hearth fires, and this hearth fire is open to a certain distance up, and then there is a hood across, and the chimney is continued out. It would be a dangerous thing to have them without a chimney because it would set the whole house afire with a straw roof. Common sense would teach you that. At least in our district I never saw it.

10834. I am merely putting it because Miss Squire said that she had seen a cabin with just a hole in the roof and no chimney, and the smoke finding its way through a hole in the roof?—That is ridiculous, and any person who has travelled through our district would tell you that it is not the fact.

10835. Now, although you make very little profit on the hosiery part of the business, it has been suggested that you may get something like a substantial return by the trade which these people do with you in the other parts of your business?—I get my share the same as any other one.

10836. How many people do you think you have knitting for you?—There are seventy-three machines between the Congested Districts Board and me. I have about fifteen and the Congested Districts Board has supplied the rest.

10837. How many altogether will do work for you? I am not now speaking of those who have machines, but of those that you give work out to; about how many are there?—That is seventy-three. Sometimes I have work for them and sometimes other people supply them.

10838. With reference to that £15 net profit for the half year, that represented a turn-over in the hosiery department of how much?—On an average I should say about 200 a week.

10839. £200 per week?—200 dozens.

10840. That is only a very small sum actually; how much will that come out at?—A dozen will be 3 lbs. weight; that would be 600 lbs. of wool.

10841. What does it amount to in money roughly?—200 dozens on an average would be about £50.

Mr. J. Sweeney.

2 May 1907.

10842. About £50 a week?—No. The cost of the article would be 4s. 6d. a dozen.

10843. What proportion does the hosiery department bear to your whole business, do you think?—That is in the amount of the capital involved.

10844. Or the turn-over. It is a very small proportion, is it not?—A very small proportion.

10845. Now about these plain socks that you told the chairman of. You said only one dozen could be made in a week and Miss Squire said two dozen could be made in a week?—Yes.

10846. Is there any possibility that the truth lies between the two of you. Are you giving it approximately or is Miss Squire giving it approximately?—I am going by experience of what I know over twenty years.

10847. That is to say you know from an experience of twenty years that no one does and that no one could make more than one dozen pairs of plain socks in a week?—That is it.

10848. Hand knitted?—Hand knitted.

10849. How you do think Miss Squire came to double that?—I cannot understand that.

10850. But you have no hesitation in saying that is so?—That is against myself in suggesting they can do two dozen.

10851. You have no hesitation in saying that Miss Squire's statement is quite incorrect?—It is quite incorrect, and I would leave that query to any independent person also.

10852. Then as to these long sportsmen's stockings or golf stockings or hose with turned down tops—I do not know what they are?—Long stockings with turned down tops.

10853. I do not know what Miss Squire said they were, but anyhow it was about 1s. 6d. was it not?—Eighteen pence a dozen.

10854. You declare that you have never paid less than 8s. per dozen?—Eight shillings per dozen.

10855. That is to say Miss Squires has exaggerated a simple price five times?—That is just what it comes to.

10856. Do you know of any other maker in the district that is only giving 1s. 6d.?—Not one. They would not get one to touch them. When you pay 1s. 6d. for half hose it is only reasonable to expect that a hose that takes about six times the work I suppose, and more particular work, as it has to be thoroughly made to fit the leg, could not be made at 1s. 6d., that is at the same price as half hose. Common sense would show that independently of anything else.

10857. Then just one question about tea. Miss Squire said the people had to pay 3s. 6d. to, I think she called them, truck masters. Do you deny that?—I deny it emphatically.

10858. You have never sold tea higher than 2s. 6d.?—2s. 4d. is the highest price. Two shillings is the general price.

10859. Is 2s. the lowest price?—Two shillings is the lowest price. They never ask for it lower than 2s. Our establishment sells none at less than 2s.

10860. In your district in order to help the people, would it not be a good thing to get some 1s. tea?—They drink a good deal of tea and I think cheap tea is very injurious to health.

10861. That is only by the way, but anyhow do they ever buy tea in ounces?—Yes, they do sometimes.

10862. Do you charge them the same price?—They are charged at the same rate per pound. Two shillings per pound is 1½d. an ounce.

10863. There is no way by which these people can buy a pennyworth of tea, for instance, is there?—They can buy any quantity they want.

10864. Supposing they bought a pennyworth of tea, would that be at the same price or 2s. 6d.?—No.

10865. Then your evidence is against Miss Squire's evidence on that. Is that right?—Yes, and I am willing to submit that to any independent person.

By Mr. Delevingne.

10866. One or two questions about those knitting machines. Have you got a written form of agreement with your workers?—Yes, there is a written form of agreement with the workers.

10867. When you hire out to them a machine, that is?—When I hire them a machine.

10868. Could you hand in a copy of that form of agreement?—I could send it to you, but I have not it with me at present.

10869. Will you do so?—I will do so with pleasure.*

10870. Does that form of agreement contain any condition that the worker is to work for you?—No, not that I remember. I do not remember the particulars of it, but I can send you the form of agreement and you can see for yourself.

10871. But would you be likely to hire out a machine to workers without a stipulation that they should use it in your work?—I cannot say whether that stipulation is in it or not. I cannot say from memory, but you will see it for yourself. I will send you one signed by the party who took out the machine.

10872. An agreement which has actually been made?—Which has actually been made and which is kept in our safe. The same thing applies to the Congested Districts Board.

10873. But they never hire out a machine?—They never hire a machine. That applies to the instalment system

10874. I thought you informed Mrs. Tennant that you had abandoned the rent system?—I have abandoned giving out machines on the rent system.

10875. Have you any machines still out on the rent system?—I think the ones I put out first were fifteen in number.

10876. When did you abandon the rent system?—It is a good while since now. It was when the Congested Districts Board took up the thing. It would be two or three years ago now since I have abandoned it.

10877. All the machines now supplied by you are supplied on the instalment system, are they?—They are supplied by the Congested Districts Board on the instalment system.

10878. You never supply a machine now either on the rent or the instalment system on your own account, do you?—No. Since the Congested Districts Board have given them out freely I have ceased to give them out either at a rent or on the instalment system.

10879. For the last two years?—I should say so, but I am speaking from memory now.

10880. When you gave out machines on either system of payment was there more than one quality of machine?—No. The Grisweld is the only machine we have used up to the present. We have found it a very satisfactory machine.

10881. Do you say you have only had one quality of machine?—I had one make called the French, but it was not satisfactory and I got no more. I have stocked the Grisweld ever since and the knitters have all been trained on the Grisweld. It is better to have one machine.

10882. Was that other a cheaper machine?—No, it was not a cheaper machine. It was dearer than the Grisweld, but it was not so good or satisfactory.

10883. Is it your evidence that the rent which you have charged per week for the machine has always been 6d.?—It is 6d. I am charging now. I may have charged 1s. in the beginning when I started first, but 6d. I reduced it to, as I considered that the rent of 6d. was quite sufficient to charge them.

10884. How long did you charge 1s. rent?—It was not long, but I cannot remember the exact period.

10885. I understand you have fifteen machines now still out on hire?—I think it is fifteen, speaking from memory.

10886. And you are still charging 6d. a week rent for those, are you?—Yes.

* The witness has declined to furnish the Secretary with a copy of this form of agreement. In a letter to the Secretary dated 17th August, 1907, he writes: "The reasons for my not fulfilling my promise given previous to the Lord Advocate's remarks are obvious, as I would be only furnishing evidence to incriminate myself, as he stated this hiring system was quite illegal and read me the Act referring to the matter."

10887. You charged 1s. rent first?—Until the Congested Districts Board commenced giving out machines, and then I reduced it to 6d. I cannot tell you the exact date, but I could let you have the date.

10888. Would you put it at as much as three years?—No, I think not.

10889. But you had charged 1s. for some considerable time?—No, I had charged it for some time, but not for a considerable time.

10890. You cannot say how long you had charged 1s. a week?—I cannot say.

10891. Did you make a practice of always charging 1s. a week at first and then reducing it to 6d. afterwards?—I reduced them all to 6d. after a certain period, but I do not know when that period was.

10892. Did you reduce the rent to 6d. and fix it at that for all?—Yes, for all.

10893. Or did you in every case require them to pay 1s. a week for a certain period before reducing it to 6d.?—I cannot say when it was reduced, but they are all 6d. now. I cannot tell the exact date from memory.

10894. They may all be reduced to 6d. now, I put it to you, because they have all paid 1s. a week to start with?—They paid it for some time and then I reduced them all to 6d. a week; I cannot tell you the time.

10895. I think you gave it in evidence that the machine cost somewhere between £4 and £5?—Yes, something like that. It varies according to the accessories, the cylinders, and that sort of thing. They may have one, two, three or four cylinders.

10896. Take it at £5, what the Congested Districts Board pays?—I think £5 4s. is what it comes to.

10897. At the rate of 1s. a week the machine would be paid for entirely in two years with interest?—If paid in four quarterly instalments it would be paid for in one year.

10898. But taking it on the rent system of 1s. a week, the machine would be paid for in that time?—It would be £2 12s. a year, and that would be for two years.

10899. I think you would have got back what your machine cost in about two years?—Yes. I think it is a very bad system, and I cannot support it, but some were so timorous that the work would fail.

By the Chairman.

10900. I thought you still had machines out at 6d. a week?—These people still will not purchase them.

10901. But if you have still machines out at 6d. a week, how can you reconcile that with the evidence that you have stopped the system?—I have stopped the giving out of machines on that system.

By Mr. Delevingne.

10902. You have paid yourselves several times over for the machine?—Yes.

10903. And the machine is still your property and not the property of the worker?—Certainly. I am willing for them to purchase them, and if they will purchase them out I will give them at a very small sum, because they are worn out, perhaps.

By Mr. Maddison.

10904. How long will a machine last?—It depends on the work.

By the Chairman.

10905. Are these machines sometimes called frames in the hosiery trade?—Yes, but we do not use framework. That makes openwork. This is a circular cylinder, and there are a lot of needles in the cylinder and it knits the hose.

10906. It is hosiery machinery?—Yes, hosiery machinery.

10907. Have you ever been reminded that there is a Hosiery Act?—No, I have not.

10908. That Act was passed in the year 1874, and it applies to this business. It is fair when you have been so good as to come here that I should warn you as to how the law stands. In the year 1874 an Act was passed which had this preamble: "Whereas a custom has prevailed amongst the employers in the hosiery manufacture of letting out frames and machinery to the artificers employed by them, and it is desirable to prohibit the letting out of frames and machinery and the stoppage of wages for frame rents and charges in the hosiery manufactory," and so on. You see, of course, that that would cover the kind of goods that you have been describing. I point out to you that if you have any contract of that kind for frame rent it is null and void by law, and that if you make a bargain to deduct the rent, you forfeit the sum of £5 for every offence. All that, I presume, is news to you?—It is news to me, certainly, and I will take very stringent means to see that it is changed, for I was ignorant of the law.

10909. It is only just to show you that you may be in the clutches of the law?—Yes, I want to avoid it as much as possible, because it is not a very nice game.

10910. You will not mind me giving you the hint?—I am very much obliged to you for it.

10911. Then about the rent that is still being paid. How many years has it gone on. Taking one of these machines, how long have you had it out?—I have had it for the last five years, or four or five years as far as my recollection goes. I cannot tell you accurately.

10912. You started with 1s., but you thought it right to reduce it to 6d.?—That is so.

10913. How long ago is it since you reduced it to 6d. a week?—I cannot give you the exact date, but I could tell from my books.

10914. It might be 1s. for a year, and the remainder of the time for 6d. Would it be roughly about that?—I cannot tell you from memory.

10915. I point out to you that if it was a year at 1s., it would be half paid?—Yes, at £2 12s.

10916. And for the three or four years remaining it would be more than paid. In short, when you come to think of it and count it all up, the machine is more than paid for already?—It is.

10917. You can see for yourself that that is the state of matters that the law took notice of in that Statute of 1874?—Yes.

10918. There is just one matter of fact that I should like to add to my question, and that is, can you give us any notion as to how these poor people stand in your books, I mean as to the amount of debt?—It varies very much. It all depends. They have a peculiar way of getting on in our place. A young man marries and takes up a house, or the half part of the farm of his father.

10919. I do not want the causes of it but the figures. We may have to make a thorough investigation, but if we are satisfied with the evidence you give, it may not be necessary, so give us the best calculation you can as to the amount which these people are in your debt?—That is a very difficult question, for the simple reason that if it is a large family they may be in debt £20 to me, but that may be a far less debt than to have £3 owing from another family.

10920. That is quite right?—That is so for the simple reason that they have the earning in the season.

10921. There is only one thing remaining that I will trouble you with, and that is about those two blue papers that you have put in. Just take one of them. They are both in the same terms except that they are in different names?—I just accidentally had them in my pocket when Mrs. Tennant raised the question.

10922. Here is one. The plaintiffs are Charles Kornedy and William Gewan of the City of Dublin, trustees of the Congested Districts Board, and the defendants are John Browne and Helen Boyle. Would these kind of people be farmers?—Yes. John Browne is a farmer, and since that process was issued he has settled.

10923. What I want to get an explanation about is this. They are sued for £1 7s. 1d?—That is the last instalment.

10924. I know, but the total agreement covered the sum of £7 15s. 6d.?—Yes. The machines at that time, when this man took out this machine, were a bit higher than they have been latterly. These are matters of fact, and I should like if you would get an impartial authority to see whether I give correct evidence or Miss Squire.

Mr. JOHN TAYLOR, called; and Examined.

Mr. J. Taylor.

2 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

10925. You are the Secretary of the North and North-East Lancashire Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association?—Yes.

10926. The head office appears to be in Exchange Street, Manchester?—Yes, at 12, Exchange Street, Manchester.

10927. In the membership of your Association how many workers are employed?—In the weaving branch we have about 120,000.

10928. Have the employers met with regard to the subject of fines and deductions which is before this Committee?—No.

10929. Have you any written instructions with regard to the evidence you are about to give?—I am instructed by the chairman to appear to-day.

10930. Who is the chairman?—Mr. Henry Higson.

10931. What is he?—He is chairman of the North and North-East Lancashire Manufacturers' Association.

10932. You have given 120,000 as the workpeople in the weaving branch?—Yes.

10933. And the spinners, how many?—We are only a small association of spinners. We have only about 3,500,000 spindles. The Cotton Spinners' Association have 33,000,000 spindles. I do not know whether it is their intention to give evidence here or not.

10934. How many does that represent?—It is two and a half per thousand—it is about 9,000, say. We are quite a small association of spinners.

10935. So I understand. Now when had you this conversation with Mr. Higson?—Several times. When this Committee was being formed I came up and saw Dr. Whitelegge, and he told me the Committee was being appointed, and when that was appointed we should be informed then, and whenever I got word I was to come up.

10936. Will you tell me, please, what is the system with regard to fines and deductions in the weaving branch of the cotton manufacture? Is there a system of fines and deductions?—Yes.

10937. Have you got any list of fines?—No, there is no list. The operatives objected to that in 1896 on the amendment of the Truck Act. The operatives of the weaving section came up and saw Sir Matthew White Ridley, who was then the Home Secretary, and asked him to make an order giving exemption to the cotton weavers of Lancashire, Derbyshire, Cheshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire, and that order was made giving them exemption.

10938. Sir Matthew White Ridley, as Home Secretary, issued that order?—Yes. He was Home Secretary at that time.

10939. Can you tell me are many of the workers in your Association under the Act of 1896?—I do not think there are any. They were exempted from the Act.

10940. The whole of them?—Yes, the whole of the weavers, not the spinners.

10941. But I ask you are there any of the workers who are under the Act of 1896 and not exempted?—The spinners, I believe, are. The exemption was only granted to the weavers of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire. So that I take it that the other parts where they are weaving would be under the Act of 1896, because the exemption was only made for those parts which I have named.

10942. In your district the spinners are not under the exemption?—No, but it is generally thought that they are, but it is not so. In the spinning section I do not know anyone who does inflict fines. There are practically no fines in the spinning section, and that is why I rather think you will have no one to come here to give evidence from them. The persons employed in the spinning section are mostly adult males, and they being older people there is not the same necessity for fines. It is very seldom that a fine is inflicted. In fact I do not know anyone who does inflict fines. If a man has got over twenty-one years of age, which a great number of them are, and he wilfully spoils a set of cops through gross carelessness, he would be discharged.

10943. That system, of course, as we know, works very well so far as that is concerned. It is a very well organised trade with you?—I think in the spinning it does work well.

10944. Now I want to ask you if there are no lists of fines, what is the system under which fines are arranged?—The system is this. I have got here some samples of cloth. As you are probably aware, in the weaving branch of the trade there are a large number of young persons under twenty-one years of age—a very large number of them—and they may spoil a piece of cloth. Taking this piece of cloth, (exhibiting same), the market price is 39s. 6d. a piece. There is a fault in this piece, and the weaver has been fined 6d. for this fault which this piece contains. This has been done through carelessness, and through the weaver allowing the ends to weave out. Mr. Maddison will, perhaps, know something about it, he coming from a weaving centre. That is the fault there. (Showing it on the cloth.) The weaver has allowed the ends to weave out. Then she gets a steel comb and combs the ends together, and takes a bit of soap and water and tries to doctor it up, and if that escapes the eye of the manufacturer then she does not get fined at all.

10945. What is this cloth?—Cambric. That is one system. Now I might show you one or two others. The cost of this other piece (producing cloth) is 16s., and the amount of the fine is 2d.

By Mr. Brotherton.

10946. 16s. for what amount?—Forty yards. It is a much heavier cloth than the other one.

By the Chairman.

10947. What is the length of the 39s. 6d. piece?—That would be about 120 yards, I should say. It is a selvedge fault. The length is not put to it. There is the fault in this other piece here. That has been allowed to weave out and has been doctored up as best it could. That piece would be rejected by the buyer in Manchester if it were sent up. Then the employer would have to sell that as fence, or as a spoiled piece. Then the loss to the employer on this piece would be half-a-crown to 3s.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

10948. For one fault?—Yes. The reason would be this, that if you got that piece you would not know when you were going to cut it up where that fault would come, and therefore if you were buying it for a shop you would not have it at all.

By the Chairman.

10949. But these goods are not sold for shops, are they?—They are sold, but they would not be taken at all.

10950. So that though appearing here to be in the middle it might spoil the whole of this?—Yes; then this is a fresh piece. (Producing cloth.) This is used for body cloths and turbans in India. The fine is 6d. In regard to these cloths they have to be made at short intervals with these headings that you see there. Now as I understand these are intended to be worn by the Indians as body cloths and turbans round their heads. In putting this through the preparation machine a mark comes out like that every time they make the heading. They are made from 2 yards to 10 yards, and in pairs.

10951. I think that sufficiently illustrates the practice now. I was asking you who fixed the amount of the fines?—The clothlooker in the warehouse.

10952. And the amount of fine depends on his view as to the seriousness of the fault?—Quite so.

10953. Then there are some other examples of fines. There are fines for carelessness, are there?—Yes, for carelessness in not putting these headings in at the mark. The smit mark comes up to the beam, and the girls or boys may be playing and leaving their looms running and it weaves so. If the mark gets more than 4 inches away (they are allowed 4 inches) from where it ought to be, then there is a fine of 1d. which would be inflicted, because these pieces when cut up in Manchester in pairs of turbans, or pairs of body cloths, according to the width and length of them, would then be rejected, and the piece of cloth is worth less money in Lancashire with this coloured border on, although it costs considerably more than if it had no coloured border like that.

10954. The coloured border is to suit the foreign market is it ?—That is it, and here no one will buy it.

10955. Then have you any other category for fines ?—There is wilful damage. If they break brushes and things of that kind they are fined, but it is very seldom that that does take place. It does take place occasionally.

10956.—What is the charge for that ?—Threepence, if it a 1s.—that is, a weaver would be fined 3d.

10957. Then have you any fines in that industry for bad discipline ?—Late attendance—that is, coming late in the morning.

10958. What is the charge for that ?—In some cases when they come late more than five minutes they will be fined 1d. That is for each five minutes after the first five.

10959. Then are there any other things ?—We have deductions in some cases for hot water.

10960. But it is fines I am on just now, and we will come to the deductions by-and-by ? No, we have no further fines.

10961. Have you any reason to give us for differentiating the treatment of this particular industry from other industries ?—Yes, the reason is this, that in the cotton weaving trade we have such a large number of young persons, males and females, under twenty-one years of age. Their work is such that they are very playful with each other, and if you were to say, "John Jones, you will be discharged for not having this cut at the mark" and "Mary So-and-so, you will be discharged," and they were discharged, it would work very hard on the parents. In some cases there is a father and mother, and two or three other children, and in such a case it would work hard against them, and more so in country districts where you have a mill two or three miles away from a town. If a boy is a bit careless, as many are when young, if you discharge him for not the first fault, but after he has made two or three faults, this boy has, perhaps, got to go away and live away from home in a town where he can get work, and he would have to be away from his parents.

10962. Of course you know there is a great variety of industries in the country where there are young people under twenty-one years of age like that ?—Yes.

10963. And the same principle, in your view, would apply to all young people under twenty-one ?—I should think so, because in some industries, I believe in milliners' shops, and in, perhaps, the Pottery districts, as I have heard, things take place which are very hard indeed, and I do not think the fines that I have heard of being inflicted, which are, perhaps, three times the amount of the damage, are very fair. In any case a fine should not reach the amount of the damage. I do not know of a single case in the cotton weaving districts where an employee is called upon to pay the whole of the damage.

10964. Now in the cotton weaving trade would there be any difficulty, do you think, in obtaining adequate supervision such as has been obtained in other industries which work under the Act of 1896 ?—I do not see how we could have better supervision than we have. We have an overlooker to every 100 looms. It varies a trifle, but 100 looms is quite near enough.

10965. I mean, is there anything special in your trade leading the workers into being less disciplined, or orderly, or careful than in other trades ?—They have to be very careful in minding all these threads. In these pieces there are over 4,000 threads in one of them or 16,000 in four looms, and they must be on the watch to keep the threads in their proper places, or you would have what you have in these two pieces.

10966. I do not know that you have caught my meaning. Is there anything in the character of the workmen or workwomen and the young people employed in the trade which would make them less amenable to discipline exercised under the protection of the Act of 1896 ?—No, I believe that we have as good a discipline in the cotton weaving sheds of Lancashire as anywhere. But we have a great many more young people than you have in any other industry.

10967. Now supposing the experience in other districts is that when fines have been abolished there is greater supervision required and more care, and the result of the abolition of fines is that it is succeeded by a system of warnings, and then by suspension, and then by dismissal, and suppose that has worked well in other trades, why should not it work well in yours ?—For this reason, that there is great competition, and there is a great difference between the cotton trade and any other trade in the way they work together. They work in competition with each other. Mr. Maddison, I dare say, has heard a good deal about driving. They drive themselves. There is keen competition betwixt the workers next to each other, or in what we call the next alley. They are driving as to how much money they can get, and so on, and then there is the same driving with the children in the same family. There may be two boys, or a boy and a girl, one eighteen years and the other twenty-one, and they have four looms each, and they strive as to which can get the most.

10968. They are all piece workers, are they ?—They are all piece workers. It is all piece work; every bit of it. It is striving to get the money. I say that competition goes on pretty well all through the trade. There are exceptions, but it is pretty well so all through the trade. Then if one is going behind, or if he gets fined several times for coming late, or something else, and he takes less money home, he gets very much abused by his parents when he gets home, and we have had cases where they have had three faults and let a number of ends run down, and through having to pull pieces back they have made 2s. less at the end of the week, and rather than face it at home they have gone and committed suicide.

10969. But I am still on the inquiry as to why differentiation should take place. Can you give a reason for that ? Can you tell me, if fines were abolished, do you think discipline would be impossible ?—No, we should discharge them, and then you would have suicides.

10970. Instead of fines ?—Yes, and any quantity of them.

10971. That is very strong evidence ?—Yes.

10972. Have you found any suicidal tendency in any other trade ?—I am not aware of it.

10973. It is confined to yours ?—I am not aware of it in other trades.

10974. Is there anything in the nature of the industry which would tend to unhinge these poor people's minds ?—Nothing whatever. The conditions under which they work, and the workshops, are the best in this country. I think you have that in the evidence of Commander Smith, the inspector under the Dangerous Trades' Act. That is in his report of two years ago.

10975. What did he say ?—He said the workshops of Lancashire were the best of any industry which he knew, and the conditions under which they worked were the best.

10976. So that so far as we can see there seems to be no reason why there should be a different system in the instances you are giving us from the system prevailing in other parts of the country ?—Yes. What I say is this, that if you fine a weaver a penny for a mark being out, and he is fined a penny the week following, and perhaps he is fined 2d. on the third week, if it went so far as that (I will come to the amount in losses by fines directly), and if that went on, and a boy or girl were continually not coming up to the mark, or was having these fines which I have pointed out, then we should say, "We warn you" on the first occasion, and on the second, but the third time "you will be discharged," and then the boy or the girl is discharged, and where are they going to work again ?

10977. Can you give any explanation of how good discipline has been maintained in other places after fines have been abolished ?—There is no analogy in the work, in my opinion. I do not know much of other trades, but that is so in ours.

10978. A difference in the work ?—Yes, a difference in the work. There is a difference in the conditions under which they work.

10979. Then do you know any cases where in th industry you are describing fines in point of fact, not withstanding the exemption, have been done away with —Where fines have been abolished ?

Mr. J. Taylor.

2 May 1906.

10980. Yes?—Yes.

10981. Where is that?—I could not give you the name, but I know they have been abolished in some mills, and they discharge them now.

10982. What is the result there?—I could not tell you.

10983. I hope no suicide?—I could not tell you, but there have been a good many suicides, though I could not give you the mills. I have heard of mills giving them up, but I could not give you the names of the mills.

10984. Now are you able to testify with regard to the conditions of those mills where fines have been abolished?—No, I have only heard that such has taken place, and that there have been mills where they have abolished them, but I could not give the names.

10985. I think we have got now the evidence about fines, and now we come to the subject of deductions?—But I should like to give you this before leaving the question of fines. I wrote to twenty-four mills to give me the number of workpeople they employed, the amount of wages they paid, and the total amount of fines. The number of workpeople at these twenty-four mills was 12,188, the wages paid amounted to £12,578 14s. 2d., and the amount of fines to £18 13s. 10d., which equals ·368 of a penny, or the third of a penny per week.

10986. On the total number of workers as given?—On the total number of 12,188 workpeople in twenty-four mills in three months, that is, January, February, and March. £18 13s. 10d. is the amount of the fines, which is equal to a third of a penny a week.

10987. Now how are these fines disposed of, do you happen to know?—In some cases they are given to the workpeople in the summer time, and they put something to it, and have a trip to Blackpool.

10988. And in other cases?—In some cases they are given to the infirmary and in some cases the employer keeps them.

10989. Then have you anything else to state about the fines, or may we go on to the deductions now?—I can go on to the deductions now.

10990. In respect of what things are deductions made?—They are made for hot water—in order to supply the workpeople with hot water for tea and coffee, and so on.

10991. How much is that?—In some cases 1d. a week and in some cases 2d. a week, and in a large number of cases nothing. So far as the hot water goes I should not care to back that up. I think the employers ought to give the workpeople hot water for nothing.

10992. Then the next thing is oiling?—Yes, in many districts the oiling is done by the employer as it prevents accidents. The girls and women have to get under the machine, and if they are doing it while the machine is running, and they get trapped, they constantly have accidents. I think as an instance of that I might give you this, that in the district represented by Mr. Maddison which is Burnley, the oiling is universally charged for at ½d. per loom per week. In the other districts it is not. In connection with the Burnley Employers' Association they have an insurance against workmen's compensation and employers' liability, and actions at common law. They have less accidents in the Burnley district than in any other district that you can mention. We can prove that. You can have the figures got out by the Factory inspectors.

10993. Just in order to clear my mind about that, when it is charged for at ½d. per week, is it an official of the factory that does the oiling?—It is a man employed for that purpose.

10994. Then when it is not charged for, who does it?—They do it themselves.

10995. The individuals do it?—Yes.

10996. So that when you have of course a general official charged with doing this, he can do it more skilfully and without much risk of accidents?—I do not know that he can do it any more skilfully. I do not see why he should.

10997. I mean it was in your interest that I was wanting you to explain the thing?—I do not see that at all. A weaver can oil his loom. He has got his oil can and his feather, and he can oil the various parts of the machinery which require it, just as well as a man who is going round doing it regularly.

10998. But there is more danger?—The young children, the young persons and females are not such adepts at machinery as others.

10999. They cannot do it so skilfully as a man who is always doing it?—Not the females, I should say.

11000. Then that which you have described has nothing whatever to do with the general question, which is whether you should charge for that so much per workman, or whether that which is a halfpenny a week should be treated as part of the general oncost of the work. Have you anything to say upon that point?—Yes. I think that the system of charging for oiling and cleaning, and cloth carrying and that kind of thing, is a great advantage to the workpeople. You see that Mr. Richmond, the inspector of factories for the Manchester District, as you will find in his Report for 1905, speaks of cases where all the cleaning of the looms, and the oiling of the looms, and carrying of the cloth, and the carrying of the weft, is done in such a way that the weavers have nothing at all to do but weave in the shed, and in such cases they are almost free from accidents. The weavers are charged 3½d. per loom per week, and that covers the cleaning of the looms, the carrying at the cloth, and the carrying of the weft, and the oiling of the looms.

11001. Apparently it comes to this, that so far as the thing being done is concerned you think the advantage lies in it being done by some general officer or servant of the concern. The question of charging for it afterwards is another concern, but so far as its being done well goes it seems to be done safely, and better in fact, by a general officer than by each individual doing his or her portion?—If he is a man who is driving four or six looms he would be able to carry his cloth quite as well as a man who is engaged to do the work. But taking the case of a girl who is seventeen or eighteen years of age, and who has got to carry a number of these pieces of cloth, up to 120 yards long, and who has got to carry them in her arms in this way (illustrating) through the machinery, she cannot do it so well as a man.

11002. It is in your favour that I am putting this, and I want to get the balance of your judgment on this on the whole; it favours it being done by a general servant of the concern charged with that particular class of work?—Yes.

11003. That is instead of putting it on the individual worker?—Yes.

11004. The balance of convenience lies there?—Yes.

11005. Whether it is to be charged for or not is a different matter, as you say?—Yes.

11006. Then is there anything else in the way of deductions?—I should like to give this case, because this is a case which Mr. Maddison could easily inquire into. It is in his district and is like a few others. This is the case of W 4. There are 1,520 looms in this shed and we charged 3½d. per loom for doing the work I have enumerated. We employ for doing this work in place of the weavers thirteen cleaners at 24s. a week, two cloth carriers at 24s. a week, three weft carriers, one at 15s. and two at 11s., and three extra clothlookers at 16s. 6d. The increase in the weavers' wages is from 2s. to 3s. a week after deductions are made. This you will find in Mr. Richmond's Annual Report for 1905. I went with Mr. Richmond the superintending factory inspector to inquire into this case, and we found that the accidents were practically nil, that the people obeyed the factory regulations, and came out immediately the engine stopped. He questioned whether both the men and women liked this system, and found they were delighted with it, and they said they would not go back to the other at any price.

11008. What are cross headings?—At every seventy-five yards you have to put a cross heading in. Instead of being put in by weft, it is put in with gold thread, and that costs us 6d. per bobbin of fifty yards. You can see very plainly that if the people are not very careful in using that gold there is very great waste, and we charge them 6d. per bobbin to allow for it back again in the price of the piece. Whatever length they have got to put in we allow that price back in the weaving price.

11009. So that ultimately it is not a deduction really ?—No, not ultimately. I think they have some gain if they are careful. Those are all the deductions we make in the mills so far as I know, and I have been acquainted with them for twenty-five years.

By Mr. Walsh.

11010. With regard to the £18 13s. 10d., did I understand that was for the whole of these twenty-four mills for a week ?—No, for thirteen weeks.

11011. That is to say, it took thirteen weeks for these twenty-four mills to get together a total of £18 13s. 10d. in fines ?—That is it.

11012. So that really the twenty-four mills would only have about £1 8s. 0d. a week ?—To give an instance, I have one mill here employing 147 people, and the fines run in this way : 3s. 7d., 4s. 7d., 3s. 5d., 4s. 7d., 4s. 8d., 1s. 11d., 3s. 7d., 2s., 1s. 11d., 3s. 3d., 2s. 6d., 2s. 7d., 1s. 11d.

11013. That is per week ?—Yes. That is £2 0s. 6d. for the thirteen weeks, or an average of 3s. 1d. per week for 147 people.

11014. So that that only bears out what I have said, that it gives about £1 8s. 0d. during each week of the quarter for the twenty-four mills ?—Yes, for the twenty-four mills.

11015. So that, taking the twenty-four mills through, they are charging at the rate of about 1s. 2d. or 1s. 3d. a week ?—Yes.

11016. For the average, of course, that is ?—Yes, but not per person.

11017. No, it is for the whole of the people employed ?—Yes, and it is about 3s. 1d. Now this is another mill where they make shirtings, and the fines are not so great as in that. In this mill they employ 1,237 workpeople, and the fines for the first and following weeks are 2s. 4d., 4s. 7d., 2s. 10d., 5s. 6d., 5s., 4s. 2d. 9s. 2d., 7s. 4d., 5s. 7d., 6s. 1d., 8s. 1d., 5s. 3s., 10d. For the thirteen weeks the average is 5s. 3d.

11018. So that you have 1,237 workpeople, and the fines inflicted upon them amount to an average of about 5s. 3d. a week ?—Yes, for thirteen weeks.

11019. Throughout the whole quarter ?—Yes.

11020. That is very interesting. Are we to understand that you really believe that the discipline of the mills is dependent upon this system of fining being maintained ? Yes.

11021. That is to say that the discipline itself is so precarious that it depends upon the infliction of fines varying from 1s. 4d. to 5s. 3d. per week ?—Yes.

11022. And this 5s. 3d. is the amount in the case of 1,237 workpeople ?—Yes.

11023. But after all the discipline of the people, which does really seem to be very great, taken as a whole, and which you yourself admit to be probably as high as in any district in the country, is yet so precarious that it would break down if this small amount of fines is taken away ?—Yes; and why do I say that ?

11024. I should be glad if you would answer that question yourself ?—I will take you into Lancashire and we will go into the mills when it is booking-up day, that is on Wednesday and Thursday. The cloth comes in and they send someone down with a good deal worse fault than that in a piece costing 17s. or 18s. a piece. They ask the weaver what he has been doing. "I do not know," he says, "I went off my looms and when I came back they went like that." He is asked, "Why did you leave your loom running ?" and he says, "I do not know." Then they say you will be fined 2d. for that. What will he say to you ? He will say, "Nay, I shall not ; give me my money, I am going." That is what is going on to-day for 2d., and he gives up his situation.

11025. But would that not be one of those very small and isolated cases which would soon settle themselves. Would not the man who did that probably find himself unable to obtain employment at the next mill, or for a long distance round ?—No, he can go and get work anywhere to-day.

11026. But to-day I am afraid you are in a season of prosperity. You are booming ?—I am afraid we are not.

11027. I do not know. I am an outsider and know nothing about it, but do you not think it would settle itself. Would the man who so readily threw up his position not find himself when he was speaking to the next employer, or to the officials of the next employer, met with certain searching questions which would probably reduce his chance of employment ?—No. Take it in the town of Blackburn, with 87,000 looms, and you can reckon there are three looms to each persons. If you divide the number of looms by three, you get the number of persons employed. So that you will get pretty nearly 30,000 people in Blackburn. Therefore if a man leaves a mill and goes to the next mill a quarter of a mile away, do you think they would ask him where did you work last, or what did you get discharged for ? They ask nothing, and if he is a decent man looking for a job and he can manage four looms he walks in and starts.

11028. Then you do not think that if a man is so reckless or so little considerate as to throw up his position rather than accept a fine he would soon find himself in the position of making it difficult for him to obtain employment?—It is done every day of my life to-day in these little places, and if we were to inflict a heavy fine then it would be the talk of the town. "I would not work in that shop," they would say

11029. Are you aware that there are many mills in Lancashire engaged in this business, and we have had witnesses who have told us that in many mills there are no fines at all inflicted and that they have found no lack of discipline. Are you aware that there are many mills of that kind ?—I am not, and I should like to know where they are. They ought to give the names of them.

11030. You are not aware, however, that that is the result obtained ?—No. I have been told there are some that have abolished fines, but I do not know who they are.

11031. But in the spinning it is abolished ?—It is.

11032. It has never existed there ?—It is altogether different. There is not the same reason for fines, and besides that, you have adult labour—mostly adult males.

11033. Then, I think, I understand you to say that in four looms there were about 16,000 threads ?—Yes, some of them more than that and some less.

11034. On a fabric like that which you have shown the Committee ?—Yes.

11035. You said that this necessitated great vigilance and that they ought to be very careful ?—They have to stop the loom if it goes wrong. The threads have to go through there (illustrating), and they put the work in, and as it goes back they put the work in again and as it goes along if one thread gets broken cross ways, it locks there, and it gets the other five or six ends together and makes a mess of the cloth.

11036. I take it then this needs an almost perfect oversight, so far as human oversight can be said to be perfect ?—No, I would not say that. If it is fine cloth you have to look pretty well after it, but if you get to some of these thinner cloths it does not need the same watching.

11037. But it needs pretty well constant oversight ?—Yes. You have to stand betwixt four looms.

11038. What area would they occupy ?—This is a 45-inch loom and you have two in length and then two here (illustrating), two on one side and two on the other side.

11039. That is an area probably of five square yards ?—Less than that.

11040. Are many of these accidents that take place really beyond the control of the worker ?—No, not at all. If it was so that there was a large number of threads coming up broken and he found that he could not well doctor them, there would be a claim for bad material and it has all got to be paid for.

11041. I have in my mind a technical expression called a broken pick. I do not know whether this applies ?—That is not in the warping threads at all. That is across.

11042. But this applies to the weaving industry however ?—Yes.

11043. Is this broken pick not the result of the use of bad material in a piece that breaks on its coming through the machine ?—No, a broken pick in a piece of cloth is called a weft thread that should reach right across but breaks in the centre here. (Illustrating.) Then the weft is on this side and there is no weft on that side, and you have to turn the loom back and take out the broken picks.

Mr. J. Taylor.

When you do that you have to pay 10 per cent. extra for it. That is provided for in the list.

11044. Are these people ever fined for broken picks?—Certainly, if they do not take them out: if you put it on the card when you give them the particulars of the work, and then the pick has to be found and the broken picks taken out, and you have got to pay 10 per cent. extra. Certainly if the weaver does not take out the broken picks he will be fined for it.

11045. In that case, however, the 10 per cent. is really an equivalent for the fine which is deducted at a later stage?—No, the weaver would receive 10 per cent. extra wages because there would be extra labour involved in taking out these broken picks.

11046. That is exactly the point I am putting to you?—But if he did not take out the broken picks he would be fined probably 2d.

11047. He really has received already an equivalent for the fine which may be taken at a later stage?—Yes. If it was a piece of that kind of special cloth, there has got to be a good job made of it. The weaving price for this would probably be 4s. He gets 10 per cent. for pick finding. That is 4¾d. extra. If he does not take it out he is fined probably 2d.; so that he gets 2¾d. extra then.

11048. You said that under such circumstances he is really fined, but he receives more than an equivalent in the extra rate put on the product?—Yes.

11049. Now as to the increased price, are there cases where such an arrangement has not been made? Do you suggest that there are cases where the 10 per cent. arrangement is not entered into with the workman?—Certainly, where he is not asked to take out the broken picks. The standard list is based upon merchantable cloth. But in ordinary cloths like this (exhibiting cloth) with a few broken picks, there would be nothing said about it, because you would have to have a very practical eye to see it.

11050. We have been told that an imperfectly running loom or machine, for which we understand the workman is not responsible, will often cause this broken pick and that that is a matter over which the workman has no control, but yet they are fined because the broken pick results in that case?—I do not know any case of that sort. I know cases where the workman has objected to the fine when the cloth has been most fearfully spoilt from beginning to end and he has perhaps run to the extent of 1s. and when it has not been fit scarcely to send for cleaning windows with. That piece has then been sent down to my office and Mr. Cross, the secretary of the Amalgamation, will come down and meet me and look the thing through. He is the secretary of the Northern Counties Association. I will say, "Now, Cross, what do you think about it," and he will say, "It deserves all it gets"; and the piece is sent back to the mill.

11051. Would your opinion be altered at all if you really were faced with the fact that very many weaving mills have given up the system of fines and have found that their discipline has not been in any way relaxed?—No. Are you aware that the Weavers Union have two inspectors in every weaving shed of over 400 looms?

11052. No, I am not aware of that?—They have mill representatives for every mill of over 400 looms and one of these representatives, when a complaint comes in, goes to see the ticket, which is about the size of an envelope, with all the particulars on it, such as the price and where the pick is to be found and so on. He takes those particulars to his Trades Union Secretary and he gets the price and he pulls his measure out of his pocket and measures it to see that it is right, and he gets a piece of the work and runs it in a roll to see that it is of the right length. The yarns are very often medium, so that that does not make very much difference. If a weaver gets fined 2d. she goes to John Jones say, and says: "I have been fined 2d. for it and I do not think I should be fined." The answer is: "Very well, I will go down and see him," and he goes and says, "Where is that piece belonging to the loom?" and he shows it to him and he looks at it and he says: "That is right, I do not think you should be fined 2d. for that." You have then either to burk that fine or have them put out in the street, and you are not going to put them out in the street for 2d.

11053. Hardly?—We are not the masters by any means.

11054. You speak about one matter as being a very serious matter and it struck me to ask if there is any real foundation for the statement that suicides would often result if this system of fines was to be made illegal by Parliament?—Yes.

11055. Are we to understand from that that the people in the mills are very eager to get the product of their work there?—No.

11056. Then what are we to understand?—I refer to the competition betwixt themselves and the talk that there is if one gets discharged in that one mill. Mary Jones or John So-and-so gets sacked for spoiling his work and then does not like to face it at home. He is perhaps a lad of seventeen or eighteen years of age and rather than have his father take the strap off his back and lay it about him, he will go and get into some water. There is a very great deal more driving with the parents than with the mill owners. We have had cases of that kind before my Committee.

11057. I am quite sure you do not make this statement at random, but have you no means of verifying it, because it seems to me to be the most serious statement that has been laid before this Committee. There has been a good deal said about driving in mills?—Yes, and you have seen cases of people drowning themselves.

11058. Yes, but then the evidence has been given by the people who have lived at home. They have always alleged it to be something that has occurred at the mill? and they have said that it has not been the brutality of the parents of the drowned person?—We had a girl at Darwen who poisoned herself through nothing at all except that she dared not face the thing at home.

11059. I do not intend to press that any further except to say that it seems to me a very grave statement?—It is a very serious matter indeed to drive young people to that. If they are not to be fined and we have got to discharge them on the third warning, then they will go and do that sort of thing, which is a very serious matter indeed.

11060. You spoke of it becoming known when these people are fined for some small offence?—At most mills.

11061. It is well known in the mill?—Yes, in the neighbourhood.

11062. And there is some little ridicule or odium, so to speak, laid upon them by their work mates in the mill?—Yes.

11063. Do you not think it would tend to improve discipline if you took the fines away?—No, I do not think so.

11064. The fact that a person is more or less indifferent and has already received a caution twice or three times, and probably dismissal, do you not think the open knowledge of their associates would tend to improve discipline?—I do not think so.

11065. Does the open knowledge that a person is careless and an indifferent workman not tend to cause censure to be visited upon them by their mates and gradually lift them up to the standard of the others?—No.

11066. It does not?—No, we have had lots of cases where it does not.

11067. Does it improve them in many cases?—It may do so in some cases.

11068. It is quite a natural thing to wish to stand well with your fellows?—We have a large number of people and it is altogether different from any other industry; there is no other industry where they get the same wage or have the same conditions under which they work, and there is no other industry where there is the keen competition there is between the workers themselves that there is in the cotton trade.

By Mr. Maddison.

11069. You made it plain in your evidence, I think, that it is the fact that there are so many young people employed in weaving as distinguished from spinning that induces you to think the fining system ought to be retained?—Yes.

11070. What proportion of the fines do you think in weaving sheds are those imposed on adults, male and female ?—I could not tell you. I really could not answer that question. I do not know how that is possible to be got at, except by having the mills to mark the fines. I do not see how you could get at it in any other way, and I have been a mill manager myself.

11071. There are a good many fines as far as they go which are imposed upon adults in the weaving trade ?—There are some, but I do not think they are anything like the extent of those imposed on people under twenty-one years of age.

11072. No, you would expect that, of course ?—A man having his wife and family minds his work better than a young silly lad or lass running about and making fun. A father and mother are more steady and attend to their work and their labour.

11073. But I suppose that if there were no large proportion of young people in the weaving trade, you would have no hesitation as to fines being made illegal ?—If they were adults, no.

11074. Take the spinning, what age are piecers and creelers. Are not they, sometimes, young ?—Yes.

10175. And they are in the spinning trade ?—You see piecers and creelers of twenty-six and twenty-eight years of age, and what we call a little piecer, where there are little piecers. Take a mill with twenty thousand spindles. That mill will probably have five of them. These piecers and creelers are engaged by the minder, the spinner, not by the employer, the spinning master. If you were a minder, and I were your big piecer, and we had a little creeler, you would engage him and pay his wages.

11076. There are about 20,000 full spinners, I understand ?—Yes.

11077. Then there are over 41,000 piecers and creelers, and what proportion of those piecers and creelers will be below twenty-one ?—I really could not tell you. There are not many, I think.

11078. A fair number, is not there ?—I could not say.

11079. I mean employed by the company, or mill ?——No, I do not know exactly. I do not know a single mill that engages the piecer or the creeler. I do not know a single instance of it.

11080. His wages are paid by the spinner, are they ?—They are paid by the minder. If you were a minder you would draw the whole of the wages from a pair of mules. If you and I were joiners then one of us would take the lead, and if you took the lead you would draw the money and give me my portion after having paid the little piecer or the creeler.

11081. So that in the spinning trade, so far as direct employment by the piece is concerned, your evidence is that there is very little child labour or labour below twenty-one ?—There is scarcely any.

11082. Now you have put in here some cloths giving us some examples of faults. In the ordinary way, unless there is an appeal to the union official, the cloth-looker is the final court of appeal about it, is not he ?—No.

11083. He is not the final court of appeal—that is to say, putting it in another way, unless the party appeals to his committee man the overlooker imposes the fine ?—Yes.

11084. And in the ordinary way he passes ?—No.

11085. What happens then ?—Supposing he is a man who is in the union, and he thinks the fine is too much, or that he ought not to be fined at all, he will say, "I will see the manager about it," or he will say "I will not be fined," and then the cloth-looker will send for the manager and he will examine it.

11086. Does that often happen ?—Yes, very often.

11087. But still, I suppose, a large proportion of these fines will be taken on the ipse dixit of the cloth-looker ?—A fair number of them.

11088. Is there any motive in the clothlooker for finding a fair number of faults ?—None whatever. He does not find them. The man who inflicts the fine does not find the faults. Supposing we have a shed with 500 looms, and there are two cloth-lookers, and looking over the machine the cloth-looker comes across a fault, and he says 'Put that out," he will say, "It is fined 2d," or 3d.

11089. It comes to the same thing ?—Yes, but he does not look for the fault. Mr. J. Taylor.

11090. But he has to decide whether there is a fault ?—Yes. 2 May 1907.

11091. Is it reasonable to assume that a new cloth-looker would be a bit keen to get right with the bosses?—Assuming he is, he is a member of the Textile Trades Federation, the cloth-lookers and weavers are all amalgamated in one union, and if the tackler, is behaving himself badly, or the cloth-looker the same, then he is brought before the federation and he is dealt with there. He is practically a member of the same union.

11092. That is to say that trades unionism helps to adjust things in that trade as in others ?—Yes.

11093. But unless the trade union machinery is put into operation there is a danger of what I have suggested occurring, I suppose ?—I should not think so.

11094. Then about bad material. Of course I am not a practical man, as you know, and I know nothing about your business, except just what I learn through gentlemen like yourself, and the operatives, but there are, as you know very well, some very loud complaints, and very widespread dissatisfaction about alleged bad material ?—Yes.

11095. I suppose, without wanting you, of course, to commit yourself in any sort of way in a question that will probably have to come before you in a very pointed form, there is some danger of bad material, and there is some bad material as a matter of fact goes into the sheds, is not there ?—There is what is alleged to be bad material, and when we find it we pay for it.

11096. This bad material may easily contribute to faults, may not it ?—Certainly. If it is bad material it would contribute to faults.

11097. And amongst all the mass of stuff that goes into the sheds throughout the year, would not you say that there are at times faults caused through bad material which the men are fined for ?—No.

11098. You think that your system is so perfect, and the union is so perfect, that nothing escapes ?—Yes, and I should be glad to give you a case. You know Y 4. He has got 1,400 looms; the average is 6s. 3d. per loom. That is 25s. a week for a four-loom weaver. There are lots there, both boys and girls, under twenty-one years of age receiving that wage. They alleged bad material at that mill, and how did it come about ? The employer went into the shed and saw a beam or two which was not quite up to the mark, as he thought, and he said to the weavers, "The taper has made a mistake with this. I will put 10 per cent. extra on them. Try and make as good a job as you can." They did. But it leaked out amongst the other weavers that they were getting something extra, and they said: "It is not right. We should get something. We have had bad weft at times, and we want something." They went before the union and said they wanted 1s. and the employer rather than have any trouble offered 6d. a loom, but they refused to take it, and these 1,400 looms are standing to-day.

11099. But that does not prove very much ?—But that shows where it was alleged to be bad material, and the employer sees it and pays extra.

11100. But he would not pay sufficient ?—But it settles it itself.

11101. But it does not settle it with me, because I want to press it, and when you think that it is leading to strikes about bad material is it not reasonable to suppose that in the ordinary working of a mill there is a danger of men being fined largely on the ipse dixit of a clothlooker for faults which are largely made through bad material ?—No. We have an examination by the men on each side. Supposing you allege bad work in a mill, they go and look at the work.

11102. But I am not talking about that at all. I believe that that is perfect, and when they get together in that way I know nothing nearer perfection; but I am talking of cases where a woman, a non-unionist, does not like to appeal, but takes the fine as it is imposed, and the only question is: Is not there some real danger of unfair fining under such a system ?—I do not think so.

Mr. J. Taylor.

11103. Now you stated, as I understood you, that the fines were either given to a holiday fund, or to infirmaries, or to some similar object?—I said in some cases, and in some cases the employer takes them himself. I think those are the words I used.

11104. Now Mr. Shackleton was asked, Where do the fines go? Into the employer's pocket, so far as the cotton trade is concerned, it was said. Then someone said: "Is that an invariable rule?" and his reply was: "They are set off for damages, but in the first place they go into his pocket." Then a further question was, "Does he put them into a sick fund, or anything of that kind?" and then Mr. Shackleton replied: "No, we have nothing of that kind at all"?—The next time I see Mr. Shackleton I will ask him about that, and to give me the names of the mills where this happens.

11105. He may have been speaking of his own immediate district?—I could give two names.

11106. Perhaps you will qualify your answer to the question, that these are the exceptions?—Not by any means.

11107. You think the fines do go in the majority of cases to a holiday fund, or charitable purposes?—I do not say the majority. The workpeople in some cases put something to them, and they go to Blackpool, and in some cases the fines go to the infirmary.

11108. Now about the weaving sheds. We have been told about where fines are not in force, and again Mr. Shackleton preferred not to give the names, as you have done, and he told us of his own knowledge, which we all accept, that he knew of two firms in his district which did without fines?—He stated they were in his district. I have not been able to find that out, but I will try to find it out.

11109. I think he said in his district, but do not take that quite from me. But anyhow he said there were two firms, and he assured us, and it has a very important bearing on your evidence, that from those two firms he had had no complaints as to arbitrary discharging, and that the altered system had given the union no trouble at all. I think it is fair to assume from that that the discipline in the mill had been maintained?—I should like to know where the mill is, and the kind of stuff they make. I guarantee they do not make those. (Exhibiting samples of cloth.)

11110. Perhaps you know they do not make them in that district?—But they do make them in that district very largely.

11111. Now you have given it in your evidence that you are against any fine or deduction which even equalled the amount of the damage?—Yes.

11112. And, much more, was over the damage?—Yes.

11113. So that you only want to fine for disciplinary purposes?—For disciplinary purposes.

11114. So that the whole question in your mind is, "Can we maintain the discipline in our mills, or in our sheds, without fines"?—Yes. We can.

11115. You can maintain it without fines?—Yes.

11116. You can maintain it without fines?—Yes, by discharging, and then you will have trouble, and it will be a very great hardship on the parents.

11117. Mr. Walsh suggested to you that there might be an alternative by which you could get the same deterrent effect. You have told us about those deplorable suicides which we know have taken place in Lancashire, but which are not always traced quite to the cause you have indicated, that is, caused through parents knowing they have been fined, or that they have not done enough work in some cases?—Yes.

11118. Now, supposing in some sort of way any fault was recorded in a list that the operatives could see, or in some way that would bring it to the knowledge of the operatives, so as to stir up the esprit de corps of these people, would not that have the same effect?—With the mill that adheres to that they would have a strike to-morrow if they did that. They object to it now, and it has been abolished in Burnley, as you know.

11119. I see great objections to any display of the kind that has been suggested, but what I am after is whether you and your fellow employers in your resources could not devise something that would have the same deterrent effect. For instance, the fines are known now, are not they?—Yes.

11120. How are they known?—Only to the weaver.

11121. Then how can it be any deterrent?—Take a penny out of a Lancashire weaver's pocket and see whether it has any deterrent effect or not.

11122. He is a sensible man, of course?—By his pocket and his throat is the only way to get at a Lancashire man.

11123. Still there are other qualities the Lancashire man has, and what I want to get at from you is this: You have told us of the deterrent effect of these fines, now that deterrent effect can only come through some one knowing about it, the parents or the other workers. If some record could be kept in the mills which would be equally known, the same people would know it, and why would not the same deterrent effect take place?—Because the officials would not allow you to use it.

11124. Instead of fining, put the man or the woman, the boy or the girl, on a record of offenders. The cloth looker would bring them down and he would say, "Here is the fault, you will have to go on that record;" if they were continually on the record get rid of them?—Certainly that is what he should do.

11125. Why would not that have just as good a disciplinary effect as fining?—I should like to see those names put on the board to see the effect.

11126. I do not want you to put them on a board at all; but make the same record in your books as you do now of fines, nothing more, nothing less, but still let it be known to the persons who are on the record book that to that extent they have failed in their duty. Now would not some system of that sort have just the same deterrent effect and maintain discipline just as well, and avoid what many people think wrong, that is the fining system?—I do not think it would be the slightest good.

By Mr. Delevingne.

11127. Only one question about the subject of closet cleaning. It has been given in evidence before us that deductions are sometimes made from wages for the cleaning of closets in the mill?—Yes.

11128. Have you any knowledge of that?—If the weavers' officials will acquaint me with which mill it is, I will see that it is stopped.

11129. But you do not know of any case in which it is done?—It used to be done, but it is not done now to my knowledge. I do not know of a single case.

11130. Are there any cases in which the weavers have to do the cleaning themselves?—The closet?

11131. Yes?—I never heard of such a case in my life.

FORTY-FIRST DAY.

Mr. ISAAC HODGES, called; and Examined.

Mr. I. Hodges.

8 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

11132. You are a mining engineer and colliery manager?—Yes.

11133. You have had twenty-five years' experience in Derbyshire and Yorkshire?—Yes.

11134. You are director and general mine manager of Henry Briggs, Son & Co., Ltd., Whitwood Collieries, Normanton, Yorkshire?—Yes.

11135. They employ 3,500 workmen, with an output of upwards of one million tons per annum?—Yes.

11136. In giving your evidence here to-day, whom do you represent?—The National Association of Colliery Managers.

11137. Has your Association taken into consideration the subject of the remit to this Committee by the Home Office about truck and fines and deductions from wages?—No, I do not think they have.

11138. In what circumstances are you good enough to tender your evidence?—I was giving evidence before the Royal Commission on Mines, upon matters connected with coal-dust explosions. That Royal Commission have taken evidence on the question of fines, and I asked for permission to give evidence on that subject. I think representations were made to your secretary, who then asked me to give evidence here.

11139. Could we obtain, do you think, the evidence that you gave before that Royal Commission?—I did not give evidence on fines or deductions. The Commission are issuing an interim report on coal-dust explosions alone; but they have already taken evidence, principally from all the inspectors of mines, as to the question of fines and discipline in mines.

11140. Do I understand that the evidence that you now tender is on behalf of the colliery managers?—Yes.

11141. Have they considered your evidence?—The council of the association met and appointed me as their representative; I think they offered other names also.

11142. Do you know that Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis was a witness here?—I did not, until I arrived at one of your meetings at which I was called.

11143. Do you know the general tenor of his evidence?—I do not; I have not seen it.

11144. I understand that you have considered the subject of the practice of fining workmen at collieries?—Yes.

11145. We cannot go into much detail about it, because we have already had so much evidence on the matter from Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis. His evidence was substantially to this effect: that you ought to maintain a system of fines in mines; do you agree with that?—I do, distinctly.

11147. Therefore you favour the continuance of a system of fines, even in cases where there might be a prosecution?—Oh, yes.

11148. Has it ever occurred to your body to consider whether you were not interfering with the due carrying out of the criminal code in the matter?—Yes, but we have not thought that we were interfering. We have to take several things into consideration. The laying of a prosecution is a serious burden upon a colliery manager's work. The Coal Mines Regulation Act insists upon daily attendance of the manager at the mine. Now, in the case of a prosecution, the manager must attend at a solicitor's office to lay the information, and he must attend at the hearing. It always takes up a portion of two days' time or more. The manager cannot be in two places at one time, therefore he is not carrying out the Coal Mines Regulation Act when absenting himself from the mine. Of course, that is not an absolute deterrent where the offence is a serious one, one involving danger to the offender's life or to the lives of his fellow workers; and in cases of cruelty to animals we also usually prosecute.

11149. So that I think I am right in the point I started with; that with regard to a number of fines they are imposed, although the offences for which they are imposed would be recognised by the criminal law as the subject of a criminal prosecution?—Certainly.

11150. And you, as colliery managers, are prompted to the course of fining, having in view the expense and the absence of the manager from the mine which the carrying out of the criminal law would entail?—Yes, and the general inconvenience both to the delinquent and to the employer.

11151. You exercise your judgment, do you not, as to whether the man should be reported to the criminal authorities or not? I mean in view of the heinousness of the offence?—Yes, we do.

11152. I think you will admit that that state of law, oscillating between criminal prosecution on the one hand and the judgment of the colliery manager or owner on the other, as to substituting a system of fining, could not be logically defended?—I am afraid it could not. In the case of many offences I take it there is something to be said on the part of the workman, sometimes more and sometimes less, and the colliery manager judges whether an offence is sufficiently serious to compel a prosecution or whether the workman shall be fined. In collieries the conditions are exceptional. The workings are very extensive; in the company with which I am connected we have 3,500 workmen, and they are scattered about at very great distances apart. We have special officials to look after the safety of the mine, and these officials are the first to come in contact with any delinquent and to deal with him; it is only on their representation that a serious offence or a series of offences has occurred that the manager takes action at all.

11153. Please understand that there is no suggestion of blame or anything of that sort; we only want to get at how the system works. Now will you tell me with regard to the cautions? I suppose a system of cautions is adopted in the interests of discipline?—Certainly; and, considering the multifarious rules by which colliers have to be guided, the number of cautions, of course, is very great. There cannot be an hour of the day but that some caution is administered to somebody or other.

Mr. J. Hodges.

11154. Then comes a stage when they might be prosecuted, but you impose fines?—Yes.

11155. Do you ever impose fines in cases where there is no case for a prosecution, or would you approve of that?—Yes, I should. For instance, there may be a series of damages to certain property or certain machinery, which it would be very difficult to substantiate in, I suppose, a criminal court, and yet in which it is very necessary that something should be done.

11156. What would be the difficulty of establishing such a case in a criminal court?—The principal one would be the great inconvenience of it; it would not be worth it.

11157. But, apart from inconvenience, I fancy it could be established in a criminal court, could it not?—Will you allow me to refer to the list of fines at the Whitwood Collieries for last year, and I will see if I can point to any that could not be strictly established? I have scheduled a list of all the fines at these collieries for your information, so that you can see exactly what we fine for.

11158. But can I not have your view upon this? We should value your view. Are you in favour of fining for the purpose of discipline, even although the offence for which the fine was imposed would not if proved, come within the criminal law?—I am afraid I am not quite sufficient of a lawyer to be able to say what always does come within the criminal law. The only point that I am a little doubtful about is, in case, say, of a dirty engine, an engine which is not kept properly clean, and as to which cautions and repeated warnings have had no effect, I am not at all clear whether that would come within the criminal law; but I take it that it is distinctly in the interests of discipline that that offender should be finable.

11159. Do you know any colliery where fines are not imposed?—I do not.

11160. Do you think that discipline could not be maintained without fines?—I think the same high standard of discipline could not.

11161. Have you ever considered the subject of suspending a man or a boy?—Yes.

11162. I mean suspending him for a week?—Not a week.

11163. Or for a short time?—It is very rarely that we suspend; if we do suspend it is merely for the purpose of investigation; suspension usually results in a final dismissal.

11164. So that you have never resorted to a system of what you might call temporary suspension?—It is very much objected to by the workmen—exceedingly so. They lose their day's wages or week's wages as the case may be, and they feel that it is an arbitrary punishment that they are compelled to stand whether they are innocent or guilty.

11165. I gather that in the large majority of cases the caution system suffices for the purpose of discipline?—In enormously the larger proportion of cases.

11166. You give an illustration from the Whitwood Collieries, you say: "Upwards of 200 boys start work each year; of a total of 500 boys employed during 1906 seventeen only were fined, and one was prosecuted"—we will keep out the one prosecuted. Is it your evidence that you could not have maintained discipline among these 500 boys unless you had fined the seventeen?—Either fined the seventeen or prosecuted the seventeen.

11167. Your evidence is so strong as that?—It is. A boy is usually less amenable to discipline than a man; in his case it does need some punishment to prevent the repetition of the offence, it is essential to enforce the rules of the mine.

11168. The highest fine you say during the year was 10s. and the lowest was 6d.?—Yes.

11169. The prosecution there referred to resulted in a fine of 2s. 6d., and costs 23s. 6d.?—Yes.

11170. Then, I think you have experience where the father of the boy appeals for a heavy fine in lieu of prosecution?—It is almost the unvarying experience.

11171. So that apparently prosecution is a very severe deterrent?—It is very much objected to by the boys' parents.

11172. But it is a very severe deterrent?—I am not so sure that it is a severe deterrent; it depends a good deal on the character of the boy.

11173. Suppose he were a good boy?—If he were a good boy, our idea is that the stigma of being fined at a magistrate's court often lowers the boy's character until he does not care, and in a pure spirit of bravado with other boys he does not object to being prosecuted again. For a first prosecution the boy's father almost unvaryingly asks for a fine.

11174. Then you say "particulars of a recent case are produced where after a plaint had been made against a boy for contravention of a special rule the father appealed to have the summons withdrawn"?—Yes I have sent you particulars of that; you have the particulars in the letters that I have sent to the secretary.

11175. What did the officials of the Miners' Union want you to do?—They asked particularly that the boy should not be prosecuted. I said that something ought to be done to mark the offence, because it was very serious. They offered to call a special public meeting of the miners at which all the boys should attend in order that attention might be called to the matter. That was giving more effective public attention to the matter than could have been got by a prosecution before a magistrates' court; it was much more effective.

11176. I gather that your evidence would rather point, if the law is to be more regular, to the Coal Mines Regulation Acts being altered to some extent in order to give an option to the managers to put the criminal law into motion or not into motion according as they thought best?—That is so. At the present time the inspectors of mines have the opportunity of revising these fines. They see them. A register must be kept of the fines, which the mines inspector can look at, and if he finds that anything unfair or unreasonable has been done he can prosecute the manager.

11177. Now give us these figures. You say "at the Whitwood Collieries during the year 1906 out of a total of 3,430 workmen only fifty-one (including the seventeen boys) were fined £10 0s. 6d., an average per man of less than a penny." Then there were three prosecutions, and you think that these prosecutions would have been increased to fifty-four if fines had been prohibited?—Yes.

11178. Is not there a middle course to that, namely, that you should have cautioned the men up to the point where you thought it was worthy of prosecution, and then prosecuted?—But then we had cautioned the men up to the point of fining.

11179. But suppose fines were abolished; you would caution them up to the point where it was absolutely necessary to prosecute and then you would prosecute, what is the harm of that?—I set out the harm in my statement. The harm is that it is very much more inconvenient and much more objectionable. First of all, the miners would absolutely refuse to consent to it. I do not know anything that would injure the friendly relations between the workmen and employers in the coal mining industry more than that we should be constantly taking the men before the magistrates courts. Those collieries who have tried it have tried it at their very great cost.

11180. You have explained about the serious cases, now we will go to the others?—I hope you have correctly understood my remark as to dismissals. Dismissal is not a punishment that always meets the gravity of the offence. Some workmen may have work that they do not care particularly about keeping; dismissal in that case is very little punishment. In other cases where a man has employment that he is very satisfied with and would much dislike to lose, dismissal is a serious punishment. I am afraid that if we were not allowed to fine, and prosecutions were compulsory, then where all warnings and cautions had been non-effective, we should rely on dismissals, and I am convinced that punishment by dismissal could not be made to meet the circumstances of the case. I may say that I have had a meeting with the representatives of the miners at the Whitwood Collieries upon this matter. Possibly you have had evidence from the miners; I do not know, but the miners in our Collieries are most anxious that fines should not be prohibited; they say that prosecutions would be a much more serious burden.

11181. Then it is necessary, is it not, to have power to deduct from wages at the request of the workmen for objects connected with their welfare?—Certainly, that is most important.

11182. At the Whitwood Collieries deductions have or are being made for tools and explosives?—Yes.

11183. For house rent?—Yes.

11184. Those are of course included under the existing law?—Yes.

11185. Then for coal and leading. What is coal and leading?—Coal is the workmen's coal that is supplied to them at a very cheap rate; the collier gets his coal at 2s. a ton.

11186. Then there are deductions for check weighmen?—We have power to make that deduction under the Coal Mines Regulations Act, that is for the payment of the men's weighman.

11187. Then there are deductions for the workmen's annual excursion?—Yes; they arrange an excursion. In each excursion we contribute generally 2s. out of 3s.

11188. Who is "we"?—The company. The company give that to the workmen; the workmen name their place of excursion——

11189. Are they free to decline to contribute, or is that a compulsory contribution?—It is a request on their part that we give them 2s. towards their 3s. and they ask us to stop the other 1s.

11190. I do not think you follow me. Suppose any workman is not going to the excursion what happens to him?—He has no money stopped. He has to sign a request asking us to stop his money.

11191. Then deductions are made for the mutual accident fund, is that voluntary also?—That is voluntary.

11192. Then the sick fund?—The sick fund is also voluntary.

11193. Then the nursing fund?—That is now extinct; the men have not seen fit to carry it on.

11194. Then the hospitals and infirmaries fund?—That is voluntary also.

11195. And the old age pensions fund?—That is voluntary.

11196. And the South African War fund?—That was voluntary at the time it was existing.

11197. With regard to all those is it known among the body of workmen which of the workmen have deductions taken from them?—It is known to all the workmen, because each workman has his deduction on his pay ticket.

11198. But assuming them to gather at the office for their pay, suppose one or two were not paying to one of these funds; would that be known to their fellows?—Not at all.

11199. It is a private arrangement and the nett sum is given out according to the request that has been furnished to the office by the particular workman?—That is so.

11200. In those cases do I gather that all the employers do is to act as a sort of bankers or officials for the concern?—Yes. They save the expenses of collection.

By Mrs. Tennant.

11201. In any of the collieries with which you are familiar have you tried to do without the assistance of fining?—Well, I object to fines if they can be prevented, and from time to time I use my influence as general manager to prevent my managers fining, and also to reduce fines.

11202. But have you ever really tried to work a colliery without recourse to the system of fining?—No, I know it is impossible.

11203. Then with you it is a matter of belief rather than of actual experience. Would you not agree that the alternative of dismissal would be a powerful deterrent?—Oh it is a powerful deterrent, but it is too serious a punishment. You lose your workman and you are not sure that you are going to get a better one.

11204. But you have not contemplated the other possibility, that the presence of a powerful deterrent might cure the workman of his liability to commit the offence?—The offence has been committed at the time the question of punishment is taken into account. The boy has the knowledge that prosecution may result at the time he commits the offence.

11205. But he also has the knowledge that there is the alternative of a fine, which will find greater favour in the minds of the management if it can be arranged than the alternative of dismissal?—I beg your pardon; not "if it can be arranged," it could always be arranged if it lay within the wish of the workman; the prosecution is decided upon without any arrangement with the workmen.

11206. I did not mean by arrangement with the workman, but that if it were a matter which a proprietor of a colliery could arrange to his own satisfaction he would prefer to avoid the inconvenience and expense of a prosecution?—Yes.

11207. And to have recourse to a fine or a caution—if it were a serious offence I presume it would be a fine?—If it was what we call a really serious offence the man would be prosecuted; I am speaking of an offence which would endanger his own life or the lives of his fellow-workmen.

11208. I am excluding that class of offence. You draw a line between a fine and a caution?—The point is this; A boy commits an offence—boys often commit offences; you have to take the conditions of the mine into consideration, the miles of road the boys have to cover and the numerous rules they have to observe; there is no mine in existence that does not break some rules every day—the boy may be cautioned, not once, but sometimes twenty times, and if he really takes no notice of it, then it becomes a question to decide whether you shall dismiss the boy or fine him or prosecute him. It is very rarely indeed that a boy is prosecuted unless the offence is a very serious one.

11209. But would not you come to the conclusion that a system breaks down which allows for cautioning twenty times without the caution taking effect?—I must not be taken too literally in saying that, because we should have to discuss the particular offence. It may be an offence that is an inconvenience, or it may be an offence leading to extreme danger.

11210. But surely you would not caution twenty times in the case of an offence leading to extreme danger?—Oh, no. Suppose a boy opened his safety lamp, he would be prosecuted for the first offence. It must be remembered that these boys are born amongst the miners and they know the dangers that are common in mines; we should not keep a boy who committed such an offence in our employment, and we should prosecute him at the same time. But in regard to numerous other offences different considerations enter. I will name one in order to give you an idea. It is a usual thing and it is compelled by the Mines Regulation Act that a boy working underground must lead his horse. If he does not lead the horse it may be injured on the side of the roadway; but he does not always lead his horse; he does so if he sees an officials light in the distance, but the official may be so far away that he cannot catch him.

11211. Take a case in which you do catch him?—Then we warn him and caution him and point out the danger to the horse and the danger to himself, then if the offence on his part becomes rarer and he shows signs of improvement perhaps he never gets fined at all.

11212. If a boy has been cautioned for that offence and repeats it, what do you do then?—It would depend upon how quickly the offence was repeated; if he did not repeat it for a fortnight or three weeks, we should probably caution him again; but if he repeated it quickly we should probably fine him.

11213. Do not you think that if for the first offence you threatened either to prosecute him or to dismiss him for the repetition of the offence he would be more likely to avoid the repetition of the offence than if he realised that he was simply subject to another caution ?—He does not realise it ; he does not know it.

Mr. I. Hodges.

8 May 1907.

11214. But if it is the practice of the colliery—if he sees other boys who have repeated the same offence being subjected only to another caution or to a fine, he would be liable to assume that his case would be treated in the same way ?—I suppose he might, but he does not know.

11215. You may say that he does not know it, but he may assume it ; it is human nature that he should assume it, is it not ?—I should not say so. The difficulty is this ; when boys get together, particularly boys like those in mines, there is a great deal of bravado about their actions, and the boy may be brazened to do a thing which he would be very contrite about afterwards. You have many circumstances to take into consideration.

11216. You said that in certain cases a miner is attached to his work and in certain other cases he is not. In cases where a miner is really attached to his work and does not wish to lose his job, would not the risk of dismissal or of a prosecution be a powerful deterrent ?—Yes.

11217. It would be more likely to be a powerful deterrent than merely the risk of incurring a fine ?—Yes, to a miner. I am not speaking of a boy. The boy could get employment anywhere ; the day after he leaves us he could go into the next pit and get employment there.

11218. But if he brings a record of dismissals he would not be likely to get employment, would he ?—He does not bring any record I am sorry to say ; the miners will not allow us to obtain characters.

11219. And it will not become known that he has been dismissed ?—It might become known if you asked him where he came from ; but that would only be rarely. And then the circumstances of the dismissal would not be known. It is a habit of boys, and of men sometimes, to vacate their employment every year at a seasonal colliery, a colliery producing house coal, and working good time in the winter and poor time in the summer ; 25 per cent. of such boys and men leave during the summer months and come back in the winter months. Amongst such a changing body of workmen it would be most difficult to trace men, even if a system of characters were formulated.

11220. Is work always so full and constant that any boy could get employment just on presenting himself at any colliery ?—It is nearly so. The raising of the age at which boys may be employed has very greatly affected the number of boys available. Then again, boys do not usually go down mines except they are sons of miners ; we do not recruit very much from outside I should take it that any mine to-day could do with 25 per cent. more boys than it has ; men have to do the work that boys could do and would do were they there.

11221. Then in the other case you presented in which the miner does not care about his job and therefore would be indifferent to dismissal ; has he also got some immediate resource ?—Usually speaking. It depends on his age.

11222. If he has some other resource and does not care about his job, why does not he act on the other resource without waiting for his dismissal ?—He may not quite have arrived at the stage where he would voluntarily dismiss himself, but he may have reached the point where he does not care whether he goes or not. In that case a prosecution would be a greater deterrent than dismissal.

11223. Then you do think that prosecution is a greater deterrent than dismissal ?—Certainly in such cases.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

11224. You may be taken as speaking for the colliery managers in Yorkshire and Derbyshire ?—I think so.

11225. It is their opinion that fines are better for discipline than the alternatives of prosecution or suspension or dismissal ?—Yes, it is much better for discipline.

11226. What do you say about the opinions of the men as to that ?—I say the men are distinctly with us.

11227. They prefer the system of fines to a new system in which suspension and very often prosecution and sometimes dismissal would have to take the place of fining in order to maintain discipline ?—Distinctly. There is a want of elasticity between a caution and a prosecution ; the change is too drastic between the two ; we need some middle course.

11228. Your evidence really comes to this ; that to do away with fines as a matter of discipline is against the interest of the master and the managers and the men ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

11229. You speak here of breaches of discipline. You say, "It is inadvisable that the practice of fining workmen at collieries for breaches of discipline or contraventions of rules should be prohibited." What do you mean by breaches of disciplines ; could you give us a little further indication of what that phrase means ?—It would be a little difficult. Collieries have various grades of discipline. In the case of the Whitwood Collieries we think we may congratulate ourselves upon having good discipline. I believe the number of both fines and prosecutions very largely depends on the standard of discipline maintained in the mines.

11230. I do not wish to press it at all ; I know it is very difficult to define. There are breaches of discipline that are not contraventions of the rules ?—I am not sure of that ; we have both the rules under the Coal Mines Regulation Acts and our own bye-laws.

11231. When you speak of contraventions of rules, they are not contraventions of rules under the Mines Regulations Acts, neither the general nor the special rules ; they are, so to speak, breaches of your own rules which have not necessarily any legal sanction, but are bye-laws necessary in your own view for the purpose of maintaining discipline in and about the mine ?—That is so.

11232. Many of these breaches of discipline may be small incidents, may they not ?—They may.

11233. For which it would be impossible to take the delinquent into court ?—Quite so ; the seriousness of the offence might not be sufficient to justify our taking it into court.

11234. Not only that, but there would be no danger involved in regard to many of these small offences ?—No immediate danger.

11235. As I said at first, it is impossible, because of the infinite variety of working conditions in mines, to give point and shape to these small offences ; we cannot do it at this table, although you and I could probably do it at the Whitwood Colliery ?—You are quite right.

11236. But as to these minor offences, which you say are taking place by hundreds every day——?—I did not say by hundreds every day.

11237. The term you used was "multifarious" cases ; it would be quite impossible for you to prosecute the boys in those cases ?—Yes, quite.

11238. In that case, instead of making a deduction from the wages of the boy, would it not be better, for the purpose of maintaining discipline I mean, that you should administer a caution ?—That is what we do.

11239. And that if the caution failed after fair repetition you should then take the option open to you of either suspending him or dismissing him from your employment ?—We do that. You see the punishment for the boy is really borne by the father. Even if the boy is prosecuted the father has to pay the fine and the costs. If the boy is dismissed the father has to bear the burden. The boy does not bear it, and that is one of our difficulties ; he cannot be made to bear it.

11240. Do you know of any better censor of a boy than his father or his mother ?—I do not.

11241. Therefore they are much the better people for enforcing discipline ?—Yes.

11242. Therefore, inasmuch as upon them falls the financial burden which is imposed, are they not likely to press home upon their boys the necessity of discipline ?—They are.

11243. Would not the object that you yourself desire be effected by the arrangement that I suggest ?—No, because the fathers themselves who are bearing this burden are the people who ask us to fine.

11244. I am not asking you as to that ; I am asking you, would not the object you have in view be better effected—the maintenance of discipline, and incidentally the assurance of safety? It is not the question of the ease of the father or the mother, but would not the object of the safety of the mine and the maintenance of discipline be effected, even if it did cause a financial burden to be placed on the father?—I could not answer that directly "yes," because the burden of the prosecution would be so serious that in many cases ——

11245. I am not talking of a prosecution; I am speaking of those cases where you cannot prosecute, but where cautions having failed and discipline having become relaxed, you have taken it into your own hands and dismissed the boy, and thus placed a burden on the parent. Then I am asking you whether placing that burden on the parents, who are admittedly the best maintainers of discipline so far as the boy himself is concerned, would not bring about the object that you yourself desire?—I think it would.

11246. The great object of all, of course, is the maintenance of discipline?—Yes.

11247. Should you, then, keep on with this system of cautions and fines—which by your statement here are admittedly small—rather than seek the method, which I admit is the more drastic, but as I put it is the surer method that I have suggested of maintaining discipline?—I should not like to dismiss seventeen boys a year; I do not want to have to do it; the task is too great a one.

11248. Are not you there taking it as though all these cases would occur all the year?—This is an average year.

11249. But I am trying to find out this. You have admitted that it would be a greater deterrent if parents were, by the process I suggest, able to bring pressure upon the boys. Now, when that greater pressure was brought to bear upon the boys, is it likely that this number would continue?—I think so; I do not think there would be any abatement.

11250. Now I go to another point. You have seventeen boys here who are fined in the year, 1906; that is out of, I suppose, 200 boys on the average in the year?—We had 500 boys.

11251. That would be the working average employed throughout the year?—Yes.

11252. At probably five days a week?—Yes; it was a good year.

11253. So that you have 260 turns worked by 500 boys?—Yes.

11254. I am really incompetent to get at that calculation but it is an enormous figure. Anyhow, you can see it is 130,000 turns worked?—Yes.

11255. And have you fined seventeen times in 130,000 turns worked?—Yes.

11256. You certainly have got (and it is very greatly to your credit, I think) the standard of discipline in your mines to a very high point; but does it not seem, when discipline has been maintained to that extent, that you could do away wth the system of fining, inasmuch as you have only fined seventeen times in 130,000 turns?—We had reached that stage in each of those seventeen cases that we must do something—either prosecute or dismiss; we had already tried all that warning could do. We did not want to discharge the lad, we had either to fine or to prosecute.

11257. That is to say, those seventeen cases were cases, if not of great gravity, yet of long continuance?—That is so.

11258. Does it not seem that those are the very cases that should be dismissed, because do they not tend to relax the discipline of the other boys?—Suppose I discharge those seventeen boys, and the next firm to us under the same conditions discharge other seventeen boys. It is almost certain that I should have their seventeen boys at my place and they would have my seventeen boys at theirs. There would be no difference at the end of the year, because we should each be taking on the other's discharged boys.

11259. You think it is better to bear the boys you have than to fly to boys that you know not of?—Quite so. We have already warned the boy, and he knows what to expect; but if he gets dismissed he may start with a clean page at the next colliery. Not only that. I have known boys dismissed from one of our own pits working for us in another pit within a fortnight.

11260. If these cases are cases that were either open to prosecution or cases that were long continued cases of misconduct and bad discipline, may I ask whether fining them and keeping them in your employ is likely to tend to the safety and discipline that you yourself desire?—It is, because we should not continue fining. I do not think you will find a boy fined twice; certainly never for the same offence. I have tried to find one who had been fined twice, and I could not find one; if he repeated the offence he would be dismissed.

11261. You think in this one year it was necessary, in order to maintain discipline, to fine these seventeen boys?—Certainly. Would you mind looking through the seventeen cases, and you will see for yourself what they are.

11262. These are inclusive of adults and boys?—Yes, you will see by the occupation whether it is a case of a boy or not. The first is a case of February 24th, "J—— B——, driver, allowing full tubs" ——

11263. How are we to find out whether this was a matter within the control of the boy?—His control was that he must put lockers in the tubs to stop them.

11264. Were the boxes going?—Oh, no, they would be brought in by the horse to the pass-bye at the end of the engine plane; that would be on a downhill gradient; instead of lockering them and brakeing them he let them go.

11265. You will see with me the difficulty of going into these technical matters here; but I will ask you this. Were the boxes on the move when the locker should have been put in, or were they stopped to begin with?—I could not say. This was a case in which the under-manager himself found the boy neglecting his duty after repeated warnings.

11266. I will put this to you. Might it not be that it was not the result of his inefficiency at all? There are many boys who can scotch very quickly we know; there are other boys who are not nearly so quick, who are just as desirous of doing their work, but not so quick at their work; might not this be a boy who could not scotch quickly, and the boxes got beyond his control, and then he is fined 5s. for that?—That is possible; but you must remember that the deputy had looked into the case, the under-manager looked into it, and then the manager reported it, and they all agreed as to the boy's neglect.

11267. Then here is another one:—"Causing the pit to stand forty-five minutes"; that might be utterly beyond the boy's control?—It is the effect——

11268. It is the effect, but it might be an effect for which he was not in any sense specially responsible; it might have been the boxes coming from any other place It seems to me that it would have been better if there had been a place at which those boxes must stand until the lockers were put in?—Then you could not move them again.

11269. Oh, yes you could; however, it is unnecessary to go into that. Now you say that in one particular case where a boy was likely to be prosecuted, upon the appeal of the miners, a meeting of the whole of the boys was called, and you say that greater publicity therefore resulted from that meeting than would have resulted even had a prosecution taken place?—Yes.

11270. You therefore think it is desirable that the utmost publicity should be given when any of these offences or breaches of discipline take place?—I think it is desirable.

11271. Is the system of fining one that gives the greatest publicity?—It gives publicity to that particular section of workmen who are concerned. A driver is not fined without all the other drivers knowing it.

11272. How is that?—It would be the common topic of conversation for a long time.
